the average rate of wages in every calling and trade in the Commonwealth. If honorable members turn to Coghlan they will find that he runs over the whole gamut of industry, and gives the average rate of wages in each State. The handbook as issued by the Victorian statistician furnishes the same information. These books ought to be in the possession of the High Commissioner, or our representative in England for the time being. It should be possible for any one who wishes to bring men to Australia, under contract for manual labour, to go to the representative of the Commonwealth in England who, on referring to these works, could at once determine whether the wages specified in the contract agreed with those ruling in the States. If they did, the necessary permit to land should be at once forthcoming. If that course were followed, I think that even the Labour Party, who hold very strong opinions on this question, could take no exception to it; but if we insist that in the case of men coming under contract to Australia, the contract shall, first of all, be scrutinized by the Department of External Affairs, we must of necessity achieve a reputation for wishing to keep white men out of the Commonwealth. The greater part of three months would be occupied in sending a contract from England to Australia, and receiving an answer.

Mr. POYNTON.—Can an English lawyer practise on landing here?

Mr. ROBINSON.—He can. I am glad to say that a body of which I am the honorary secretary has passed resolutions, having the force of law, whereby any barrister or solicitor of England, Scotland, or Ireland can be admitted to the Victorian bar on paying the same fee as is required of Victorian barristers or solicitors seeking admittance to the English bar.

Mr. CHANTER.—That does not apply to all the States?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I cannot speak for all the States, but I believe that English barristers and solicitors are admitted to practise in New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—That is so.

Mr. ROBINSON.—And also in Queensland, and in one of the other States.

Mr. POYNTON.—If the honorable and learned member went to Western Australia he would find that the position was different.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I think the honorable member will ascertain on inquiry that the rule to which he refers has been modified.

Mr. SPENCE.—We shall have to import a number of British lawyers under contract.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I know that the honorable member is merely chaffing, but I should like him and his party to consider whether it would not be possible to so administer the Immigration Restriction Act that its objects might be achieved by the least objectionable means. With the objects they have in view I am in hearty sympathy; but I cannot for a moment defend some of the acts that have been done in pursuance of that legislation. The same effects can be secured by a great deal less trouble, a great deal less annoyance, and without creating any unpleasantness in any other part of the world. It can be secured without issuing exemption certificates or similar papers, which seem to brand the man as an undesirable immigrant from the start. I am glad that that matter has been referred to, because I think that the more certificates are issued the more likelihood there is of coming to a decision whereby we shall be able to keep out men who may be brought here for improper purposes, and at the same time enable desirable immigrants to be brought to Australia in as large numbers as possible. I hope that the Government will restrain the impetuosity of the Treasurer, and that his policy of distributing millions to every one but the persons who should receive them will be checked. I hope also that some method will be adopted whereby the debt question as it affects the whole of the States will be settled on a basis satisfactory not only to the Governments of the States, but to the people of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I regret that the Treasurer was not able to present a more satisfactory Budget to us, because it is manifest on an examination of it that the Commonwealth has come very near to the end of its tether, so far as funds are concerned. In the very near future only one or two courses will be open to us. Either we must stop introducing any fresh legislation whatever, or devise some system of direct taxation to raise the money that may be required. While I, for one, do not object to any method whereby part of the money shall be raised by direct taxation, I decline to assent to the principle that we should tax merely for the purpose of taxing. My desire is that every penny piece that is taken out of the pockets of the people should, as far as possible, go into the Treasury. I am bound to say that that is not the case under our present system. We are raising something like £8,700,000 in Customs and Excise duties. I am not going to refer to the amount of taxation raised in some of the States by direct taxation, because I have no doubt whatever that the sum so raised does not exceed that which is spent in public works, in making roads, and thereby improving property. Therefore that comes rather under the head of such taxation as pertains to municipalities. If we were to follow the system of taxation that is observed in England at the present time—that is to say if we were to maintain a proportion between direct and indirect taxation—nothing like £8,700,000 would be raised through the Customs. But I regret to say that our method has been adopted with the consent of a great many of the party who if they really understood the meaning of the term labour, would be the very first to oppose it.

Mr. THOMAS.—It was done with the consent of the people, unfortunately.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member is aware that all the members of the first Conservative Government of the Commonwealth were anxious to impose heavy duties, and they were permitted to do so, owing to the fact that a large proportion of members of the Labour Party did not understand the principle of finance which was being adopted, and absolutely allowed heavy burdens to be placed on the backs of those whom they represent. Those burdens will remain there, unless a greater number of that party come to their senses than is likely to be the case. I object to any man bearing any more taxation than is his fair share. When I find a man like the Treasurer, under a system that we call protective, paying, perhaps, less towards the revenue than another man with a family of half-a-dozen children, who is earning only a couple of pounds a week, I say that that is an unjust system. In my opinion, the fight against that system ought to be our principal task in the future. We ought to go before the electors prepared to reverse it, and to insist that not one penny piece shall be taken from the people more than is absolutely required, and that that amount shall be raised under a system that is equitable to all.

Mr. THOMAS. — Would the honorable member advocate a Federal land tax?

Mr. CONROY. — There are only two forms of taxation—direct and indirect. In England 51 per cent. of the taxation is raised by indirect means, and 49 per cent. is direct taxation. I am afraid that that proportion would be unjust in Australia. The discontent would be so great that it would not be advisable to introduce such a system here. There must be some proportion between the two systems. It is necessary that taxation should be raised for the preservation of law and order, and to enable the work of government to be carried on. In so far as it is necessary, we should all pay our share.

Mr. THOMAS.—Under a land tax every one would pay his share.

Mr. CONROY. — Would the honorable member have only one form of taxation?

Mr. THOMAS.—I would, if I had my way.

Mr. CONROY.—I object to undue taxation on land-owners or people with large incomes, just as I object to it on the mass of the people. It is precisely because almost the whole of our revenue is now raised by one method of taxation that I object to it. If £8,700,000 is the amount that it is necessary for us to raise to carry on the government, and if we dealt with the matter as taxation is dealt with in England, we should raise about £4,800,000 by Customs duties, and about £4,000,000 by direct taxation. For that class of men who, when the Tariff was introduced, did not care what happened as long as they felt that the burden did not fall on their own shoulders, I have no sympathy whatever. Four years ago, when the present Ministry and their followers were saying what a wonderful Tariff it was, and how it was going to give employment here and there, honorable members on this side pointed out that that was exactly what it would not do, and that, on the contrary, it would prevent employment. I may refer to what I had to say on the subject myself, and I remember that I pointed out that the greatest defect of the Tariff, so far as consideration for the revenue of the various States was concerned, was that it was not so framed as to allow for the expansion or diminution for which a properly-framed Tariff would have allowed. It was not so framed as to afford a kind of mark by which we might be enabled to judge of the prosperity or want of prosperity of the people of the various States. We have now absolute proof of that, and I regret to state that my remarks in that direction have been absolutely borne out. I think that, at the time, the present Treasurer rather agreed with me that the Tariff would not be an index of the progress of the people.

Mr. MAUGER.—It is an index of their want of progress at present.

Mr. CONROY.—At the present time we have a large amount of taxation fastened upon the community under the operation of the Tariff, and as a result true progress has been prevented. What is still more serious, there is a deficiency in the revenue, which a Tariff pressing just as heavily on the people, but framed in another direction, might have prevented. While imposing exactly the same burden on the people, we might have obtained a very much larger revenue by framing the Tariff in a different way.

Mr. HUME COOK.—And had a great deal more destruction of industries.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not know what the honorable member means. Does the honorable member call a business which cannot stand on its own legs an industry?

Mr. MAUGER.—Certainly.

Mr. CONROY.—Might I ask honorable members opposite to say what is their test? Is it 5, 10, 15, 80, or 100 per cent. of loss? Let us put it in the simplest way possible, to see whether the honorable member for Bourke is correct in his statement. He says now that if a man is doing work which is not in itself profitable he is still engaged in an industry.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I did not say that.

Mr. CONROY.—I asked the honorable member if, when a man's work was done, it cost more to produce than it was worth, he was engaged in an industry, and the honorable member replied, "Yes."

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable and learned member is re-stating the case in a different way.

Mr. CONROY.—I put it to honorable members opposite in this way: If a man does certain work, which costs him £1, and he gets 16s. for the result of his labour, is that an industry? I have only taken a difference of 4s. in the £1, which would be met by a 20 per cent. duty, whilst we know that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports over and over again called for a 30 per cent. duty.

Mr. HUME COOK.—And was sorry he could not get a higher duty.

Mr. CONROY.—That is quite true. The honorable member was sorry that he could not get a higher duty than 30 per cent. The honorable member contends that a man who produces 14s. worth of work should be able to make some one else pay £1 for it, and then he will be engaged in an industry. It is exactly the same thing to contend that a man in gaol who does 14s. worth of work, and whom it costs the State £1 to keep, is engaged in an industry. According to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, the more people we have in gaol doing 14s. worth of work for which the State has to pay £1, the bigger the industry. I have put the matter in this way in order that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports may understand it, though I confess that I have no hope that the honorable member will understand it, because I remember that on one occasion he pointed out that if a farmer spent 15s. in putting in a crop, and did not get any harvest, he was 15s. better off than when he started. I remember that the honorable member also argued that if a man put in a crop at a cost of £1, and there was a return of 10s. from it, that made 30s.; that there was 30s. worth of work done, and consequently the farmer was 30s. better off than when he started.

Mr. MAUGER. — The honorable and learned member is dreaming.

Mr. CONROY.—Other honorable members believed that in such a case the farmer would have suffered a loss of 10s.

Mr. THOMAS.—What was the honorable member's argument about the glass bottle machine coming in free?

Mr. CONROY.—I believe that was one of those cases where it was contended that if there were a tax of 50 per cent., the man using it would have had to pay 50 per cent.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable and learned member forgets that the money remains in the country.

Mr. CONROY.—I am aware that honorable members opposite used that argument over and over again, until I showed them that they would be just as well off if they did not draw their pay because the money would still remain in the country. It then became plain to their bright intelligences that, after all, that was not a very sound argument to use, and we did not hear very much more of it. I may mention that when a duty was called for on sugar, honorable members opposite all said that the sugar industry was a magnificent industry. I believe that it is an industry, because it is a business that can stand on its own legs.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The right honorable member for East Sydney thought that, and kept the duty on.

Mr. CONROY.—Surely the honorable member is not going to say that the right honorable member for East Sydney had anything to do with the Tariff.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I am speaking of New South Wales, and the right honorable gentleman's efforts for the industry there.

Mr. CONROY.—The duty was cut down as much as possible in New South Wales, and but for the arrangements made for entering into the Federation it would have been cut down still further. I have never heard it alleged that every man who believes in free-trade necessarily believes in the total abolition of the Customs House any more than that every protectionist believes in the total prohibition of imports. If we use extreme language in the one case we must use it in the other; if we say that a free-trader means a man who would abolish the Customs House, then we must say that a protectionist is one who would prohibit all exportation, because if we prohibit importation, we have nothing to pay by way of exports. That, generally speaking, was my quarrel with honorable members on the Ministerial side in regard to the sugar industry. Some of us believe this to be a true industry—that for every £1 spent in production, something of value will be returned. If the case be otherwise, somebody has to pay the difference, and it can only be paid by citizens engaged in productive industries. If we have so-called industries that cannot stand on their own legs, the bigger those industries are the worse it is for the community as a whole. Fortunately, the sugar industry is one which can absolutely rely on itself; and yet what a miserable spectacle has been presented in this House in this connexion! It has already been shown that the consumption of sugar in Australia amounts to something like 185,000 tons per annum; and an import duty of £6 per ton has been imposed, evidently with the object of raising the price of the Australian product to that extent. I admit that there may be a difference in the price of, say, 2s. 6d., in order to prevent outside competition; but the cost of carriage alone would have secured that end. Practically we have raised the aggregate price of sugar to the people of Australia by about £1,100,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Was there not some duty imposed previously?

Mr. CONROY.—I am speaking about what might have been, had there been no Tariff. In Queensland, for instance, the duty was inoperative, and in Western Australia there was no duty.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There was no duty in Western Australia for years.

Mr. CONROY.—In New South Wales, on the other hand, there was a duty of something like £3 per ton, and in Victoria a duty of £6. At any rate, it is clear that the effect of the Commonwealth duty will be to raise the cost of the sugar to the people as a whole by about £1,100,000. It was so clearly recognised that a large part of the duty ought to come back in the shape of revenue, that an excise duty was imposed which last year brought in, roughly, between £400,000 and £500,000. But even a certain amount of that return was lost, because we confused the matter by giving a bonus on sugar grown by white labour. No doubt we intended, as far as possible, to secure a White Australia; but, in passing, I must say that greater humbug, cant, and hypocrisy never were seen on the part of a Parliament than in this particular legislation. We have tried to persuade the whole of the people that this was wholly the legislation of the Commonwealth Parliament, whereas, in fact, all of the States had previously passed laws restricting the immigration of aliens. Almost the whole of the States had, by 1898, so effectually made laws in this regard that from 1896 to 1901 only 700 aliens per annum found their way into the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth, with all its boasted legislation, did not prevent the alien influx, though this Parliament took credit for so doing. The view I have indicated could only be placed before electors who are ignorant of the facts, and I am bound to say that some of the legislators seem to be equally ignorant that restrictive legislation was years ago passed by the States Parliaments.

Mr. McDONALD.—In less than two years 2,000 Japanese came into Queensland.

Mr. CONROY.—Between 1896 and 1901?

Mr. McDONALD.—I do not say that; but the honorable and learned member was speaking of a time prior to the Commonwealth legislation.

Mr. CONROY.—I think, as a matter of fact, that some 2,200 aliens came into Queensland, but of that number between 1,400 and 1,500 departed, and this brings the figures to what I stated in the first instance. When Queensland made a treaty with Japan, that State was much more alive to its duty than has been the Federal Parliament. I remember begging in this House that we should arrange for the exclusion of Japanese by a treaty with Japan; and we know the letters which passed between the representative of Japan and our own Government. When I asked that this matter should be arranged in the fashion of statesmen, the honorable member for Bland interjected that perhaps I was afraid of war, and thought that we in Australia could not defend ourselves. What would the honorable member for Bland say to-day, when Japan has shown what it can do in a struggle with one of the mightiest nations in the world?

Mr. McDONALD.—Japan has backed down at the last moment.

Mr. CONROY.—If Japan has done so, it is more from a love of mercy than from any other motive; and I wish other nations had arrived at the same stage of civilization. In other countries, the men at the head of affairs know that not their lives, but the lives of those under them, are being sacrificed in time of war; and the action of Japan is an example of sound consideration for those who fight the battle, and ought to be a lesson to European statesmen. The men at the head of affairs in Japan have taken part in the war, whereas in other countries the bulk of the statesmen manipulate affairs at such a distance that they could not be reached by the bullets of guns of the longest range. In my opinion it is not now even too late to try to arrange a treaty with Japan; and, whether we like it or not, we shall have to come to that step. We must learn to use the language of civilized nations when addressing the people of Japan, though, if we do use impertinent and boastful language, a great deal will be pardoned to us because of our ignorance, and our small size. But there are straining points after all, and to-day no one doubts that the very nation we chose to flaunt then could take possession of the northern part of Australia, and we should be absolutely helpless to defend it.

Mr. HUME COOK.—What good would it be to them?

Mr. CONROY.—It would be of great use to them, because a portion of that country is as rich as any part of Australia. It is not so suitable for a white population as for a population more inured to a tropical climate than we are.

Mr. TUDOR. — Does the honorable and learned member say that Japan has a more tropical climate than Australia?

Mr. CONROY.—No; but I do say that the ethnological difference between the Japanese race and our own is so great that they seem to be better able to bear the conditions of a tropical climate than we are.

Mr. HUME COOK.—What purpose could they put the country to if they took it for a few weeks?

Mr. CONROY.—They could make use of the country. The honorable member does not suppose that it is a desert.

Mr. HUME COOK.—That pre-supposes the sweeping of the British Navy out of existence.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — Where would our navy be?

Mr. CONROY.—The Treasurer speaks of "our navy" after we clearly disregarded the very friendly warning from the British Government to arrange this business, as far as possible, by treaty. Was it not the height of stupidity and of ignorant arrogance to refuse to arrive at exactly the same result by treaty?

Mr. KENNEDY. — Is the honorable and learned member in order, sir, in speaking disrespectfully of an Act of Parliament which he is not proposing to repeal or alter?

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member is not in order in reflecting upon any action of this Parliament, and I trust that he will withdraw the expression he used. I would also ask honorable members to allow the honorable and learned member to continue his speech in his own way, and not to try to draw him off the thread of his argument by continuous interruptions.

Mr. CONROY.—I withdraw the expression. I am sorry that the honorable member for Moira thinks he was guilty of that ignorant arrogance, or arrogant ignorance; but I was referring to the general tone of Parliament at that time.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I object to the reflection upon Parliament.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member was one of those who voted in that way.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is why I object to the reflection upon Parliament.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member is not proud of his action, then. We absolutely declined to arrange a treaty. I suppose it is one of the few instances on record where a body of men who, when they could arrive at the same result in a courteous fashion, deliberately adopted the discourteous fashion.

Mr. McDONALD.—Did any other Colony in the British Empire except Queensland do it?

Mr. CONROY.—No; and the fact that it did is a very high tribute to the members of its Parliament. By a treaty, Japan was willing to bind itself not to allow one of its citizens to come here, except with our approval, and we declined to entertain the courteous offer.

Mr. McDONALD.—And the great bulk of them came into Queensland after the treaty was signed.

Mr. CONROY.—That is not correct.

Mr. McDONALD.—It is. In the Queensland Parliament, we had a number of rows over the matter.

Mr. CONROY.—I took care to check the figures, and I think the honorable member will find that he is mistaken. Now that the little business with Russia is settled, if the Japanese statesmen should think it worth their while—and, for our own sakes, it must be hoped that they will not—they could compel us to do now what we declined to do then. Surely the honorable member for Moira does not think that Great Britain would interfere in a matter like this? We declined to listen even to the very strong suggestions courteously made by the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs.

Mr. POYNTON.—In framing the Immigration Restriction Act, we carried out the instructions of Mr. Chamberlain absolutely.

Mr. CONROY.—In one part of that measure we did. I certainly hoped that the Bill would not go through in that form. If a still more extraordinary clause had been inserted it would have had to be reserved for the Royal Assent by the Governor-General, and then we should have had a measure drawn without any hurry-scurry, and representing the common sense mandate of the community, which was that, as far as possible, we were to preserve Australia for the people of our own race, but in doing so to come into conflict with other races as little as possible.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Did not the honorable and learned member vote for total exclusion?

Mr. CONROY.—I have just given the reason why I did.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member did not give that reason at the time?

Mr. CONROY.—I did. It would be far better for us to retrace our steps. It is very much more easy to amend an error in our own time and way than to wait until compulsion is placed upon us. We are apt to talk here in a very extraordinary way, indeed. At one moment men rise and say, "What do we care for England? Away with it." If it makes a suggestion for the framing of a Navigation Bill, as it did, we will not listen to the advice. If it makes a suggestion for the framing of an Immigration Restriction Bill, as it did, we pay no attention. That is the way in which we treat suggestions from the statesmen of the old country. But the moment we are faced with trouble, by reason of our stupid folly, we turn round and say, "We are safeguarded in our folly by the Fleet of Great Britain." I do not care which way honorable members talk. If they say, "We will back up the British Fleet in everything they do," I can understand that policy, but I do not understand the policy of condemning Great Britain for everything it does, and then turning round to whine and say, "We must look to it to safeguard us in whatever we do." Unfortunately, that is the position at which we have arrived. A time, however, may come when the statesmen of England will get very tired of that kind of thing, and think that we richly deserve one or two of the snubs we are bound otherwise to get. Does any one suppose for a moment that Australia would have talked to Germany about the Jaluit Group in the strain it did, or treat the representations of the Japanese Consul, when they were made, as it did, had it not been for the fact that the power of England was behind us? We know that it could not have acted in that way, and as we are relying entirely on the protection of England, we should pay some heed to the representations made to us by the statesmen of that country. I should be very glad indeed, therefore, if the Ministry would face the situation, and prepare to arrange the treaty which was required by the Japanese Government. At the present time we do not stand in a very good position, so far as they are concerned, and it might be well for us to do what is desired before it is forced upon us. Of course, it may be that the Japanese nation, with its 44,000,000 of people, hardly takes the trouble to care what a small and remote country like Australia is doing. I have dwelt at some length upon this subject, because our legislation in regard to it seems altogether wrong, and I think that we should be prepared to recognise our position, and to act accordingly. In dealing with the sugar bounty, I shall point out the serious injury which its payment inflicts upon five States of the Commonwealth. As the honorable and learned member for Wannon showed, the bounty system places a very heavy tax on our orchardists, and the honorable member for South Sydney, who is largely interested in jam-making, has informed us that the heavy tax on sugar seriously injures that industry.

Mr. MAUGER.—He is doing well.

Mr. CONROY.—That is not the question. We have to consider whether employment should be taken from thousands of people by the taxing of their raw material.

Mr. HUME COOK. — Employment has been taken from the boilermakers on the Yarra.

Mr. CONROY. — Does the honorable member therefore suggest that the farmers of the Commonwealth should not be considered? Let me give the Committee two instances of the serious injury done to industries by the imposition of a tax on their raw material. Mr. Chamberlain, in his intense desire to benefit the West Indian sugar-growers, and because the protectionist ideas which he has imbibed led him to think that it was not a good thing for England to get sugar cheaply by the operation of the French and German bounties, entered into negotiations which resulted in the stoppage of the importation of certain sugar, with the result that the price of sugar increased by £4 per ton. As a consequence, between 17,000 and 18,000 men connected with the confectionery trade, in which sugar is the raw material, lost their employment within twelve months, while the president of the Chamber of Manufacturers of Aerated Waters stated that that industry, in which 200,000 men were employed, had been almost totally ruined. Similar results, of course on a smaller scale, have followed in Australia through the action of the Commonwealth Parliament in putting a tax on sugar, which is the raw material of so many of our industries. But, altogether apart from the loss thus occasioned, the Commonwealth has to pay largely from the public funds for the maintenance of the bounty system, the cost of which next year will be increased by £150,000. We are told that this arrangement was entered into to provide for a White Australia; but the Chinese Restriction Act was passed in New South Wales fifteen or twenty years before Federation, and almost all the States possessed similar legislation by 1898. There could be no more gross misuse of language than to pretend that there is any connexion between the sugar bounty and the maintenance of a White Australia. I will suppose, however, that what has been represented is absolutely the case. Men frequently tell us that the sugar lands are the richest in Australia, and we know as a matter of fact that the land used for sugar-growing produces a rental varying from £2 to £5 per annum. Will it be believed that the people of the Commonwealth who have to support themselves upon poorer tracts, are being required to contribute to keep in cultivation land so valuable that it is worth from £30 to £70 per acre? That, however, is what is absolutely being done. There is a confusion of language with regard to this question that renders it almost hopeless to argue about it. What we have to determine is whether these rich and valuable lands shall be kept in cultivation by means of a bounty, and I say, apart from any question as to the employment of white or black labour, that we cannot escape the conclusion that the owners of these rich lands have no right whatever to any assistance from us. I am sorry that this argument has to be repeated so frequently in order to force it into the minds of honorable members. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we should have a fuller House. [Quorum formed.] I regret that the utter demoralization of honorable members on the Ministerial benches should have necessitated my calling attention to the state of the House. I think that it is a monstrous thing that the Ministerial Party, which numbers forty-five, cannot keep sufficient members in the Chamber to maintain a quorum. The conditions under which the sugar industry is now being carried on are proving a serious hindrance to many other industries not yet fully developed in which sugar forms one of the principal raw materials, and I trust that honorable members will soon come to a reasonable frame of mind, and remove the present intolerable burden which the people of the Commonwealth are being called upon to bear for the benefit of a few planters and capitalists. Another matter to which the Treasurer referred demands our attention. All our public works are being constructed entirely out of revenue. While that principle is in many cases a sound one, and it may be specially desirable to follow it to a certain extent, owing to the fact that loan moneys have in the past been unwisely expended, we shall, by pushing it to an extreme, commit as grave an error as if we continued to spend loan moneys too lavishly. It is proposed to spend £30,000 upon the construction of a special telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne, and it is anticipated that the revenue derived from that addition to our telephone equipment will return something like 10 per cent. upon the outlay. It seems to me to be ridiculous to charge the whole of that expenditure to one year, and I can conceive of a number of works that would probably prove equally remunerative, which could fairly be paid for out of loans. We are making rather too great a call upon the revenue of any one year when we propose to construct such costly works out of revenue. If we pursue this policy too far, we shall be unable to proceed for twenty or thirty years with the construction of many desirable works which should be immediately put in hand. If we were about to build a railway—for example, the line projected from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta—it is clear that we could not wait till we were able to construct it out of revenue. It is equally clear that the cost of many of our public works ought not to be debited to the single year in which they are carried out. It ought to be spread over a series of years. It may be that, in constructing the few public works which we have undertaken, out of revenue, we have acted wisely. But if we are to proceed with some absolutely necessary works which are connected with the departments under our control, it is obvious that in the near future we shall have to borrow. Unless the amount involved were very small, it would be ridiculous to borrow it within the Commonwealth, because by so doing we should merely produce a constriction in the money market which would re-act upon all the other producers in the community, and we certainly do not desire to achieve that result. During the course of his Budget speech the Treasurer made a most extraordinary statement. He declared that since the establishment of Federation New South Wales had gained nearly £6,000,000. What he should have said was that since the inauguration of the Commonwealth that State had been taxed to the extent of an additional £5,900,000. The right honorable gentleman also stated that Queensland had lost £2,000,000 during the same period. I admit that as the price of manufactures which, prior to Federation, Queensland was accustomed to obtain from New South Wales was enhanced by the operation of the Commonwealth Tariff, the people of the former State might very well be paying an extra amount of taxation without the money finding its way into the coffers of the Queensland Treasury.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Since the advent of Federation the Parliament of Queensland has been obliged to impose additional taxation.

Mr. CONROY.—When the Tariff was under consideration I pointed out exactly what would take place. The fact that a junior member of this House was able to foresee the result of its operation is in itself a double condemnation of the stupidity of the first Commonwealth Ministry and of their supporters.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable and learned member is too harsh.

Mr. CONROY.—How would the Minister like me to express it? I cannot say that they erred wilfully. I believe that they erred in honest ignorance, and consequently I have to say that their action was the result of stupidity.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is no other name for it.

Mr. CONROY.—At that time I went so far as to stake my reputation—as one who had some knowledge of political economy—on my prediction that the Tariff would fail in the very directions in which it has failed. Coming to the question of the deportation of kanakas, it seems highly probable—in the light of a decision by Mr. Justice Anglin, of Canada—that all our legislation in that respect must absolutely fail. Upon the third reading of the Pacific Island Labourers Bill, and again when one of the Supply Bills was under consideration, I asserted that, in my opinion, that legislation would be ultra vires. I pointed out that, though we might put the kanakas on board a ship, with the idea of deporting them, the moment the captain got outside our territorial waters he would be holding those men as prisoners. Moreover, there was no need to make any such provision in regard to the deportation of kanakas, because they are a decaying race. That fact is clearer now than it was then.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Most of the kanakas desire to return to their islands, but cannot get back.

Mr. CONROY.—Those men were imported into Queensland upon the understanding that, at the expiration of a certain period, they would be returned to their homes. That arrangement it should be respected in the case of those who wish to return. My remarks were directed towards those whom we propose to deport, irrespective of whether or not they desire to remain amongst us. To insist on removing those who were brought here unwillingly—irrespective of whether they liked it or not—would be manifestly unjust. If a thing is not morally right it cannot be politically right. In the history of all nations we find that any departure from that great principle has always been followed by disaster to those who inaugurated it. In dealing with a matter of this importance the Treasurer ought to have afforded us some explanation of what was likely to take place. I should like his attention for a moment.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member is filling in time very well.

Mr. CONROY.—Is not this a matter still requiring some consideration on our part?

Mr. WATSON.—I should hope so; but I do not know why we should waste time now in considering it when the Bill will be submitted to us.

Mr. CONROY.—I wish the honorable member would not suggest that it is a waste of time to study the work of the Parliament or to indulge in just criticism of our own legislation. It is evident that there is some justification for a want of confidence in our legislation on the part of other nations. It does not seem as if the common sense of the people of Australia were uppermost, so far as our legislation is concerned.

Mr. CARPENTER. — The honorable and learned member is again crying "stinking fish."

Mr. CONROY.—I am very sorry that the honorable member does not understand the difference between fair criticism and abuse.

Mr. CARPENTER. — The honorable and learned member is decrying his own country.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not know whether the honorable member is a native of this country, but the bulk of the members of the Labour Party are not. It is a matter of no consequence whether he is or not, but he has taken me to task for making statements regarding the country itself, when my criticism relates not to the country, but to the Legislature of the Commonwealth, and the want of knowledge which some of its members betray.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable and learned member need not worry about that; no one else will.

Mr. CONROY.—I agree with the honorable member that I should not worry. I have seen so many displays of a want of knowledge on the part of some honorable members that I ought to be satisfied that, unless I went around with the cane and recollected that, after all, many of them, so far as these matters are concerned, are as little boys at school, I could not hope to make any impression upon them. I am convinced from a knowledge of many of the honorable members of this House that it would be useless to explain the working of any legislation to them. If a severe schoolmaster who was in the habit of chastising boys for failing to comprehend a lesson after it had been explained three or four times to them, attended this House and saw how some honorable members were utterly unable to understand a matter that has been explained to them thirty or forty times, what punishment would he suggest?

Mr. WATSON.—If he had to listen to explanations of the kind to which we now have to submit, he would not think any other punishment necessary.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not ask the honorable member to listen to my explanation; I only hope that he will be able to grasp it. Whether the people of other countries are rightly or wrongly imbued with the idea that we are not legislating on sound lines—

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is our business.

Mr. CONROY.—But we cannot act altogether in defiance of the opinions of the rest of the world. If we wish to keep our place in the social life of the nations we are bound to pay at least some attention to their opinions. Who would have thought when we passed the Immigration Restriction Bill that its provisions would be applied to shipwrecked sailors? Many of the difficulties that have arisen under this measure have been due to defective administration.

Mr. MAUGER.—What has that to do with the Budget?

Mr. CONROY.—It is a fit subject to be discussed at this stage.

Mr. MAUGER.—It is played out.

Mr. CONROY.—Unfortunately, it is not. While the memory of wrongs perpetrated under that Act remains, and opportunities offer to perpetrate other wrongs under it, no one can say that it is a subject with which we should not deal. I am referring particularly to the provision in the Immigration Restriction Act, under which certain aliens who were shipwrecked on our shores were not allowed to land.

Mr. WATSON.—That myth was exploded long ago. Surely the honorable and learned member is not going to revive it.

Mr. CONROY.—I feel confident that if the Labour Government had been in office the Act would not have been administered as if men would deliberately court shipwreck in order to be allowed to land in Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—That lie has been refuted a dozen times.

Mr. CONROY.—I regret to say that it has not. As a matter of fact, I saw a copy of a letter written by the Secretary of the Department of External Affairs to the company acting as agents for the vessel to which I refer, in which it was stated that they were to exercise a special jurisdiction, so to speak, over the shipwrecked sailors.

Mr. WATSON.—They were to be held responsible for their safekeeping, but subject to that condition they could land the sailors in Australia, and take them to any point they pleased.

Mr. CONROY.—The Act was administered in connexion with that case as if men would deliberately choose to run the risks of shipwreck in order to evade its provisions.

Mr. WATSON.—That statement is on a par with the general statement that has been made about the six potters.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They do not like it.

Mr. WATSON.—We do not like to hear lies about the six potters.

Mr. CONROY.—Is not the honorable member for Bland aware that the company was asked to take care that these shipwrecked sailors were not allowed to remain in Australia. His silence gives consent. A more monstrous stretching of the law was never made. It was absolutely inhuman and disgraceful, and the work of the Administration in that respect was beneath contempt. I will go further, and say that when the Administration interfered under that very Act in order that half-a-dozen hatters should be blocked from landing for a time, it is no wonder that, considering that practically the same Administration holds office to-day, we should feel compelled to refer to the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member is one of those who decry the country. He is one of the party that I referred to in my Budget speech.

Mr. CONROY.—I am stating what was absolutely done. I should like to know why some of the very men who persist in retaining this legislation on the Commonwealth statute-book—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did not the honorable and learned member try to get it repealed when his party was in office?

Mr. CONROY.—I was not in power; and if my voice had been of any influence, I should have urged that this was one of the matters upon which it was absolutely necessary to legislate. I would sooner have gone down on this question than on anything else. I do not understand this warmth on the part of the members of the caucus party as to the effects of their own legislation. Why do they not get up to speak upon the Budget? Here is a great matter affecting the policy of the country, and they are so full of their own sense of want of knowledge that we have not heard a single word of criticism from them about it. They might be the most ignorant men alive, judging from the attitude they have taken up—

Mr. WILKS.—There is no "might" about it.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member must withdraw that.

Mr. WILKS.—Withdraw what?

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa said that certain members of this House "might" be the most ignorant men in the world, and the honorable member for Dalley said there is no "might" about it. He must withdraw that remark.

Mr. WILKS.—I want to know why the word "might" is considered disorderly?

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask the honorable member to withdraw the remark.

Mr. WILKS.—I will not. I have said nothing that is disorderly. I cannot see that the word "might" is unparliamentary.

The CHAIRMAN.—I point out to the honorable member that in the Standing Orders at page 11 it is provided that order in debate shall be maintained; and it is also provided that when an honorable member is asked by Mr. Speaker or by the Chairman to withdraw any statement, he shall do so. I consider that the honorable member for Dalley made a statement regarding honorable members of this House which reflects upon them, and I ask him to be good enough to withdraw it.

Mr. WILKS.—I did not say anything about the members of this House. I simply used the word "might."

The CHAIRMAN.—The word, in the connexion in which the honorable member used it, was, in my opinion, a reflection upon honorable members; and I ask him, as an old member of this House, with experience in a State Parliament, to obey the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. WILKS.—Since you, sir, have made such an appeal to me, I withdraw the remark, but I think we are becoming most supersensitive.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to order. Do I understand that you rule—

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member must not discuss my ruling.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Most certainly I can.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa will proceed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—May I not dissent from a ruling? It is monstrous.

Mr. CONROY.—Judging from the silence of the members of the caucus party, they might be absolutely ignorant—

Mr. WILKS.—Is the honorable member in order in using the word "might"? I have been placed in the ignominious position of being ruled out of order. Is the honorable member in order in using a word which you have ruled to be unparliamentary? I want to have a fair deal in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN.—In the connexion in which the honorable and learned member for Werriwa used the word, it is perfectly in order.

Mr. CONROY.—The members of the caucus party could, I say, be regarded as absolutely ignorant of all questions relating even to simple arithmetic, such as that two and two make four, judging from their silence. Perhaps the mass of the figures, which run in millions, perplexes them.

Mr. WATSON.—No; what about the speech of the honorable member for Darwin?

Mr. CONROY.—Of course, now that the honorable member for Darwin has been recognised as the financial authority of the caucus party—

Mr. WATSON.—One at a time; we cannot produce all our authorities at once.

Mr. CONROY.—I confess that I listened with interest to the eloquent and touching part of his speech, when the honorable member referred to the meagre allowance made to him as a member of Parliament; but I did not altogether follow him in his financial statement. There was a part of it of which I thoroughly approve, and should like to try the experiment for myself. I refer to the passage in which he pointed out that borrowing money at 3 per cent., and lending it out at 7 per cent., would be a source of income. But he failed to point out, first, how we are to secure £6,000,000 at 3 per cent., and, secondly, how we are to lend out the money at 7 per cent. Probably it was my own fault that I failed to understand how the operation could be accomplished; and while I give up any idea of putting the honorable member's proposal into operation so far as millions are concerned. I should be very glad to avail myself of it in thousands, or even in hundreds, of pounds, if the honorable member were willing to advance the cash. All that it is necessary to do, it appears, in order to become rich, is to be furnished with a printing press and a bundle of old rags made up into good paper—

Mr. WATSON.—That is nearly as good as the borrowing policy of the free-trade party in New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member say that a policy of waste is a good thing for a country?

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member say that the borrowing policy was not a policy of waste?

Mr. CONROY.—I wish I could say that I think the waste has been confined to one party, but it has been common to all parties. In the past, we have found those parties more inclined to economy who were on the side of free-trade, partly, I am afraid, from the simple fact that they were not able to obtain revenue to throw away.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Does the honorable and learned member think that an Australian building in London would be a waste of money?

Mr. CONROY.—I presume that when a High Commissioner is appointed for the Commonwealth we shall have to find offices, and perhaps a residence for him. I see no provision in the Estimates for any such expenditure. I shall, however, wait to debate that matter until the Bill for the appointment of the High Commissioner is before us. There are two other Bills before us to which I may refer. The first is the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, and when I see that the Treasurer has made no provision whatever for the payment of bonuses under that Bill, it is clear that the right honorable gentleman does not expect that its provisions will be immediately brought into operation. I believe that in that view the Treasurer is perfectly correct.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When you have a statutory provision, you do not require to repeat it on the Estimates.

Mr. CONROY.—But any expenditure under that measure must be provided for on the Estimates. If we are to accept Coghlan's figures, as soon as we begin to pay interest on the transferred properties, the whole of the revenue at the command of the Commonwealth Government will be absolutely swallowed up, and there will be none left for any of these administrative purposes. I have no hesitation in informing the people of Australia, so far as I can, that it is manifest that direct taxation will have to be resorted to unless a spirit of economy is allowed to influence Commonwealth expenditure. I admit that some of the expenditure which must be met by the Commonwealth arises from the natural growth of population, and to that extent it has been quite unavoidable. But there are directions in which economy might be practised. It is so perfectly clear to me that our expenditure has already exceeded the revenue which we can properly claim, that when the Manufactures Encouragement Bill comes before us again I shall feel bound to move that none of the bonuses provided for under that measure shall be paid until the requisite sum has been raised by direct taxation. Then, with regard to the Commerce Bill, we are embarking on a rather dangerous course of legislation in that connexion. I point out that the cost of administration of that measure will be considerable, if it is to be administered in the way which has been suggested. When good wheat is worth 3s. 6d. per bushel, I cannot see why we should prevent persons from exporting inferior wheat if they can get 2s. per bushel for it elsewhere.

Mr. WATSON.—Has any one proposed to prevent them?

Mr. CHANTER.—What objection can there be to branding it as inferior wheat?

Mr. CONROY.—It does not appear to me that there is any necessity to brand it at all. We have only to let it go. I should have no objection to a refusal to put the Government brand on it.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order. The honorable and learned member must not discuss the details of that Bill.

Mr. CONROY.—I point out that as we are at present advised the cost of the administration of that measure would be so great that the Treasurer is bound to show where the money necessary for the purpose is to come from.

Mr. WATSON.—I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether it is in order to have a second reading debate on the Commerce Bill, the second reading of which has already been debated, or whether it is in order to refer in detail to any measures which have been before the House, and which are still under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN.—I called the honorable and learned member for Werriwa to order, and I understood that he was proposing to obey my direction. It is not in order for any honorable member to anticipate a debate set down for a particular day; nor is it in order for him to refer to the details of measures that are not before the Committee.

Mr. CONROY.—I thoroughly understand the ruling, and considering that my references to these measures did not occupy more than about a minute, the honorable member for Bland would appear to be extremely sensitive on the subject. I always understood that the reason the caucus party would not accept any portfolio this time was because they were conscious that they had failed so lamentably, that they did not intend to expose themselves to the ridicule of the public on a second occasion.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member is not in order.

Mr. CONROY.—I think I am entitled to discuss such questions in dealing with the Budget statement. After all, if Ministers can expect little consideration for their statements or their works, from honorable members on this side of the House, they have, at least, the gratitude and support of honorable members in the caucus corner. The Ministry have undertaken work which the twenty-eight members of the Labour Party find themselves unable to do, although the supporters of the Ministry number only eighteen honorable members. A more miserable confession of incompetence was never made by any political party in the world. Although some of the Labour Party have had previous experience in office, they confess that they cannot find amongst themselves men capable of drafting, or even understanding, a single measure to submit to the House.

Mr. WATSON.—This is another sample of opposition argument!

Mr. CONROY.—Will the honorable member for Bland explain how it was that his party of twenty-eight honorable members gave way to a party of eighteen?

Mr. WATSON.—It is no use making an explanation to a member of the density of the honorable and learned member for Werriwa.

Mr. CONROY.—Why should the Labour Party have stepped aside, except on the ground that they are incompetent? Although the measures that have been introduced have involved much litigation in the past, and will, probably, involve much litigation in the future, there is no provision made in the Estimates for the appointment of additional Judges. I was distinctly opposed to the Judiciary Bill, for the reason that in my opinion the law courts, as they then existed, were able to cope with all the business. But Parliament thought otherwise, and, that being so, I was prepared to agree to the appointment of five Judges, because I was firmly convinced that three would prove insufficient. As a matter of fact, when we were considering the clauses giving the High Court original jurisdiction, clauses against which I voted, because of the extra Judges bound to be required, I expressed the opinion that there would be required at least seven Judges to start with; and now it is plain, from the number of cases set down in New South Wales and Victoria, that additional Judges are absolutely requisite if delays in appeals are not to be so great as to create the chaotic state of the American Court.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Does the honorable and learned member not think that the High Court has justified its existence?

Mr. CONROY.—I am not discussing that question. What we have to consider is whether there are sufficient Judges, and I unhesitatingly say there are not. It is far better that a Judge should be idle than that a suitor should be delayed in justice for even a single day. The Ministry will have to take this matter seriously into consideration, because, in my opinion, it is one which calls for legislation, even this session. If the number of Judges was increased immediately, some time must elapse before the enlarged bench could get to work. We ought to appoint at least two additional Judges, though I am doubtful whether that would prove enough. As a rule, it is not popular to insist on the appointment of Judges. People have regard to the salaries which have to be paid, but not to the fact that if the salaries are not paid, the best men cannot be obtained for the position. At the present moment delay is taking place in the hearing of appeals, and the Government, in declining or omitting to provide additional Judges, are not placing the High Court in the position it ought to occupy. We have to bear the consequences of our legislation, and if we do not appoint additional Judges to interpret the law, and bring it, as it were, up-to-date, a still more serious state of affairs will arise. It ought to be the duty of every Parliament to see that there is a sufficient number of Judges, whether in the major or minor courts, to insure that there shall be no delay, which, as every one with a knowledge of the law is aware, is the chief cause of expense. Another matter with which we are called upon to deal is that of preferential trade. Free-traders throughout Australia could not but welcome an extension of trade with the mother country if it means a removal of the duty. Such an extension would mean the market in that part of the Empire, if nothing more; and when the Prime Minister says at one moment that he is in favour of preferential trade, and the next moment declares for fiscal peace, a situation is created that would puzzle the proverbial Dutchman. I do not understand his statements at all. If peace means anything, it means rest from conflict; and when the honorable and learned member spoke of fiscal peace he certainly meant a rest from fiscal disturbance. But that could not be the case if we were to have preferential trade. I have never understood that a law was requisite to induce any man to indulge in preferential trade, when the preference was on his side. Nor is it necessary even now. It is the veriest humbug to pretend that a law is required to give effect to preferential trade when the preference is in our favour. Trade is only carried on now when it is in favour of the trader. If preference means anything, I suppose it means giving an advantage to one over another. We shall always take the advantage when it is on our side. Our efforts are invariably devoted towards seeing how we can get the preference in trade. If Mr. Chamberlain, who I believe is largely interested in a screw combine, would sell his screws to me 5 per cent. more cheaply than to a foreigner on the Continent, he would give me a practical proof of his belief in preferential trade, of which I should only too gladly avail myself. It is true that at the next moment I might sell the goods to the foreigner, if he was willing to buy them. But what have we in Australia to offer in return? If, of course, we could get as an exclusive market for our goods the 40,000,000 persons in Great Britain, no doubt every one of us would welcome it. One does not need to be a free-trader or a protectionist to see the big advantage it would give us. But does any one honestly think that there would be such a general dementia amongst the people of England that they would be willing, in order to get 5 per cent. of their trade, to give up 90 per cent.?

Mr. WILKS. — In England the genuine Labour Party are against preferential trade.

Mr. CONROY.—Mr. Chamberlain's first attempts at regulating trade have proved so disastrous that, as I explained earlier in the evening, they drove between 17,000 and 18,000 out of employment in one trade, and nearly ruined the whole employment in another trade affecting 200,000 employes.

I can quite conceive that, under these circumstances, men who have had any knowledge of his efforts in the past are not likely to attach much credence to his opinions in the future. If the Prime Minister really believes in this doctrine, he need not go to England to indulge in it, because, as a farmer, I shall always be ready to exchange dry cows for milch cows, or lean porkers for fat porkers. I do not mind carrying on that system of preferential trade as long and as often as he is willing to indulge me.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let the Treasurer show by his figures that the trade is following the flag.

Mr. CONROY.—We are all aware that, to a very large extent, trade does follow the flag, without any forcing. It is quite a natural growth, because men will rather trade with those with whom they have been accustomed to trade, and in whom they have confidence, than with men who are further away. So far from foreign trade being less beneficial to a country than other trade, it is sometimes the most profitable of all. If it were not for the extra profit to be derived therefrom men would not indulge in the foreign trade.

Mr. WILKS.—What does the honorable and learned member think about the contribution to the Navy?

Mr. CONROY.—I do not like to dwell very much on the question of defence. I view with a considerable amount of dismay the very great tendency there is to increase our military vote. In view of some of our actions, and the great unwisdom, and certainly the great arrogance, with which we try to dictate to other nations what is to be done, millions would not be too much to be spent on defence. But the question, so far as the great mass of the people is concerned, is, Would it not be far better to give up talking in an arrogant, unstatesman-like way, and try to follow the paths which lead to peace? Then there would be no need for us to attempt to make the military display we seem bent upon doing. We must remember that the Commonwealth is asked to contribute £1,021,000 this year. If we do not mind, we shall be paying too high a price for our insurance. The tax which the people are to be called upon to pay is far too high, and there is always a tendency on the part of military men to stretch the expenditure. I happen to be one of those who have never had a very great regard for the military spirit in men.

Mr. WEBSTER.—And yet the honorable and learned member is said to possess the martial spirit.

Mr. CONROY.—I have always thought that it is a very inferior spirit. In the military service we sometimes meet with some very good men, but as a rule we cannot expect the best men to take to that life, because it does not lead to anything. Their greatest hope is to die gloriously. When a man has that particular bent of mind that he hopes to die gloriously, he cannot be expected to pay that attention to mundane affairs which he ought to do. Therefore, we cannot expect our best brained men to take to a military life. When so many other avenues of employment are open, it would be ridiculous to expect men to do so; and even if they were very brainy men, and possessed the martial spirit to a certain extent, they would recognise that it could not lead to anything. Because, so far as Australia is concerned, there is little or no hope of advancement. Therefore, as a rule, the advice we get from military men is not likely to be very sound. All the improvements which have been made in munition and armament have almost, without exception, been due to civilians, and not to soldiers. If I wished to make an indictment against military men as a rule, I could not make a stronger one than that, because to my mind it absolutely disposes of all belief in their ideas. We cannot expect from men who have not been able to introduce any of the great improvements which have been made in munitions or armament any really sound advice on matters like this. They, no doubt, possess a blind, dogged resoluteness which covers a multitude of sins; but I hold that the man whose only virtue is that he is willing to let himself be shot down is not the best citizen, and that those who wish to see the military system perpetuated are not the best advisers for the country. We should be very careful before accepting counsel from them. I would remind the Committee that much of the money spent on defence is, after all, merely money thrown away, and if the annual expenditure in this direction is to be very large our taxation will be so seriously increased that the poverty which it will create will cause the death of more persons than would be killed by half-a-dozen years of protracted warfare. It is true that they would not be killed outright, and their deaths would therefore not excite so much sympathy as is occasioned by deaths on the field of battle, but the sum total of misery would be greater. We should consider this question from the point of view of the masses, who have to pay the taxes which we impose. £1,000,000 a year would furnish employment for 10,000 men at £100 each, and if the money was spent in inducing population to settle here, or in ways that would give us a fuller measure of prosperity, the community would soon be in a better position to resist aggression than it will be in by the adoption of the proposed system of defence. I admit that provision must be made for rifle corps, and it is perfectly clear that artillerymen and engineers cannot be trained in a single day, while untrained men cannot be expected to do what trained men can do. But as the honorable member for Wentworth has pointed out, is it not clear that our first line of defence is the Navy of Great Britain? While it remains intact it is impossible for our land defences to be called on. Probably £200,000 or £300,000 could be saved in our defence expenditure. We should not embark on an extravagant outlay, which will result in the fostering of a spirit of militarism which cannot benefit the community. A few hundred men armed with rifles could prevent the landing of any naval force, and, if experience has proved anything, it is that troops cannot be landed except at a safe place. Half-a-dozen torpedoes would prevent vessels from entering Sydney Harbor. It is true that the city might be damaged by shell fire, but the damage so done would not be equal to the loss occasioned to the community by excessive taxation, because by taxing production we hamper industry. The Commonwealth has increased the amount raised from Customs and Excise duties from £7,000,000 to £9,000,000, and still more is paid by the people than goes into the Treasury. Is it any wonder, then, that our progress has not been what might have been expected? However, good seasons are apparently setting in again, and if they come Australia will go ahead, despite the hindrances to industry imposed by her Legislatures.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I should like to refer to the remarks which have been made by certain speakers which seem to propose the establishing of a new industry. We have heard nothing to justify the assertion that borrowing is to be a new industry, though the honorable and learned member for Corinella seemed to favour borrowing, in order to put our defences on a proper and efficient footing. But whilst there has been no general statement in favour of borrowing, the desirability of that course has been suggested, and we may infer that loans will be raised when we come to deal a little more directly with the States debt question. The Queensland Government have devised means by which they can obtain money without any expense to the taxpayers, and make use of it in much the same manner as if it were actually borrowed. In connexion with the Treasury, they have a Department in which a large amount of money has accumulated, and they have recently devoted £400,000 of these funds to the purchase of their own debentures.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Is that in connexion with the Treasury note issue?

Mr. CULPIN.—Yes. The Queensland Government have £800,000 which has for some time been lying idle, but they are now making use of it from time to time. If the Treasurer of the Commonwealth could devise some similar scheme, we should not require to consider the question of borrowing money in the London market. The honorable member for Dalley interjected whilst I was speaking upon a subject allied to the topic I am now discussing, "More shin plasters." The honorable member had been "stone-walling" for some time prior to the period at which he made his interjection, and, as his condition must have been very painful, probably the application of a few shin plasters would have done him good. The Queensland Government are to be congratulated upon having carried out the scheme to which I have referred, and I should be glad to see the Commonwealth adopt some similar means of raising the money necessary to meet our immediate requirements.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does not that amount to borrowing money?

Mr. CULPIN.—No. If people come to you, and offer you money in exchange for a piece of paper, it is only reasonable that you should accept it. That is the course pursued in Queensland. I hope the Treasurer will give the matter his most serious consideration. I thoroughly approve of the proposal to extend the sugar bonus for a further period of five years. The statement made by the Treasurer upon that subject was one of the most gratifying that could greet the ears of the representatives of Queensland. I believe, if the bonus is continued, the sugar industry will become more prosperous than ever, and that the production will increase to proportions hitherto unknown. I shall strongly oppose any proposal on the part of the Commonwealth to borrow money, and I believe that the members of the party to which I belong will view it with equal disfavour. I trust that the improvements in the Defence Department will be of such a nature that we shall obtain something good in the way of defence. At the same time, I hope that the necessary funds will be obtainable without resort to borrowing.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I feel that I ought to offer my congratulations to the Government upon their new departure to-night. It is only a very small one, but it promises more as it grows, I presume. I hope that we shall benefit by the wealth of wisdom to which we have listened during the past few minutes.

Mr. WATSON. — During the past few hours.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I venture to say that a series of speeches have been delivered from this side of the House to-night which will well repay anybody's perusal in Hansard.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh, oh.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Honorable members may laugh, but I venture to think that it is a vacant laugh. At any rate, we had a deliverance upon defence questions to-night such as we have not listened to heretofore. For the first time we begin to understand what defence matters really mean. We have had a speech from the Treasurer, supplemented by no statement from any other Minister, and therefore we have heard no deliverance of policy concerning any of the supreme matters which are engaging the attention of Australia at the present moment. Who knows anything about defence matters from anything which the Government have made known to the Committee during the course of this debate? Who can say that we have learnt anything in reference to the transfer of the States debts from any statement which has been made by the Ministry during the Budget discussion? Upon the other hand, speeches have been delivered from this side of the Chamber which merit a statement from the Government, both in regard to their defence policy and the question of taking over the States debts. Yet this silence is apparently what the country is to be treated to, because those speeches have been delivered. I admit that during the past few weeks it has become almost a crime in this House to speak at all. It seems to me that the way in which business is to be done now is by means of a Star Chamber. I think it is about time that we entered some protest against the manner in which business is being conducted in this House, and against the scandalous way in which honorable members are neglecting their duties.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Against the scandalous way in which the honorable member is behaving.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is time that we protested against the way in which members of the Labour Party are constantly absent from the House. No doubt they are doing their business away somewhere out of sight—issuing their instructions to the Government in much the same fashion as the Czar issues his ukase to the people throughout the length and breadth of his dominions. Parliamentary government seems to be on the decline absolutely. And we are now told that we are obstructing business, and “stone-walling.”

Mr. WEBSTER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That interjection comes very aptly from an honorable member who used to drivel here for five hours at a stretch.

Mr. WEBSTER. — I know nothing about the game of “stone-walling,” and I admit it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I venture to say that there has been nothing but legitimate debate during the whole of this evening. A set of informing speeches has been delivered, for which the House and the country will be the better. At any rate, they have been a valuable contribution to the solution of those great problems which are now causing deep anxiety throughout the length and breadth of Australia. I congratulate the Government upon having begun this penalizing process.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I must say that the indignation of the honorable member who has just resumed his seat is extremely amusing to most of us who have any memory of what has occurred in the House during the past week or so. I say that since the House met, after the Ministry assumed office, we have had nothing but obstruction and stone-walling on the part of honorable members on the Opposition side of the Chamber.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member might as well make that false statement as any other.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I must ask the honorable member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I withdraw it, and I will say that the statement of the honorable member is absolutely inaccurate.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member seek to impose upon those who are here the impression that a number of the speeches delivered from the Opposition side of the House have been anything but in the nature of stone-walling tactics? Has there been the slightest appearance of earnestness on the part of the greater number of those who have spoken? Has there been anything but a deliberate attempt to stop the transaction of business, and to prevent this House and the Government from getting any credit for doing what we are here to do?

Mr. CONROY.—That statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Will the honorable and learned member withdraw that statement?

Mr. CONROY.—I suppose I must; but the honorable member for Bland should not make statements of that character.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honorable member for Bland in order in charging members of the Opposition with deliberately obstructing the transaction of business?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member holds the opinion attributed to him, I think he was perfectly in order in expressing it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do I understand you to rule that an honorable member may charge other honorable members with deliberately obstructing the progress of business?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Parramatta must remember the speech which he has just delivered. He made certain remarks, to which any other honorable member is fully entitled to reply; and it seems to me that the only possible way in which one could reply to them was either by admitting the charges which he made, or by contradicting them. The honorable member for Bland is contradicting them, in terms as parliamentary as he can possibly employ under the circumstances. He would not be in order in making the remark attributed to him, if it were not for the charges made by the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think that you should reflect upon my remarks in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am not reflecting upon the honorable member's remarks. They were in order, otherwise I should have called his attention to the fact. But there are only two ways in which his speech can be replied to, namely, either by admitting the charges made, or by contradicting them. The honorable member for Bland has contradicted them.

Mr. WATSON.—Honorable members profess to be highly indignant at being charged with having adopted stone-walling tactics. I was not here last week, but I am free to stay away as I please when I do not wish to listen to the uninteresting drivel that proceeds from the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is a good judge of drivel.

Mr. WATSON.—I profess to be able to judge that which comes from the honorable member.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member will not gain anything by bullying.

Mr. WATSON.—I shall not submit to bullying on the part of the honorable member.

Mr. WILKS.—We shall see about that.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member will find that I am not to be bullied by himself or the deputy leader of the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why cannot the honorable member allow the Government to reply?

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member saw fit to attack the party of which I am a member, and now his sense of fair play is such that he objects to my offering a reply?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why should the honorable member rush in?

Mr. WATSON.—Why did the honorable member drag me into the discussion? As the honorable member persisted in referring to the Labour Party, I surely had a right to reply. Apart altogether from the position of the Government, every honorable member has an interest in seeing the business of the country conducted with sufficient expedition to insure the passing of at least some legislation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has never shown anything of the kind.

Mr. WATSON.—As one of those who supported a State Government of which the honorable member for Parramatta was a member, I often remained in the Chamber till the small hours of the morning to assist in keeping a quorum to enable business to be transacted.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let us come back to the position of affairs last session.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member cannot point to any obstruction on my part. I have the statement of one whose word he must accept—the statement of the leader of the Opposition—that he never received fairer treatment from an Opposition than that which my party had afforded him while he was in office.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not believe it.

Mr. WATSON.—I regret that the honorable member should be in such a frame of mind that he cannot believe—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I simply mean to say that I think the honorable member is mistaken.

Mr. WATSON.—I repeat that the statement in question was made in the House by the right honorable member for East Sydney, and was repeated by him a few minutes later in another place. The honorable member may satisfy himself on that point at another time. The week before last there was distinct obstruction and stone-walling on the part of the Opposition.

Mr. KELLY.—By whom?

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Wentworth was one who was guilty of these tactics.

Mr. KELLY.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honorable member in order, Mr. Speaker, in saying that I stone-walled any measure? I have given no cause for such a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There can be no doubt at all that the use of strong language on either side does not conduce to the conduct of the debate on proper lines, but rather tends to embitter the feelings of honorable members. At the same time, I have ruled, and still rule, that the honorable member for Bland is not out of order in making these remarks.

Mr. KELLY.—It only means that it will be necessary for me to reply.

Mr. WATSON.—I repeat that the remarks made by several honorable members on Thursday week and Friday week were palpably with the object of filling in time. Several of the speeches to which we have just listened have been of a similar kind.

Mr. WILKS.—On the Budget?

Mr. WATSON.—No. I can take no special exception to the speeches to which we have listened to-day; but can any one say that the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Werriwa were made with an earnest desire to advance the discussion?

Mr. CONROY.—I should hope they were.

Mr. WATSON.—If that was their object they failed lamentably.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is a matter of opinion. It was a better speech than the honorable member could have made.

Mr. WATSON.—I have never pretended to be able to make a speech, so that I am not hurt by the honorable member's suggestion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the honorable member thinks he is able to criticise one.

Mr. WATSON.—I have sufficient experience of parliamentary procedure to be able at least to recognise when an honorable member is addressing himself to the subject at issue, and when he is simply filling in time. The object of the Opposition has been palpable to every sensible man in the House.

Mr. LONSDALE.—When the Labour Party were in Opposition, was there nothing palpable?

Mr. WATSON.—On one or two occasions there was something in the nature of stone-walling.

Mr. LONSDALE.—There was far more stone-walling than has been indulged in by the present Opposition.

Mr. WILKS.—What about the five hours' speech made by the honorable member for Darling?

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Darling and one or two others confess that they are mere infants in the art of stone-walling as compared with the honorable member for Dalley and others who glory in the assertion that they can talk for hours without really saying anything.

Mr. KELLY.—No one has ever made such long speeches as the honorable member for Darling and one or two others have done.

Mr. WATSON.—The air was full of complaints as to the time occupied by the honorable member for Darling and one or two others in making speeches of the kind to which I have referred. The honorable member for Parramatta has alluded to the absence of the members of the Labour Party from the Chamber. It might have been as well for him, first of all, to account for the absence of the Opposition. Honorable members of the Opposition profess to have such an intense regard for the business of the country that it cannot be transacted in their absence, and yet, with the exception perhaps of three or four of their number, they are nearly always absent.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member has just been complaining that we are too much in evidence.

Mr. WATSON.—I say that we could probably do with the absence of a few more to the satisfaction of the country, but it is surely an extraordinary complaint on the part of those who are almost always absent that others are occasionally away from the Chamber. I do not regard myself as under any obligation to remain here and listen to speeches which are purely of an obstructive character. So far as the speech made by the honorable member for Corinella was concerned, I may say that I listened to a great portion of it with much pleasure. It was a speech addressed to the subject under discussion, and one to which no one could listen—even if one did not wholly agree with the conclusions expressed—without being extremely interested. I for one should be glad indeed to give every attention to any other speech of that character.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No stone-walling took place last week on the Manufactures Encouragement Bill.

Mr. WATSON.—I was not here last week, but, judging from what I have read in Hansard, I am inclined to believe that the tactics adopted on a prior occasion were not departed from in the slightest degree.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable member should ask the Prime Minister.

Mr. WATSON.—Another statement is that the speeches made by the Opposition call for replies.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I did not say that.

Mr. WATSON.—We are frequently told by the Opposition that there is a conspiracy of silence on the other side of the House. I have a fairly clear recollection of what occurred when last year's Estimates were under discussion, but I do not remember that the late Government replied to every statement of the Opposition. I do not remember even the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who was then Minister of Defence, saying one word about the policy of the Government, nor can I recollect any member of the Government discussing any matter of policy which the Treasurer had put forward in his Budget statement. Now, the honorable member for Parramatta is consumed with anxiety to learn what is the Government policy on every imaginable subject. When the late Government was in office, however, he was as quiet as a dumb driven sheep.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member forget the amendment on the Estimates which was submitted by the honorable and learned member for Indi, who was a member of the alliance?

Mr. WATSON.—That has nothing to do with the attitude of the honorable member. He is now complaining that he can obtain no indication of the Government policy, although twelve months ago he was quite satisfied that the Government of which he was a supporter should make no such communication to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is making an incorrect statement.

Mr. WATSON.—I see no evidence of that. I should like the honorable member to show in what respect my statement is incorrect.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I assert that nearly all the members of the late Government spoke when last year's Estimates were under consideration.

Mr. WATSON.—Hansard does not show that they did.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It does. The honorable member is mistaken.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member for Bland is "belling the cat" for the Government.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member is experienced in matters of that kind.

Mr. WILKS.—Even if the honorable member is prepared to stand godfather to the Government, there is no reason why he should act as stepmother to the rest of the House.

Mr. WATSON.—I am concerned, not with the disorderly interjections of an honorable member who is noted for his facility in "stone-walling," but with those of the deputy leader of the Opposition, who has deliberately accused the Labour Party of neglect of duty in remaining away from the House. As far as possible, I shall be always prepared to assist in keeping a quorum.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The point of my criticism is that the Labour Party remain out of the Chamber most of the day, and then come in and try to make us sit after the usual hour for adjourning.

Mr. WATSON.—It seems to me that if honorable members go beyond what is reasonable criticism and discussion, with a view of arriving at the best results, we should be prepared to take steps to arrive at a proper conclusion. I am prepared, for one, to do all that is practicable to that end; and I trust that a majority of honorable members will do the same, so that we may bring about such a result that at the end of the session we shall have something to show to the country as a consequence of our sitting so long.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I regret to hear the remarks of the honorable member for Bland. I have never heard him deliver such a statement as he has made to-night. I am sorry that his nervous system has broken down, and I impute it entirely to excessive train travelling. Let us test the statement he has made. This is the second night of the Budget debate, and although something like a dozen members of the Opposition have spoken, no reply has been made on the part of the Government. The honorable member spoke of my speech of two hours as being in the nature of "stone-walling." When I wish to "stone-wall," especially on a Budget, not two hours, but rather twenty, would be a fair allowance for me. I am very sorry that the honorable member for Bland should have departed from that usual good temper and affability that he displays, and should have made such strong accusations.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I have never heard a man in parliamentary life play the scold as the honorable member for Bland has just done. What is the true position of affairs? During the last two nights ten members, belonging to the various parties, have spoken in Committee on the Budget statement. To-night the debate was commenced by the honorable member for Darwin, a strong supporter of the honorable member for Bland. He spoke for an hour and a half. Does the honorable member call that stone-walling? The honorable member for Darwin was followed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, whose speech on defence no honorable member who heard it would characterize as a stone-wall. Was the honorable and learned member for Wannon stone-walling, when dealing with the States debts question? Even the Prime Minister would not cavil at his speech. So that apparently the honorable member for Bland levels all his charges at the honorable member for Werriwa; but he was followed by the honorable member for Brisbane, who dealt again with a subject on which he has only recently made a long speech.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Brisbane spoke for only ten minutes.

Mr. WILKS.—Of course, the honorable member for Bland has nothing to say against one of his own supporters. Last night the first speaker was the honorable member for South Sydney, who occupied time mainly in dealing with the sugar bounty question, but was he stone-walling?

Mr. WATSON.—I have not said so.

Mr. WILKS.—Is the honorable and learned member for Angas, who followed him, ever guilty of obstructive tactics? He dealt seriously with some very important questions. I will say nothing of the speech of the honorable member for Lang, lest I offend the honorable member for Bland; but in making it the honorable member was only doing what he believed to be his duty to his constituents, and to the State which he represents. The next speaker was a Government supporter, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and an ex-Minister of the Labour Government, who advocated the abolition of the Braddon provision. Was he stone-walling? Then followed the honorable member for Wentworth on defence. I can understand now who are inspiring the paragraphs which have appeared in the newspapers this week and last week.

Mr. KENNEDY.—May I direct attention to the need for a quorum?

A quorum not being present,

Mr. Speaker adjourned the House at 11:41 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 31 August, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

MAIL CONTRACT: ORIENT COMPANY.

Senator STEWART.—I wish to ask Senator Keating, without notice, when we are likely to get a copy of the mail contract entered into between the Orient Steam Navigation Company and the Government of the Commonwealth?

Senator KEATING.—As soon as possible.

Senator STEWART.—I think it has been laid upon the table of the other House.

Senator KEATING.—The honorable senator will get a copy as soon as possible.

LAND AT LARGS BAY.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is Senator Keating in a position, to state to the Senate the particulars of the claims being litigated in the High Court as to compensation for land at Largs Bay?

Senator KEATING.—I have been furnished with the following particulars:—

Messrs. Hackett and Crawford's claim.—Land acquired by notification in Gazette, 9th January, 1904; area,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  acres; claim, £254 for value of land, and compensation under section 19 (1) (b) of the Property Acquisition Act, for damage caused to adjoining land by acquisition thereof for a fort; writ issued in May last, claiming £254; appearance has been entered; proceedings are at present in abeyance pending consideration by the Department of an offer made by the claimants with a view to settlement by the acquisition of the whole block belonging to the claimants, and valuations are now being obtained by the Department.

Messrs. Gilbert and Stirling's claim.—Land acquired by notification in Gazette, 9th January, 1904; area, 1 acre 2 roods 20 perches; claim, £177 10s. for valuation of land and compensation under section 19 (1) (b) of the Property Acquisition Act for damage caused to adjoining land by acquisition thereof for a fort; writ issued in May last, claiming £177 10s.; appearance has been entered; proceedings are at present in abeyance pending consideration of an offer to accept a reduced amount and costs, further valuations being obtained with a view of considering the purchase of the whole block.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Senator MATHESON.—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether he cannot see his way to originate some measures here next week?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am very glad to find that the honorable senator is so anxious to proceed to work, but I am not in a position at the present time to promise any other measures. We are waiting upon another branch of the Legislature.

Later,

Senator MATHESON.—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether his attention has been called to a statement in the Age that a Bill to amend the Naval Agreement Act will be introduced, and, if so, whether he could not introduce that measure next week?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I informed the Senate some time ago that the British authorities were going to supply the Commonwealth with vessels more modern and more effective than those supplied under the present agreement, but I have heard no more on the subject.

Senator MATHESON.—There is no Bill, then?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Bill will come on in due course, but I have heard nothing more on the subject.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But is it not doubtful whether a Bill is necessary?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think it is necessary, because an alteration of the present agreement is proposed.

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS ON OCEAN STEAMERS.

Senator MILLEN.—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, a question arising out of a statement he made in the policy debate with regard to a notice posted on the Peninsular and Oriental Company's boats, and to which I drew his attention. He then promised that he would make further inquiries, and communicate with me later on. I desire to ask whether he has done so, and, if so, what he has learned?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I asked that information should be given to me on the subject, but it has not yet been supplied, and therefore I cannot answer the question. I shall make further inquiry, and furnish an answer as expeditiously as I can.

HIGH COURT EXPENSES.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I rise to ask Senator Keating to lay upon the table the Order in Council of the present Government, fixing the maximum daily rate of travelling allowance for the Justices of the High Court, if it has not already been produced?

Senator KEATING.—I understand that it is included in the papers relating to the High Court, which have been tabled, and are now with the printer.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—Before the business of the day is called on, I wish to make a statement. We have no work set down on the notice-paper for to-morrow, and, therefore, we shall have to adjourn over that day. The question then arises whether we should not adjourn over next week. The Government has business to submit; but I am doubtful, as I was last week, whether we should be able to occupy the attention of honorable senators for the whole of next week if they should agree to meet. I do not like to bring honorable senators from New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania, unless we have work to occupy their time, on account of the expense to which they are necessarily put.

Senator GIVENS.—What about Queensland?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Under existing circumstances the representatives of Queensland might give way.

Senator STEWART.—We are always giving way.

Senator PLAYFORD.—To test the feeling of honorable senators I move—

That the Senate, at its rising, adjourn until next Wednesday week.

If any honorable senator objects to this proposal, the omission of the word "week" can be moved.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Adjourn for a fortnight!

Senator PLAYFORD.—No. I believe I shall have plenty of work to fully occupy the time of honorable senators if we adjourn for only a week.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I move—

That the word "week" be left out.

I object to the proposed adjournment as a protest against the way in which the Senate is being treated.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Hear, hear.

Senator GIVENS.—This is not peculiar to the present Government.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Oh, yes, it is.

Senator KEATING.—The last Government asked the Senate to adjourn on five occasions.

Senator GIVENS.—It has been the practice of almost every Government. Except in regard to the origination of Money Bills, the Senate enjoys equal power with the other House. As I pointed out a few days ago, there was plenty of business with which the Government could have kept us supplied. For instance, there was nothing to prevent them from originating here the Commerce Bill and the Secret Commissions Bill. Probably both measures are of a highly technical nature, and that may have been taken by the Government as an excuse for originating them in another place.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—No reason except the vanity of Ministers.

Senator GIVENS.—We have a Minister here in the person of Senator Keating, who is just as competent as any one else to explain the provisions of such measures. With all due respect, I submit that the members of the Senate are quite as capable of dealing with technical measures as are the members of the other House.

Senator MCGREGOR.—More capable.

Senator GIVENS. — I do not wish to institute any invidious comparisons; but if the Government had been animated by a sincere desire to get their business transacted, they should have adopted a course which would have kept the Senate fully occupied. If the Bills I mentioned had been introduced here, they would probably have received such a threshing out that there would not have been nearly such a large tornado of talk in another place. Of course, the members of the Ministry may think that they can flout the Senate at their own sweet will—that, as it is not the Chamber which makes or unmakes Ministries, therefore it can be treated as they please. But I take an entirely different view, as I hope honorable senators will do, because in the last resort the Senate has just as much power to make and unmake Ministries as the other House. As a matter of fact, all that the other House has, if it comes to the last resort, is the power of the purse. But the Senate possesses that power equally with the other House, because we could put up our backs and refuse to grant supply just as it could. It is time that the members of the Senate made a protest against the contemptuous way in which they have been treated by every Government.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am delighted to be able to follow in the wake of Senator Givens in regard to the sentiment he has expressed and the criticism he has very gently administered to the Government, but I cannot promise him my vote.

Senator GIVENS.—If the honorable and learned senator's sympathy does not carry his vote it is of no use, and is not wanted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Probably, when my honorable friend has heard what I am going to say he may be disposed to withdraw his amendment.

Senator GIVENS.—I have not the slightest intention of doing so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend has said that his amendment is moved as a protest against the way in which the Government are flouting the Senate and neglecting to send it work to do. I intend to support the motion for exactly the same reasons as he gave for moving his amendment. I feel with him, that we ought to record our protest, but in my opinion the best way of doing that is to adjourn, not for a week, but for a month. It has been said that other Governments have adjourned the Senate from week to week. If such a thing has occurred, I do not remember that it occurred during the term of the Government with which I was connected. But if such an inglorious departure did take place in their case, I am sure it was justified by a very strong reason, and in the next place, if it was a bad example, I am sorry to see it followed by the present Government. But I dissent strongly from what Senator Givens has said. It is not to the credit of the Government that the Senate, occupying the position it does in the government of this country, should have to adjourn at this period of the session owing to lack of business. I take this opportunity of protesting most emphatically against what I observe has been said by the Prime Minister, that the reason for sitting late in another branch of the Legislature, and for prolonging the sittings on Fridays, is the desire of the Government to send up business to the Senate. The Senate ought not to be in the position of a hanger-on to the House of Representatives. It was expected, when the Senate was constituted, that important legislation would be initiated in it; and it is not to the credit of any Government that we should be put off from day to day with Bills which, to a greater or lesser degree, are not urgent, and should have to wait upon the pleasure of another branch of the Legislature. Our occupations and interests are of just as much consequence, as are the occupations and interests of the members of another Chamber, and we should be regarded as just as efficient and prominent a branch of the Legislature as is the House of Representatives. If we are going to forego our rights in that respect, the sooner we take up that humiliating position the better. It was intended, and said at the Convention, that the Senate should be, to a large extent, if not altogether, co-ordinate in its power and importance with the House of Representatives. I think that we are whittling away that position. Not only so, but if we do not protest against such a situation, it will lead to its being perpetuated. The question is, however, what are we to do? So far as the representatives of the Government in the Senate are concerned, I do not see what else they could propose than they have done. They are not responsible. But I say emphatically that whatever the intention may be, the result is practically to flout the Senate, and to bring it down to a position of inferiority in the parliamentary government of the country.

Senator GIVENS.—If we take a strong stand we can prevent that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot prevent it simply by refusing to adjourn for a week.

Senator GIVENS.—Would the honorable and learned senator join me in supporting a motion to adjourn for a month, so as to hang up the Government's Money Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I might do so under some circumstances.

Senator GIVENS.—That is the only effective course we can take.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not wish to make a general promise of that kind, seeing that the effect of it might be to punish innocent persons. I am sure that what has been said to-day will be conveyed by my honorable friends at the table to the Government.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Hear, hear.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — I acquit them of all personal blame. What I am protesting against is the way in which the Senate has been treated from the beginning of Federation. I say, with great regret, that very often it has seemed as though Governments generally, and members in the other House, have considered that there was no such Chamber as the Senate. Throughout, we have been practically ignored. I declare now that the Senate does not occupy the position which I, as a member of the Convention, anticipated that it would hold in relation to the government of the Commonwealth. I am glad that a protest has been made, but at the same time, as there is practically no business to do, I do not see what other motion the Minister of Defence could have proposed. What is the use of bringing us back when we shall simply be like the men from Manchester, singing, "We've got no work to do." I shall vote for the motion, and if it had been proposed that we should adjourn for a fortnight I should have supported it, because I accept Senator Playford's assurance that there is no business.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is business, but not sufficient to occupy us.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — We might be employed twiddling our thumbs; but that would not be consistent with the position that the Senate ought to occupy.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I shall support Senator Givens' amendment. There appear to be some members of the Government who have a very poor opinion of the Senate, and who would like to decrease its importance. I do not say that that is the case with all Ministers, but it certainly is with some of them. It is quite possible that the lack of business is due to that mental attitude.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am sure that it is.

Senator PLAYFORD. — I should like to know who those members of the Government are.

Senator HIGGS.—It is inaccurate to say that there is no business to be done by the Senate next week.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I did not say that; I said there was business, though there was probably not sufficient to occupy us next week.

Senator HIGGS.—The Minister said that there was no business for to-morrow, but there might have been had it not been for the generosity of the Government towards the Opposition. That generosity, I think, is mistaken. The Government are confronted in the Senate with a highly intelligent and pertinacious Opposition. It is a great mistake for them to give way, as was done yesterday in regard to the Copyright Bill. Senator Symon said that, as there is no business to be done next week, we should, if we came back, merely sit twiddling our thumbs. Last night, when the Copyright Bill was before us, he asked for an adjournment for a week to consider it and the amendments that had been proposed. That contentious measure would take more than a few days, and we should do good work if we devoted next week to considering it. If the Government will take a suggestion from a supporter—and I do support this Government, and will support them while they attempt to bring in good measures—what they ought to do is—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why does the honorable senator think it necessary to give such an emphatic assurance?

Senator HIGGS.—The other day I voted against the suspension of the Standing Orders, and some honorable senators thought that it was very unkind on my part to do so. I think the Government ought to endeavour to get carried in another place a standing order similar to that which we have passed in the Senate, enabling the motion to be proposed "That the House do now divide." I also suggest to Senator Symon, who has given us some reasons why we should attempt to get on with business, that he should go to his caucus and place before its members—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have no caucus. I will come to the honorable senator's caucus if its members will let me.

Senator HIGGS.—If Senator Symon will sign the platform we shall be glad to receive him. Let him go to some members of his party, who are responsible for the delay of public business, and explain to them that the Senate desires to proceed with legislation. It must be said for Senator Symon that when he led this Chamber he did endeavour to give us plenty of work to do. I think he will also admit—in fact, he publicly stated on retiring from office—that the Senate gave him every consideration. But I do not think that the Opposition, once they find that the Government are not prepared to give way to every request, will give the present Ministry the same generous treatment as was meted out to them. These proposals to adjourn the consideration of measures like the Copyright Bill are not such as ought to come from senators who are anxious to despatch the business of the country. I trust that the Government will take up a proper attitude with regard to such requests, and will say, "We are not going to grant an adjournment for a week." Then we shall see our friends of the Opposition in their true colours. The Copyright Bill is down for Wednesday next. Honorable senators ought to be prepared to proceed with it, and if there are clauses which require further debate let them be postponed. There is also private business on the paper. I have a motion with regard to the High Commissioner, and Senator Pearce has a motion in respect of the tobacco monopoly. What is the idea of the Government in putting off the discussion regarding the High Commissioner?

Senator PLAYFORD.—That subject will be considered on a Bill which is to be introduced. The honorable senator is anticipating discussion.

Senator HIGGS.—The Bill is not on the business-paper.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It has been promised.

Senator HIGGS.—If the honorable senator will bring the Bill forward next week I will consider the question of withdrawing my motion. I trust that the Senate will reject the motion for the adjournment. Let the Government be prepared to proceed with business, and they will meet with support. They are only being supported in the belief that they are prepared to pass legislation that the country requires.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I do not think there can be any division of opinion as to the deplorable position in which our business-paper stands. Even the Government themselves must regret that matters have fallen out as they have done. I can quite believe that Ministers in the Senate are quite as anxious as private senators are to keep us fully occupied.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Hear, hear.

Senator MILLEN.—While I indorse everything that has been said as to the studied neglect with which this branch of the Legislature has been treated ever since the inception of Federation, I see no reason for meeting next week, in view of the fact that the Government have no business to proceed with. But why should we have drifted into this position?

Senator PLAYFORD.—"Stone-walling" in the other House has been the cause.

Senator MILLEN.—I have not heard of any "stone-walling."

Senator PLAYFORD.—I saw it yesterday; I was there.

Senator MILLEN.—What is more, anything that takes place elsewhere would not have affected us if measures had been introduced here. Even if there were such a thing as a "stone-wall" in the other branch of the Legislature, that is no reason why we should be punished for it. I regret the lack of business, but, as we have no business, what is the use of bringing honorable senators back next week?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not say that there is no business, but that there is not sufficient.

Senator MATHESON.—There is the Copyright Bill.

Senator MILLEN.—The point is that there is not sufficient business to occupy us next week. I would ask honorable senators to remember what occurred last week. When it was proposed to adjourn over this week, the proposal was met with the statement that there was ample business to occupy the time of the Senate. But our experience this week has shown that there is not.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I did not make that statement.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not say that the honorable senator did. I am supporting the present motion. I point out that last week when the appeal was made to honorable senators to adjourn because there was insufficient business to keep us fully employed this week, the proposal was met with exactly the same statements as those which we have heard to-day. We were told that there was sufficient business on the paper, and the result has shown that there was not sufficient to keep us fully employed.

Senator MATHESON.—There was if we had gone on with the Copyright Bill.

Senator MILLEN.—Senator Matheson must remember that it is only a lightning-like intellect such as his own that could take up a measure like the Copyright Bill, and understand at a moment's notice the effect of amendments submitted upon it. The honorable senator should have compassion on men possessing less brilliant intellects. It would have been an absolutely unreasonable and unheard-of thing if the Minister had proceeded with that Bill in Committee straight away. I challenge any one who has had any parliamentary experience to say that he has known a measure of that kind to go straight from the second reading into Committee, and then be proceeded with. It is because there is occasionally a tendency to do that kind of thing that legislators are half their time occupied in correcting legislation passed with indecent haste. If we have not sufficient work to keep us fully employed next week, is it not a more business-like method to adjourn over that week, and put the work of the two weeks into one?

Senator GUTHRIE.—We should not have been here this week.

Senator MILLEN.—I agree with the honorable senator. Seeing that there is some business to be done, but not sufficient to keep us fully employed, the better plan would be to adjourn over next week, in the hope that by that time the Government will have devised means to bring sufficient work before us.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I believe we shall have plenty of work after that.

Senator MILLEN.—I am sure that Senator Playford is anxious to bring work before the Senate, and we are willing to cordially co-operate with the honorable senator in that direction. To my Queensland friends, I would say that if the adjournment for a week tended to prolong the session, I should vote against it. I know that they have just to be hanging about Melbourne with nothing particular to do, and I quite recognise the mischief which somebody finds for idle hands.

Senator TURLEY.—The honorable senator speaks feelingly?

Senator MILLEN.—I speak with feeling for my Queensland friends. If we had adjourned last week, we would not have lengthened the session in any way, and an adjournment over next week will not have that effect.

Senator GIVENS.—We shall be kept hanging on to the other Chamber all the time.

Senator MILLEN.—On that subject I agree with Senator Givens as to what will happen if we do not take some action. But bringing honorable senators here at 2.30 p.m., to adjourn at 5.30 p.m., is not a protest.

Senator GIVENS.—Will the honorable senator vote for an adjournment for a month?

Senator MILLEN.—If the assurance of Ministers to find work for the Senate after next week is not kept, I shall be prepared to take almost any action, and action even as strong as that suggested by the honorable senator, to emphasize our objection.

Senator HIGGS.—Would the honorable senator vote for an adjournment until the next election?

Senator MILLEN.—I only hope that Senator Higgs will not have to adjourn beyond it. Whilst an adjournment, such as is now proposed, can be no hardship to our friends from Queensland, their refusal to agree to such an adjournment does constitute a hardship on honorable senators who have an opportunity to reach their homes.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They have the show to go to next week.

Senator MILLEN.—As that will probably induce Senator Givens to withdraw the amendment, I shall say no more on the subject.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—Everything that has been said by Senator Millen emphasizes the fact that we should deal with the Copyright Bill next week. The honorable senator has pointed out that it is an extremely technical measure, requiring a very great deal of consideration even from "brilliant intellects." In the circumstances, the least which the honorable senator and other "brilliant" senators from New South Wales can do is to come here and endeavour to put that Bill through its Committee stage on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of next week. I intend to support the amendment, and if Senator Givens cannot carry it, I shall be prepared to support a motion for an adjournment for a month, as a protest.

Senator GIVENS.—Next time, I will move that motion.

Senator MILLEN.—What about the Copyright Bill, then?

Senator MATHESON.—I am prepared to support such a motion, as a protest against the present position of affairs. There can be no doubt that the Senate is treated with great disrespect by the Government. I point out the reason for this, and it has so far not been touched on. Some two sessions ago we passed a motion affirming that the Government should be represented in the Senate by a larger number of Ministers holding portfolios than we at present have. The leader of the Senate must admit that the reason why we have not Bills introduced for our consideration is that each Minister in another place desires to introduce the Bills relating to his own Department.

Senator PLAYFORD. — That is quite natural.

Senator MATHESON.—That is the explanation as to why we get no business in the Senate. Successive Governments have treated the Senate with the gravest disrespect by appointing in this Chamber only one Minister in charge of a Department. An honorable senator asks me whether Senator Keating is not a Minister? He is a most effective Minister, to the extent to which he is allowed to be effective, but he is not in charge of a Department, and he does not originate any Bills. What we require to do is to insist that effect shall be given to the terms of the motion passed here two sessions ago.

Senator O'KEEFE.—How can we insist?

Senator MATHESON.—I shall tell the honorable senator. The present Government is represented in the Senate by, at the outside, three members, and they are supported by the members of the Labour Party. If the members of that party put their feet down, and insisted that the Government should be represented by two effective Ministers in the Senate, we should have them. That is my answer to Senator O'Keefe.

Senator MULCAHY.—That would apply to any Government.

Senator MATHESON.—It is particularly applicable to the present Government. To secure the support of the fifteen members of the Labour Party sitting behind them in the Senate they would have to give in. If the members of that party had insisted before we should have been properly treated in the Senate, and business would have been forthcoming to occupy our time.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Why did not the honorable senator take up that attitude with the late Government?

Senator MATHESON.—What can one man do? I am speaking now of what might be done by a party consisting of fifteen or sixteen members.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Is there no cohesion among honorable senators opposite?

Senator MATHESON.—We belong to one party, and are unanimous. Honorable senators of the Labour Party are merely supporting the present Government, and do not belong to the Government party, and to that extent honorable members on the opposite side are not unanimous.

Senator O'KEEFE.—When the honorable senator's party was in power there were only the same number of effective Ministers in the Senate.

Senator MATHESON. — One wrong does not justify another, and no one is more emphatic than I in stating that the late Government did wrong in this respect.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator never said a word about it then.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They never adjourned the Senate for a week for want of work.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes, they did; and for a fortnight.

Senator MATHESON. — Senator O'Keefe has said that it is impossible to bring pressure to bear on the Government in this matter, and I have pointed out that it is perfectly possible. I consider that the members of the Labour Party are more responsible for the present state of affairs than are the Government. They have only to insist to induce the Government to bring more business before the Senate. I am prepared to come here every Wednesday. I hope that honorable senators opposite will support the amendment as a first step towards redressing the injustice to the Senate for which they are responsible.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—There is a great deal of force in what Senator Matheson has said. Honorable senators supporting the Government should certainly have insisted that the motion carried in the Senate that the Government should be represented in this Chamber by two paid Ministers should be given effect to. Unfortunately, the first, second, and third Governments were represented here by only two Ministers, but with the present Government the representation is even less. On previous occasions we had not only a paid Minister, but the Vice-President of the Executive Council, who at times has very important duties to perform. Under the present Government the Vice-President of the Executive Council has been reserved for another place, and we have in his stead an honorary Minister.

Senator MULCAHY.—It is the difference only between one name and another.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is nothing in it at all.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Honorable senators say so, but, in my opinion, there is a distinct falling away from the position which the Senate occupied previously in this respect. I do not for a moment say this in derogation of either of the honorable senators who at present occupy the position of a Minister in this Chamber. I agree that, if not only honorable senators supporting the Government, but all members of the Senate, would make up their minds to have two paid Ministers in this Chamber, we should soon have them. I do not think that the responsibility for the present state of affairs rests more on one honorable senator than on another. We are aware that honorable members in another place are anxious to hold the balance of power. We cannot blame them for that, and if we are fools enough to allow them to have their own way we have only ourselves to thank. I hope that the Government will take notice of what is said here this afternoon, in order that there may be no reason for Ministers to come down time after time to ask for an adjournment over a week or a fortnight because there is not sufficient work for the Senate to do. The protest being made will tend to strengthen the hands of Ministers in the Senate. I for one hope that Ministers will recognise that, although certain Bills may belong to a particular Department, they might be introduced in this Chamber in the first instance, in order that both Houses might have their hands full of work to do from the beginning to the end of the session, and there might be no waiting of one House on the convenience of another. We are told that we might take the Copyright Bill next week, but, with all due respect to Senator Matheson, I say that that Bill is of such importance to the whole of the States that they should have an opportunity of making their voices heard with regard to it, not merely through their representatives, but by means of petition or otherwise. Every State has at present its own copyright law, and we are proposing to wipe all those laws out, and adopt a uniform system of copyright for the whole Commonwealth. It is only reasonable that the different States vitally interested in our legislation should have an opportunity of making known their wishes on a measure of this character. In the State Legislatures, when a measure of great importance is brought forward, time is always given for public opinion to make itself known with respect to changes in the law. How much more necessary is that the case in a Commonwealth Legislature, where we represent States 2,000 miles from the Seat of Government? It would be in the highest degree unseemly for Ministers to insist upon going on with that Bill in Committee this week. A measure of this kind can well stand over for two or three weeks, as we know of no great desire on the part of the public for a change in the copyright law. If we did meet next week, there would still be a belittling of the Senate, because people would not bother their heads about us, but would wait until the Bill reached the other House before making representations in regard to it. What I desire is that people should recognise that when a Bill is introduced here, this is the proper place in which to make representations as to alterations which they may deem desirable. However, I look upon this matter from the common-sense stand-point, and I do not wish to come here next week merely to do two or three hours' work.

Senator MATHESON.—The Copyright Bill will provide a day's work.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The consideration of that Bill ought not to be hastened; and if the Government tell us that, after next week, there will be plenty of work, we need anticipate no trouble in the future. What on earth would be the good, in the absence of any business, of dragging honorable senators, who are hundreds of miles away, from their vocations? I hope that honorable senators will realize that the motion is the most sensible under the circumstances, and that the result of this discussion will be the introduction in this House of more measures than another place at present seems inclined to send us.

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania).—We are really discussing two matters on this motion. The opportunity has been taken advantage of to express our protest against the insufficient work provided for us by the Government. We must remember, however, that the Senate itself has very largely consented to the present condition of affairs, seeing that, at the beginning of the session, we arranged to sit only three days in the week. That, I take it, is practically an intimation to the Government that we do not anticipate so much work as is transacted in another place.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There are seventy-five members in another place, and only thirty-six here.

Senator MILLEN.—Does Senator Mulcahy not think that thirty-six honorable senators can reasonably do in three days what it would take a House of seventy-five members four days to do?

Senator MULCAHY.—I am not so sure as to that; and the facts remain as I have stated. A number of honorable senators from Queensland and Western Australia are compelled to remain here during the whole of the session.

Senator MILLEN.—The length of the session is determined, not by the business of the Senate, but by the business in another place.

Senator MULCAHY.—I do not think that the dignity and importance of the Senate has been properly recognised by any Government which has been in power up to the present time. However, I look at the matter from a common-sense stand-point. Are we to come here next week and, as we did yesterday, sit for a couple of hours, and practically do nothing? Would it not be wiser to adjourn for a week, or even a fortnight; on the distinct understanding that thereafter sufficient work will be provided to keep us fully employed? Surely the whole programme of the Government has not been exhausted in the Bills already introduced in another place. One of those Bills, the Commerce Bill, might very well have been introduced in the Senate, where, I am sure, it would have been dealt with very fully and capably.

Senator HIGGS.—But honorable senators would have postponed that Bill, as they propose to postpone the Copyright Bill.

Senator MULCAHY.—The postponement of the Copyright Bill is most justifiable. I do not think that some honorable senators realize the full importance of that measure, on which we shall have to sit as a kind of jury, and be enlightened by those acquainted with the practice and law of the various States. We can hardly give too much consideration to such a measure, and we cannot deal with it as we ought until we are placed in possession of the information suggested by Senator Symon, as to the authorities on which it is based. I hope that, under the circumstances, Senator Givens will withdraw the amendment.

Senator GIVENS.—I have not the slightest intention of withdrawing the amendment.

Senator MULCAHY.—I hardly expected that the honorable senator had any such intention; but, at any rate, we may hope for a majority in favour of the motion.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—It is amusing to listen to honorable senators who grumble at the Government for not providing us with business, and for not insisting on the rights of this Chamber, when we know, all the time, that those honorable senators are only too anxious to get away to Sydney and Adelaide every week. The whole thing is neither more nor less than sheer pretence and humbug; and we have had those protests so often that really I am beginning to be tired of them. Unless the Senate takes some effective method of protesting against the way in which it is treated by the other Chamber, I shall come to the conclusion that we have subsided into the position of an ordinary Legislative Council—that the Senate is nothing more than the shadow of a name. Before that state of affairs comes about, I think we ought to have a sort of Donnybrook—there ought to be "wigs on the green"—and not only have something said but something done. I blame the Senate, in the first place, for the present state of affairs; and, in the second place, I blame the Government. Honorable senators, like Senator Symon, have talked very strongly about the position of the Senate. Senator Symon, as a member of the Federal Convention, no doubt, would tell us very truly that that Convention, and he himself, intended that the Senate should occupy a very different position. It does not matter two straws what the Convention meant, but it does matter a great deal what the Senate means. If the Senate is willing to subside into an inferior position, it seems to me that that state of affairs has been brought about principally by the desire of New South Wales and South Australian senators to get home every week. If the Seat of Government were in a place from which it would be impossible for those honorable senators to visit their homes every week, the difficulty we are now discussing would not continually arise; because those honorable gentlemen would then insist on business being brought in to keep us constantly employed. As it is, however, with the present railway facilities, those honorable senators rush away to Sydney and Adelaide, and probably devote themselves to their own business, with the result that the Senate is placed in a position of inferiority. The Government openly flout us by only placing one or two measures on the notice-paper, while there are a dozen in hand on which very little progress is being made. Honorable senators of the Opposition are, on this question, with members supporting the Government.

Senator MATHESON.—It is not a party question.

Senator STEWART.—It is not. I blame the Senate very much for the present state of affairs.

Senator HIGGS.—And we blame Senator Stewart, amongst others.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable senator need not blame me. I did not attend at the beginning of the session, because I knew that if I did my time would be absolutely wasted.

Senator GUTHRIE. — Had we all done that, what would have happened?

Senator STEWART.—Had we all done that, the position would have been very much better than it is at present. Senator Guthrie is just as anxious as any other honorable senator for an adjournment over next week.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Nothing of the sort. I have been in my place on every sitting day since I was elected, and I shall in the future be here on every sitting day.

Senator STEWART.—I am not questioning the statement that the honorable senator has attended every day.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The honorable senator does not know anything about my anxiety.

Senator STEWART.—By our actions we are giving the Government reason to place us in the position we now occupy.

Senator GUTHRIE. — Do not get away from the point.

Senator STEWART.—If the honorable senator will not interject, and he, and others beside him, will not talk so much. I shall be able to pursue the thread of my remarks much more collectedly, and bring them to a conclusion sooner.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Why should the honorable senator make a personal reference to me?

Senator STEWART.—I did not make any personal reference to the honorable senator, or, if I did, I was provoked to do it.

Senator GUTHRIE.—I did not provoke the honorable senator.

Senator STEWART.—I know that the honorable senators from South Australia, whether supporting the Government, the Labour Party, or the Opposition, are equally anxious to rush away to Adelaide at every opportunity.

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is not true.

Senator STEWART.—Those honorable senators have not one iota of consideration for honorable senators from Queensland and Western Australia, who are compelled to remain in Melbourne during the whole of the session. What is the good of honorable senators getting up with their tongues in their cheeks, and hypocritically railing against the Government, and complaining about the position of the Senate, all the while knowing that they are only too anxious for an adjournment?

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is not so.

Senator STEWART.—Those honorable senators try to influence the Government to bring about adjournments—they say one thing in the Senate, and another thing privately.

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is absolutely untrue.

Senator STEWART.—The whole business is contemptible—nothing but a tissue of hypocrisy.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator is in order in accusing honorable senators of hypocrisy.

Senator STEWART.—Then I withdraw the word. What I insist on is that if the Senate is placed in a position of inferiority, it has only itself to blame.

Senator MCGREGOR.—But what if people are always talking about the position of the Senate?

Senator STEWART.—Will the honorable senator assist to do something? Will the honorable senator agree to an adjournment for a month?

Senator GUTHRIE.—No.

Senator STEWART.—That is the only way in which the Senate can help itself. Some honorable senators are watchdogs, who bark but will not bite. There is now presented an opportunity to members of the Senate to adjourn for a month, and, in that way, make their protest so effective that the Government would be bound to take some notice of it. Instead of that we have honorable senators weakly consenting to an adjournment for a week.

Senator MILLEN.—Why should the honorable senator penalize the employes in the Post and Telegraph office in Brisbane?

Senator STEWART.—I am not going to penalize anybody. I think that the position of the Senate under the Constitution is of very much greater importance than the salaries of any civil servants. I wonder at any one with the capacity of the honorable senator bringing forward such a childish argument. What have we to do with salaries? It would not be our fault—

Senator MILLEN.—It would be their misfortune though.

Senator STEWART.—Yes, but it would not be our fault. It would be the fault of the Government and of the members of the other House. If honorable senators are really serious in protesting against the action of the Government, the only way in which it can be shown is either by meeting here next week, and, if we have no business, adjourning from day to day, or by now adjourning for a month. What is the earthly good of adjourning for a week? In a statement prepared for the Minister of Defence some time ago, and purporting to set forth the policy of the Government, we find a confession of faith consisting of thirty-six articles. Its programme contains a large number of questions which were to be brought before Parliament. It has the support of the Labour Party, but what generalship does it show? It originates all its measures in one Chamber, where the opposition to it is strong, and gives no work to the Chamber where the opposition to it is weak numerically, though not intellectually. In these circumstances, the Government is most seriously to blame. Not only is our time, as well as the time of the country being wasted, but its business is being neglected. We have quite enough business to occupy our time next week. Does any one imagine that the consideration of the Copyright Bill in Committee would not take a couple of days at the very least? There is work for Wednesday and Friday on that Bill alone. Then for Thursday, the notice-paper contains motions on such questions as Home Rule for Ireland, the selection of a High Commissioner, the classification of the Public Service, the case of Senator Neild against Major-General Hutton, and the tobacco monopoly.

Senator MULCAHY.—It will take us two days to discuss whether we should adjourn for a week or for a fortnight.

Senator STEWART.—We may as well be occupied in doing this as in doing nothing. The honorable senator, can take a steamer and run away to Tasmania, but I cannot leave Melbourne. If we adjourn for a week, the business will be scamped, and instead of gaining from the adjournment, we shall practically lose. I hope that those who are really anxious, not only to go on with business, but also to maintain the prestige of the Senate, will vote for the amendment.

Senator GUTHRIE (South Australia).—Senator Stewart seems to have been very hard up for something to say. He has complained about honorable members speaking, and made that a reason for opposing the motion. He has made an unwarrantable attack on the representatives of South Australia, who not only last session, but also this session, have been most constant in their attendance.

Senator STEWART.—They have always wanted to get home.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Because the honorable senator cannot get home, he will not allow any one else to go home.

Senator STEWART.—Why should I?

Senator GUTHRIE.—This reminds one of the fable of the fox and the grapes. The grapes were sour. I do not consider that my home is sour if the honorable senator considers that his is. I do not wish to impute motives to any one, but if ever there was an honorable senator to whom motives could be imputed it is Senator Stewart. During the first weeks of the session he did nothing; he did not even put in an appearance.

Senator STEWART.—Did the honorable senator do anything?

Senator GUTHRIE.—We were here to do whatever was to be done, and the honorable senator is now anxious to show that he wishes to do something during the session. We have nothing to fear.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable senator started the session with an adjournment, and he has worked so hard that he wants a holiday now.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Those honorable senators who have attended this session have done very good work indeed.

Senator STEWART.—This is their second holiday.

Senator GUTHRIE.—We are prepared—at any rate, I am prepared—to go to the country to-morrow and say to the electors, “We dealt with all the business which was brought forward.” But those who were absent and neglected their duties are frightened of the position in which they may be put on that occasion. Senator Stewart says he cannot get home, but he voted against the representatives of Western Australia getting a survey made of a railway which might enable them to get home. If the Senate should decide to meet on seven days in the week, I am prepared to attend, and in saying that I believe I echo the sentiment of every representative of my State. Senator Stewart was absolutely unwarranted in saying that we were only too anxious to get away, and he knows that he was. He was an absolute traitor to the labour cause, when he said we were anxious to get away to-day. He knows that to-morrow is the 1st September.

Senator STEWART.—I know that there is plenty of business to be done, and the honorable senator cannot deny that there is.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The honorable senator knows as well as I do that in South Australia the 1st September is Labour Day, and he thought that he would penalise the Labour representatives of that State by preventing them from attending the commemoration.

Senator STEWART.—I was not thinking of that at all.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Well, in that case, let us adjourn before 4 o'clock to-day until Wednesday week.

Senator GUTHRIE.—If it is warranted by the business of the Senate, I am prepared to remain to-day, and miss an event which I have attended for twenty-five years.

Senator GIVENS.—Neither the motion nor the amendment will prevent the honorable senator from getting away.

Senator GUTHRIE.—No, but Senator Stewart says that we are anxious to get away. As regards next week, I do not care two pins. The probability is that I shall have to come to Melbourne on public business, and while here I might as well be attending the sittings of the Senate as travelling in the train. Senator Stewart had no justification for the attack he made upon representatives of South Australia and, I believe, New South Wales. The latter have, I think, been just as constant in their attendance as he has. It ill became him to read a lecture on attendance here. I intend to support the Government, not because it is proposing to meet my personal convenience, but because it is not prepared to go on with any business next week, when, as I said, I shall be in Melbourne.

Senator GIVENS.—The Government did not say that it would have no business to go on with.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The Government said that it would not have sufficient business to keep us going next week.

Senator GIVENS.—No; Senator Playford said he was not sure that he would have sufficient business to keep the Senate going.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am not sure that there will be.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Would the honorable senator, if he were leading the Senate, risk bringing honorable senators from all parts of the Commonwealth to go on with the business on the notice-paper for next week?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes; there is a two days' debate involved in one Bill.

Senator GUTHRIE.—No doubt the honorable senator has his own engagements here for next week. But is there any guarantee that he would attend if the Senate sat next week?

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly, if the honorable senator will come.

Senator GUTHRIE.—I shall be here in spite of anything. I intend to follow the Government on this occasion, because I think that Ministers are best able to say whether they can give us work to do or not. Was it not a farce to bring honorable senators here this week, in some cases a distance of 500 miles, to sit for only two hours yesterday, and to discuss to-day the question whether we shall sit next week or not? I am sorry for those honorable senators who will have to remain in Melbourne if the Senate does not meet next week. But that is their misfortune. The honorable senator who preceded me actually regretted that the Tasmanian senators had a steamer to take them over to the island. Is it not carrying matters a little too far, because the geographical position of some States enables some senators to go home when there is no business to do, for other senators to attempt to prevent them? What is our position? The House of Representatives contains twice the number of members that the Senate does. Consequently, although both Houses start together at the beginning of the session, and both finish together at the end of the session, more time must be taken up in the other branch of the Legislature than in the Senate. The Government have done remarkably well in bringing forward the measures they have done. I have nothing to cavil at in their conduct. If they continue to do as well, I shall still support them. The Government take the responsibility of proposing certain measures to Parliament. If through their own neglect they fail to carry those measures, the blame rests upon them. We have nothing to complain of if they assure us that there is reason for a short adjournment.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—In consequence of some remarks which have been made, I think it necessary, as I intend to support the motion, to give my reasons for so doing. It appears to me to be absurd that the Senate should meet next week when there is no business to proceed with. I quite sympathize with the Western Australian and Queensland senators. I, unfortunately, have to remain in Victoria, while my home and family are in another State. I should like to get on with the work of the session. But it is not fair to those honorable senators who wish to go home to compel them to come back when there is not sufficient business. At the same time, I trust that the Government will in future so arrange business that we shall have plenty to do. Undoubtedly the condition of the notice-paper affords reason for much that has been said. I am quite willing to support Senator Matheson in any action which he may take to enable us to express our disapproval of the failure of the Government to bring measures before us. But what is the use of making an ineffective protest by refusing to adjourn?

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I am surprised at the unusual heat that has been generated in connexion with this short adjournment. Let me call attention to what has taken place in the past. When I had the honour to occupy a very prominent position in the Senate, I was successful in obtaining five adjournments, some of which were for a fortnight. When Senator Symon was leader of the Senate at the end of a session when everything should be in full going order, he secured three adjournments over a fortnight.

Senator GIVENS.—I took the same objection then as I am taking now.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator did not make such a fuss about it. The present Government came into office when things were in confusion, and have had only two adjournments. We should have some consideration for the Government, and some little consistency in regard to ourselves.

Senator MATHESON.—Consistency in doing wrong?

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator is always doing right. He restricts himself so severely to what is correct, that he hardly ever allows a curl to get out of place. It is a pity that he ever came out of a band-box for the wind to blow upon him. I do not like to see honorable senators protest against an adjournment for the purpose, to my mind, of obtaining a little kudos which they will never get; for the public do not expect us to sit here doing nothing. They have no appreciation of the man who wants us to leave our homes when there is no business for us to do. I trust that honorable senators will support the Government on this occasion, and will in future take all the circumstances into consideration before objecting to what is proposed.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I intend to support the Government, and I protest against such a miserable exhibition as faces us on the notice-paper in regard to the business for next week. It consists simply of one line—"Copyright Bill in Committee, clause 2." It is quite possible that the Bill might be disposed of in two or three hours, and then there would be no more business to transact. Although

I support the motion, I hope that the debate will have the effect of inducing the Government to give us more work to do. They should launch some fresh Bills here.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Hear, hear.

Question—That the word “week,” proposed to be left out, be left out—put. The Senate divided.

MAIL SERVICE: TASMANIA.

Senator MACFARLANE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. The amount paid to Tasmania for the Postal Service to the Commonwealth, and, if by poundage rate only, how much per lb.?

2. Is this only for sea carriage?

3. If so, is it considered adequate return for the fast service paid for by Tasmania to the Union Company of New Zealand?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. The amount paid to the Tasmanian branch of the Postmaster-General's Department from 1st October, 1903, until 30th June, 1905, by the other States of the Commonwealth for the carriage of mails sent by those States amounted to £3,295 10s. 1d., the contributions ranging from that of Western Australia amounting to £61 5s. 11d., to that of Victoria amounting to £2,344 9s. 5d. The whole of the payments were at the poundage rates provided under statute, viz., 1s. 4d. per lb. for letters and post cards, and 2s. 8d. per cwt. for other articles.

2. It is only for the carriage from Victoria to Tasmania across Bass Straits.

3. It is considered to be adequate when compared with the practice of other States, which is to carry mails from the border of an adjacent State by express trains without making any charge against the States by which those mails are sent.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Senator DOBSON asked the Minister representing the Minister of External Affairs, upon notice—

1. Is it the intention of Ministers in future to administer the third section of the Immigration Restriction Act so as not applying to persons coming from Great Britain to the Commonwealth under contract to perform manual labour, and, if so, are Ministers prepared to introduce a Bill to amend the third section of the Immigration Restriction Act so as to make its provisions conform to such administration?

2. Are Ministers further prepared to amend section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act so as to allow immigrants from Europe to enter the Commonwealth under contract to perform manual labour, so long as such immigrants are not hired or engaged to perform any of the work or take the place of any workmen who may be on strike or otherwise engaged in fighting for or defending what they may consider to be their just rights?

3. If the reply to question 2 is “No,” are Ministers prepared to amend the Immigration Restriction Act so as to permit immigrants from Europe to enter the Commonwealth under contract, containing such special conditions and restrictions as Parliament may impose, to perform manual labour in connexion with the production of sugar, cotton, and other tropical products, in the tropical and semi-tropical portions of the Commonwealth?

Senator PLAYFORD. — The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

Any proposed amendment of the Immigration Restriction Act will be a matter of Ministerial policy, and as such duly announced to Parliament. Pending its amendment the Act will, of course, continue to be administered in accordance with its present terms. These do not forbid the Minister to deal with propositions of the nature referred to in question 3, and if any are submitted to the Government they will receive consideration.

MILITARY FORCES: REPORT.

Senator MATHESON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Is the Minister aware that Major-General Sir Edward Hutton was in the habit of furnishing an annual report upon the Military Forces of the Commonwealth for the information of Parliament in May of each year?

2. Has such a report been prepared by the Military Board?

3. If so, what is the date of the report, and why has it not been submitted to Parliament prior to the introduction of the Estimates?

4. If no report has been prepared, will the Minister of Defence instruct the Military Board to give the matter immediate attention, that the Senate, at any rate, may be fully informed as to the condition of the defences of the Commonwealth before dealing with the Appropriation Bill 1905-6?

5. Will the Minister of Defence provide for the inclusion of the Inspector-General's reports on the condition of the fortifications, armaments, forces, and equipment of each individual State, as appendices to the general report of the Military Board?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow :—

1. The late General Officer Commanding furnished an annual report to the Minister, who laid it before Parliament.

2 and 3. No.

4. Yes. An interim report, from the 12th January, 1905, the date of their appointment, will be obtained from the Military Board at an early date, and a copy will be laid on the table of the House. The late General Officer Commanding made a report, dated 8th November, 1904, a copy of which I will place before Parliament.

5. No. I do not consider it desirable that the Inspector-General's reports should be attached as appendices, but I shall place typed copies of same on the table of the library for perusal of members.

Just before Major-General Hutton left, he made a report, which he brought up to date. I will lay it on the table.

Senator MATHESON.—Will that report be laid on the table directly?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes.

COMMONWEALTH DEFENCES.

Motion (by Senator MATHESON) agreed to—

That the Minister of Defence be requested to lay upon the table of the Senate a copy of the views expressed by the Honorable Alfred Deakin on the present condition of the defence of the Commonwealth, and communicated to the Herald on the 12th June, 1905.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I lay on the table a statement of the views referred to.

Ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS BILL

Motion (by Senator KEATING) agreed to—

That leave be given to introduce a Bill for an Act to amend the law relating to Parliamentary elections.

NEW GUINEA: CASE OF MR. O'BRIEN.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I move—

That the papers having reference to the administration of justice in British New Guinea laid on the table of the Senate on 24th August, 1905, be taken into consideration; and that the Government be asked to institute further inquiries.

I regret that it is necessary for me to initiate a discussion on matters that affect, in some degree, the administration of affairs in British New Guinea. I have always held, and I have on many occasions voiced the opinion, that we should endow the local authorities in British New Guinea with as much power as possible, and that we should interfere with their administration as little as we possibly can. I believe that as we are not in a position to know the actual conditions in British New Guinea, the less we interfere with the course of administration the better it will be for the Possession. I will at once admit that it is a dangerous precedent to even appear to take the part of settlers against the constituted authority, or to interfere with certain judicial proceedings; except in very exceptional cases affecting the life or liberty of the subject, such as the Goarabari Island case and the case to which I now refer, both of which, I think, justify Federal investigation. The man O'Brien was convicted on three charges before a properly constituted tribunal. He was accused of common assault in connexion with certain of the natives. In the first case he was fined £5, and in each of the other cases he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, the sentences to be cumulative. He was offered the right to appeal on these cases, and refused to avail himself of that right. The magistrate presiding on the first occasion was Mr. Higginson, and on the second occasion Mr. Monckton. They are very able magistrates, and we can assume that the cases were properly inquired into and the punishment meted out was deserved. That my position may not afterwards be misunderstood, I should say at once that I favour severe punishment being dealt out to any white people guilty of illtreating the natives of British New Guinea. This man O'Brien was set to work at scrub-cutting at Kokoda, the magisterial station for the Yodda gold-fields, and he was guarded by a native armed with a rifle. He rushed the guard, and a struggle took place. According to the reports we have, both were wounded. The prisoner received a wound in the head, and the native guard was struck three times on the head with a half-axe. The prisoner escaped with the rifle. It is further stated that the guard was very seriously injured, though it is a noteworthy fact that a few days afterwards he was able to give evidence before a board of inquiry consisting of two visiting justices of the peace. This is all we know of the case, and anything further is in the region of conjecture and assertion. It has been stated by one of the miners that O'Brien threatened to shoot anybody who attempted to capture him. It is further stated by the magistrates that certain charges were hanging over the head of this prisoner O'Brien, and that he was to be prosecuted for theft, rape, and assault. Those charges may or may not be true. O'Brien may be an unmitigated scoundrel, as the Government reports seem to convey, or he may only be a violent-tempered, but warm-hearted man, as described in the reports of the miners amongst whom he lived. According to the miners, when one of their number was lost, O'Brien was a member of the search party, and, persevering after the others had given up hope, he was the means of saving the life of the wanderer. But whether the magistrate or the miners be correct, does not in the slightest degree affect the present issue. Every man is held to be innocent until proved to be guilty, and merely alleged offences ought not to be taken into consideration. The only charge against O'Brien is that he was convicted of common assault, and that he overpowered his guard and escaped from custody; and on this account, a most extraordinary proclamation, which practically outlawed him, was issued by the Assistant Resident Magistrate, in the following terms:—

Should O'Brien appear to any member of the field, such member is perfectly justified in ordering him to stand or go in front of him to police, and if O'Brien fails to do either of these things he may be shot.

I do not know the exact meaning of "any member of the field"—whether the words mean any white resident or any inhabitant of the field, coloured or white. In any case, power was given to shoot this man, in the event of his refusing to walk to the police station; whether O'Brien resisted or not, if he merely refused to walk before his captor, he might be shot. For instance, O'Brien, as was the case when he was originally apprehended, might be in bed, and if he refused to rise, and walk before any miner or inhabitant of the field, he might have his brains blown out. That was really the power given in the proclamation issued by the Assistant Resident Magistrate. Even if the man were working at his vocation, he might there be shot by any one before whom he refused to walk to the police station; that is, he might be shot if he attempted to get away, or merely folded his arms and refused to move. Under the circumstances, any one with a grudge against O'Brien could have shot him at sight, and afterwards declared that he had refused to walk back to custody. We have been very careful, and rightly so, to see that all the rights and privileges of the natives are conserved. When Dr. Chalmers, a missionary named Tomlinson, and ten others were massacred and eaten by the natives, and an attempt was made by a Government party to capture the murderers, the natives, who fired on the party, were fired on in return, and a number of them shot as they retreated. In that case, an inquiry was immediately instituted in order to ascertain whether any wrong had been done to the natives. We are quite right in seeing that no cruelty is exercised by the immigrant whites; but surely we ought also to be careful to see that we do not treat the whites with less regard than is paid to the native population. A petition, signed by twenty-three out of the thirty-four white men on the Yodda gold-field, was addressed to the Minister of External Affairs, and a counter petition signed by fifteen or sixteen residents, four of whom signed the original petition. The former petition was analyzed by the Resident Magistrate almost paragraph by paragraph. The Resident Magistrate, however, made no comment on the extraordinary proclamation that was issued by the Assistant Resident Magistrate, although, seeing that the proclamation was included in the papers forwarded, he must have known of its existence. That fact is sufficient evidence that the proclamation was issued, and that the Resident Magistrate expressed no opinion in regard to it. The most surprising feature of this case is the silence of the Magistrates and of the Government of New Guinea with regard to the proclamation. No reproof has been administered, no regret expressed, and no inquiry made; and up to the present there has been no explanation why such a course should have been adopted in reference to O'Brien. Undoubtedly the Assistant Resident Magistrate exceeded his functions in issuing a proclamation giving the right to shoot a man who has been convicted of only a trivial offence. The Queensland statute law was adopted in New Guinea in 1888, and the magistrates in the Possession have no more power than have the stipendiary magistrates of that State. Indeed, I doubt very much whether such a proclamation could be properly issued by the Administrator, with the advice of the Executive Council. In the early bushranging and convict days of Australia, certain men were outlawed, and could be shot at sight; but that was done by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Executive Council. I doubt very much, however, though I speak under correction, whether the Governor-General of the Commonwealth, with the advice of the Executive Council, has power to issue a proclamation of this character. In my opinion, nothing but an Act of Parliament could empower the Government to outlaw a citizen of Australia, and such an Act would, of course, have to obtain the Royal assent. If a prisoner, on conviction of common assault, escaped from the Melbourne gaol, and a proclamation of the kind were issued, I venture to think that a most profound sensation would be caused throughout the Continent, and, further, that if the convicted man happened to be shot, the magistrate who issued the proclamation would be tried for his life. Surely it is not contended that when a Britisher or an Australian goes to British New Guinea he is to be deprived of the inestimable privileges which we enjoy here?

Senator PLAYFORD. — A man must not commit assaults.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — Surely a man is not to be deprived of the rights we enjoy under Magna Charta and the Petition of Rights merely because he has committed a trivial offence?

Senator PLAYFORD. — What has become of the man?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — There is a mail only once a month from New Guinea, and when it arrives we may hear that O'Brien has been shot.

Senator PLAYFORD. — I have not had time to look through the papers.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — I am surprised that the members of the Government have not taken any notice of this matter, seeing that in the case of the natives there was no hesitation in appointing a board of inquiry.

Debate interrupted. Orders of the Day called on.

Motion (by Senator PEARCE) proposed—

That the consideration of Order of the Day No. 1, Tobacco Monopoly, be postponed until notice of motion No. 3 has been disposed of.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—We do not know how long the debate on Senator Smith's motion will be continued.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I shall not be more than five minutes.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I presume that the Minister of Defence desires to reply to the honorable senator.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; I have not seen the papers. There is a gentleman coming down from British New Guinea who will give the information.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Let the honorable senator ask for leave to continue his speech on another occasion.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I do not see why I cannot continue my speech now with the consent of the honorable senator in charge of the next order of the day. I shall not be more than five minutes.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Debate resumed.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I have lived amongst miners nearly all my life. Although I admit that miners are rough and ready, perhaps not so polished in their mode of speech as some of the city men, and may not doff their hat and pull their forelock in the presence of their so-called superiors; still, there are no more law-abiding men in the Commonwealth, and that is proved on every field in Australia. I want honorable senators to understand that the miners on this gold-field are Australians.

Senator MILLEN.—As this question is so important that other business has had to be set aside to discuss it, I think, sir, we should have a quorum present. [Quorum formed.]

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That the miners in British New Guinea are just as law abiding and as good men as the miners of Australia from whom they are drawn, is proved conclusively by the fact that there have been hardly any convictions amongst them. I wish now to say a few words about the treatment of white prisoners in the Possession. We must recognise the peculiar conditions that exist there, differentiating as they do from those prevailing in Australia. The whole government of the Possession rests upon one word, "prestige." The belief of the natives in the power of the white man is even more important than their belief in his justice. It is a boast that since British occupation of the Possession, no white soldier has been there. That has been brought about, not only by the want of cohesion amongst the natives, but equally by the loyal support which has been given by the white colonists to the Administration. It would be a sorry day for the Possession if the white population were to adopt a hostile attitude towards its Government. When a prisoner is put to the work of scrub-cutting, it is regarded as one of the most menial occupations to which a man can be put there. It is an occupation which no one but a native ever undertakes. This prisoner was put to the work of scrub-cutting. He was guarded by a native with a rifle, and his gaolers were actually, if not theoretically, natives. Surely that reverses the usual order of things, and is likely to create a very bad impression in the minds of the Papuans. It will profoundly and injuriously modify the natives' view of the paramountcy and the power of the white population. For a white prisoner to work at what is considered a menial occupation, under the control of a native with a rifle, in an open field, in full view of the natives, and in a place where they are continually congregating from distant parts as they come to lodge complaints, or to receive instruction or advice, or to bring foodstuffs for the population at the Government station, is a thing which will revolutionize the views of natives in regard to the power and prestige of the white man. They will cease to recognise the superiority of a person whom they themselves can control with a rifle, and compel to work. Such a system is liable to make a white man an object of contempt rather than of respect to the natives, as he should be.

Senator MILLEN.—I beg, sir, to call your attention to the state of the Senate. [Quorum formed.]

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — The petition which was sent down to the Minister of External Affairs, and signed by thirty-three out of the thirty-four miners on the field, contains this statement in regard to the degradation of working under the control of a native—

It acts like a dagger in the heart of a white man when he knows that the ignorant savage is placed in control over him by his own white men.

That is a position which should not be tolerated, and which is unnecessary. We have a white gaoler at Woodlark Island, as well as at Port Moresby, seventy miles distant, and all white men in prison should be sent to either one place or the other. For the sake of producing a moral effect upon the natives, no white man should be placed under native gaolers to work as an inferior to them. I regret that, in doing what I believe to be my duty here, I have been compelled to speak as I have with regard to the actions of certain men from whom I have received the greatest kindness. During my last trip to British New Guinea I was treated with the greatest kindness by every one I met, more especially by these very men whose conduct I am now discussing. When I reached the Yodda Field I was struck down with malarial fever, and these men treated me with the greatest kindness, so that I have no personal feeling other than gratitude to them in this matter. I believe that such an act is likely to be most detrimental to the best interests of the Territory, and to create a feeling of hostility on the part of the colonists against the ruling powers, and therefore I felt it necessary to bring the matter before the Senate. What I ask the Government to do is merely to request the Administrator to give a full report of the whole proceeding, with his reasons for taking no notice of this extraordinary proclamation which was issued, and his justification therefor, if a justification can be given. The people of British New Guinea are entitled to the same rights and privileges, as far as possible, as we are, and an escaped prisoner there should receive the same treatment as we would demand for an escaped prisoner here. Were a prisoner to escape here in similar circumstances, and a right to be given to any person to shoot him, practically at sight, unless he went back to gaol, it would be considered an outrage. Are we to deprive the colonists in British New Guinea of such rights and privileges as we possess in that respect? The Chief Justice of the Possession possesses local knowledge, and would be able to furnish a report on this matter. The miners have the highest opinion of His Honour, and would be quite willing, I am sure, to abide by his decision. If the Government would give a promise to ask Chief Justice Murray to give a report on the whole matter, especially with regard to the document I read, I think the miners in the Possession would be satisfied, and the people of the Commonwealth would know exactly what had occurred.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) proposed—

That the debate be now adjourned.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—Before the question is put, sir—

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—There cannot be any debate on this motion.

Senator STEWART.—What is the object of adjourning the debate?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am going to get some information from the Secretary of External Affairs, who is returning from New Guinea next week.

Question.—That the debate be now adjourned—put. The Senate divided.

NATIONAL MONOPOLY IN TOBACCO.

Debate resumed from 3rd August (vide page 540), on motion by Senator PEARCE—

That a Select Committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and report upon—

1. The existence or otherwise of a combine, trust, or monopoly in the industry of the manufacture, importation, and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes within the Commonwealth.
2. If such combine, trust, or monopoly be found to exist, as to its effect on the industry, and on the Commonwealth.
3. As to the advisability or otherwise of the Government taking over the industry of such manufacture, importation, and sale, or any part thereof.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That the Committee report to the Senate on 9th August, 1905.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).

—In view of the importance of this subject, one would have expected that the mover would see the reasonableness of the suggestion which has been made to him, to adjourn the debate until we had a more representative attendance. The effect of what has taken place in the Senate to-day has been that a large number of honorable senators have left the Chamber, and some, indeed, have left the State.

Senator MATHESON. — With their eyes open; knowing the business that was on the paper.

Senator MILLEN.—And that their business did not take them to Randwick the week after next.

Senator MATHESON.—That is most pertinent to the question!

Senator MILLEN.—As pertinent as the honorable senator's interjection!

Senator GIVENS.—I rise to order. What has Randwick race-course to do with the motion?

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT.—There is no point of order.

Senator MILLEN.—It is deplorable that a motion of this kind, which concerns not only the appointment of a Select Committee, but the affirmation of something like a principle affecting the nationalization of a large industry, should be debated in a House of which the most that can be said is that technically it meets the requirements of the Constitution with regard to a quorum. However, it appears that as long as the mover of the motion gets it through somehow, that is really all he cares. I can quite understand the patient zeal with which he has pursued this question, from the time he took his seat in the Senate. But zeal is one thing and sound judgment is another. It does appear to me that the honorable senator is absolutely disregarding what I think ought to be a fundamental principle, that all matters of this kind should be determined after mature consideration, and by a process that entitles the Senate to be called a deliberative assembly, and not a mere meeting of two or three persons. It may be urged that there has been sufficient delay already, and that therefore there is no necessity for postponing a decision. But let me point out what has resulted from the delay. When Senator Pearce first brought forward this scheme, his motion was very different from that which he submits to-day. His original proposal was very much wider in its scope. It was in the following terms:—

In order to provide the necessary money for the payment of old-age pensions and for other purposes the Commonwealth Government should undertake the monopoly and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes; and that a Committee be appointed . . . to inquire into and report on the best method of carrying the foregoing resolution into effect.

It will be observed that Senator Pearce then proposed to raise money for old-age pensions. Not a word about that appears in the present motion. Old-age pensions was made the peg upon which to hang the consideration of a stupendously important question—whether or not we should nationalize an industry. Further, it will be observed, in the second part of the original motion, that it was laid down as an absolute affirmation that it was desirable to do this thing. The motion now submitted takes quite other ground. Not only is there no suggestion that the necessity of paying old-age pensions requires us to nationalize the tobacco industry, or that we ought to devote the proceeds of the industry to the payment of old-age pensions; but there is this further remarkable change: that whereas previously the Senate was asked to affirm that it was desirable to nationalize the tobacco industry, to-day Senator Pearce recedes from that position, and merely asks us to appoint a Committee to inquire whether or not it is desirable so to do. It will be observed at once that a vast change has taken place in the standpoint of the honorable senator. It is quite evident that this alteration is due to that deliberation which has been afforded by the fact that time has been at his disposal for the further consideration of the subject. A double gain has resulted from the delay. The first gain is that we can now consider the question of the nationalization of the tobacco industry quite apart from the question of old-age pensions, as we ought to be able to do. The second gain is that the honorable senator in charge of the motion has, as I have pointed out, seen the desirableness of desisting from the affirmation that it is desirable to institute a national monopoly, and has come down to the position of affirming that it is desirable to inquire about it. In view of the fact that the honorable senator in charge of the motion has gained so much, has altered his mental focus in such a remarkable degree as the result of a few months' delay, it is to be regretted that he did not recognise the great advantage which would in all probability have resulted if he had further postponed his motion to enable it to be considered with something approaching a full attendance of the Senate. As the honorable senator has not seen fit to do so, it remains for me to express the hope, which I do most sincerely, that the absence of a large number of the members of the Senate will not in any way tend either to destroy or deflect the sound judgment which the Senate would have expressed if more fully represented, or induce us to take any action which will not be desirable in the interest either of the dignity of the Senate or of the welfare of the Commonwealth. I wish to divide the motion, as it ought to be divided, into two portions, for it raises two absolutely different questions. The first, which is covered by the first and second paragraphs, favours the appointment of a Committee for the purpose of inquiring as to whether a combination or trust exists, and, if so, the effect of that combination or trust on the tobacco industry and on the Commonwealth. The third paragraph of the motion empowers the Committee to inquire into the desirability of nationalizing the industry. There are two widely different things covered by these three paragraphs. As to the question whether a Committee might advantageously be appointed to inquire into the existence of a combination, I am with Senator Pearce. I do not affirm as emphatically as does the honorable senator that a pernicious trust exists. I think, from the evidence which the honorable senator has sought to submit to the Senate, that he has allowed his zeal to outrun his judgment, and has overstated his case. But I do think that there is sufficient evidence before us to justify the belief that there is a combination of some kind in existence, and, that being so, in view of the history of trusts elsewhere, I think that it is not an undesirable thing—indeed, that it is a desirable thing—that we should inquire into the operations and methods of this combination. I shall return to that matter a little later, but I want to point out the difference in principle involved in an inquiry into the existence of a trust as covered by the first two paragraphs of the motion, and the third paragraph, which deals with the nationalization of the industry. I regret that in this matter I may appear to be somewhat antagonistic to the motion as a whole, when, as a matter of fact, my hostility is centred in the third paragraph. Before passing on to deal with that paragraph, I should like to suggest an amendment of the second paragraph, which I have no doubt Senator Pearce will be prepared to accept. One of the contentions advanced by the honorable senator and by other friends of the motion, is that to some extent the existence of this combination is detrimental to the growers of tobacco, and it is assumed that under a national monopoly, which Senator Pearce wishes to see created; the growers would obtain better prices, and to that extent would be placed in a position to carry on their industry with greater profit than it is alleged they can secure at present. But there is nothing in the motion which has any reference to the growers of tobacco. There is nothing in it to empower the Select Committee, if appointed, to take any evidence as to the position of any persons outside the manufacturers, merchants, retailers, and dealers in tobacco.

Senator PEARCE.—Does not the honorable senator think that the second paragraph gives the Select Committee power to inquire as to the effect of the combine on growers of tobacco?

Senator MILLEN.—Absolutely no; because the honorable senator will find that in the first paragraph of his motion he has really supplied a definition of what he means by the word "industry." That paragraph reads—

The existence or otherwise of a combine, trust, or monopoly in the industry of the manufacture, importation, and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes within the Commonwealth.

Senator PEARCE.—Surely the supply of the raw material may be considered one part of the manufacture?

Senator MILLEN.—It would have been if the honorable senator had not limited it. Senator Pearce has limited himself as many another man does, by using too many words in his motion, and by saying exactly what he means by the word "industry." The industry, as the honorable senator has described it in his motion, is that of the "manufacture, importation, and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes." If the honorable senator had stopped at the word "industry," he would have covered everything; but he has expressly mentioned the manufacture, importation, and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes. I am sure that Senator Pearce desires that the Committee, if appointed, shall inquire into the condition of the growers of tobacco. As I agree to the appointment of the proposed Select Committee, to the extent of the powers proposed to be conferred by the first two paragraphs of the motion, I think that while it is inquiring into the business it should inquire into it from the beginning, and should take into consideration the position of the growers of tobacco. I therefore suggest that the second paragraph of the motion should be amended by the insertion after the word "industry" of the words "and cultivation of tobacco." I am sure that Senator Pearce desires that his motion should cover an inquiry into the cultivation of tobacco; but he must admit that there is some force in my remarks that it is only by stretching the meaning of the motion, as he has framed it, that it can be held to cover any inquiry into the industry prior to the stage when tobacco has become a mercantile commodity, and is handled for manufacture or sale. I am prepared to move the insertion of the words to which I have referred; but if the honorable senator will move such an amendment himself I shall be satisfied.

Senator PEARCE.—I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Senator MILLEN. — I should like to have some assurance as to the way in which the motion will be submitted to the Senate. I do not know whether it will be submitted paragraph by paragraph, or whether it will be necessary for me to move to strike out the third paragraph. If it is necessary that I should move such an amendment I shall be prepared to do so; but that will not be necessary if the motion has been drafted in such a way as to allow of its being submitted to the Senate in paragraph form. If the Deputy President will be kind enough, before I sit down, to indicate how he proposes to submit the motion, I shall be able to decide whether it will be necessary for me to move the elimination of the third paragraph.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—There being two questions involved in the motion, I shall consider it a complicated one, and shall put it in the manner suggested by Senator Millen.

Senator MILLEN.—In that case it will not be necessary for me to move the omission of the third paragraph, and I shall content myself with voting against it when it is submitted. Do I come now to what, to my mind, is the crux of the whole position. In approaching this question of the nationalization of the industry, I am brought face to face with a question which I am afraid we are too often inclined to overlook in much of the legislation brought before us, and that is the question whether the proposal submitted is constitutional. I may be met at once with the statement that it is not material whether it is constitutional or not, seeing that this is merely a proposal for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into it. But I cannot conceive of anything more like shirking our responsibility, more degrading to the Senate, or more childish in itself, than to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into something which we have not the right to deal with by legislative enactment. I shall be as brief as I can; but it is obvious that a matter of this kind, which is not only of great importance in itself, but of considerable complexity, is not one which can be hurried over lightly. Further, I look upon it as one reason for addressing the Senate at some length on this motion that the question involved is not merely that of a tobacco monopoly. It must be borne in mind that this represents the first concrete instance of an attempt to encroach upon what are States rights and States prerogatives. If, as I think I can show, there is no power under the Constitution enabling the Commonwealth to carry on an industry, that that is a prerogative of the States, it is essential to the proper discharge of the responsibilities which rest on us, and to our individual and collective dignity, that we should refrain from asserting any right to operate in the domain secured by the Constitution to the States. On that point there is further evidence of the great gain which has resulted in the consideration of this matter from the delay which has taken place. Senator Pearce, when he first brought this matter before the Senate, was absolutely emphatic in his assurance that we had the constitutional power to do what he proposes. The honorable senator is not certain to-day. He will not to-day affirm, as he did when he first introduced the matter, that there is absolute constitutional warrant for doing what he proposes. The honorable senator was at first emphatic that it was constitutional to carry out his wishes. A little later he is wavering; he is inclined still later to admit that it might be a matter of some doubt; and finally he finishes up by saying that, in view of the doubt, we should appoint a Select Committee to take evidence and try to solve it. This shows that even the honorable senator in charge of the motion entertains grave doubts as to whether we have a constitutional warrant for nationalizing this or any other industry. It is in the hope of completing a conversion which has apparently commenced, and because of the great importance of the subject, that I propose to refer to a few constitutional authorities to see if I can, even at the eleventh hour, convince the honorable senator of the unconstitutional character of the proposal he submits, and in the hope, gradually becoming fainter, that the Senate will refrain from appointing a Select Committee to inquire into a project when it must know that it has no constitutional warrant for giving effect to it. I have been surprised, in reading through the speeches made by Senator Pearce, to find that one who has been so intimately associated with Federation from its earliest days, should have fallen into a grave and fundamental error as to what is the basis of the Constitution under which we, politically, live. It is quite evident that Senator Pearce has not yet grasped the wide distinction which marks our Constitution, following largely, as it does, that of the United States, as compared with that of Canada. The honorable senator's error is shown by the interpretation he seeks to read into those simple words "the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth," forming the introductory portion of section 51. The interpretation which Senator Pearce gives to these words, if carried out literally, would simply mean that the Federation can legislate upon any subject which Parliament chooses to think necessary for "the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth." He absolutely denies that the powers of the Commonwealth are limited to the thirty-nine articles which are set out in section 51. It is somewhat difficult to speak to empty benches, and I beg to draw your attention, sir, to the state of the Senate. [Quorum formed.] It is curious that Senator Pearce, in his efforts to bolster up an opinion which appears to be necessary to him for the maintenance of his case, should have quoted a number of constitutional authorities, every one of which, I think, can be shown to be absolutely against the conclusion at which he arrives. This is a remarkable instance of a man who, having, first of all, formed an opinion, immediately seeks to turn all facts and authorities to the support of that opinion. The honorable senator referred to a quotation from remarks by Mr. Justice Clarke; and I invite honorable senators to note with what unflinching regularity every one of the authorities relied on by Senator Pearce is absolutely fatal to his case. I shall not trouble the Senate with the rather long quotation from Mr. Justice Clarke, but merely read the words in which Senator Pearce summarized the quotation, and, I think, fairly enough—

The words ("peace, order, and good government,") either mean that we have the power to legislate for those purposes, except where we are expressly forbidden, or, except the power is expressly reserved to the States, or their insertion was unnecessary.

That is an affirmation that we have the power to legislate beyond the expressed thirty-nine articles in section 51, or that the words, "peace, order, and good government," are unnecessary. As elucidating the argument to which I wish to address myself a little more fully, let me point out that the honorable senator appears to have ignored altogether the vast difference between our Constitution and that of Canada. Here all power is reserved to the States, except that expressly and specifically transferred to the Federation; whereas in Canada, all power rests in the Central or Federal Government, except that power which is specifically and expressly transferred to the States. That being so, there seems to be no doubt that we are limited absolutely and entirely to the articles set out in section 51. Yet Senator Pearce, because none of the thirty-nine articles expressly provided for the carrying on of any industry, seeks to draw some comfort from the words, "peace, order, and good government," and to contend that those words give power to legislate on anything we believe to be necessary for the welfare of the Commonwealth. Let me show the error of that position. If there is one point on which the Constitution is clear, it is, I think, that the Federation is absolutely powerless outside the powers expressly transferred from the States. One of the frequent sources of trouble in the early days of most Federations has been in determining exactly where the limit of one authority ends, and the other commences. But it has never been disputed in America that the powers of the Federation there are limited to the transferred powers. I venture to think that Senator Pearce, in quoting the words, "peace, order, and good government," has dissociated them from words in the context which absolutely qualify them. The words on which Senator Pearce relies are in the first portion of section 51—

The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, with respect to—

Then are enumerated the thirty-nine articles. Senator Pearce selects the words "peace, order, and good government," shutting out the other words, "subject to this Constitution," just as he shuts out the words which follow, viz., "with respect to." The section as a whole does not provide that Parliament shall have power to make laws for "peace, order, and good government"—nothing of the kind. The section provides that the Parliament shall have power, "subject to this Constitution," to make laws for the "peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth," and then come the words, "with respect to," followed by the thirty-nine articles. It is to be observed that this limitation, so clearly and sharply set to the powers of the Federation, is repeated in numerous other places throughout the Constitution. Senator Pearce said that if the words "peace, order, and good government" do not imply some power other than those set out in the articles, they are superfluous and unnecessary. My answer is that if the words mean an unlimited power to legislate on anything that may be regarded as for the "peace, order, and good government" of this country, and are not limited by the thirty-nine articles, why are the thirty-nine articles enumerated? Why does the section not simply read, "The Parliament shall have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth"?

Senator DOBSON.—Even then the laws would be subject to the Constitution.

Senator MILLEN.—I am leaving those words out.

Senator DOBSON.—But I think those words would have to be implied.

Senator MILLEN.—Senator Pearce suggests that the words "peace, order, and good government" either gives us power beyond the thirty-nine articles, or they are unnecessary. But if they mean that we may go beyond the thirty-nine articles—if they give us unlimited power—why are the articles enumerated? There would have been no Federation if there had not been the qualifying words. I pass now to the sharp limitation placed on our legislative powers. In the course of my argument, I shall use, as far as I can, every section of the Constitution, and every authority quoted by Senator Pearce, because I require nothing better to show the fallacy of his argument. Let us turn to article xxxi. of section 51. This provides that we may legislate with respect to—

The acquisition of property on just terms from any State or person, for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws.

Senator Pearce laid some stress on this article as proving that we have the power to acquire the tobacco monopoly. The article gives power for the "acquisition of property on just terms from any State or person." For what? The "peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth"? Not at all. There is a limitation. We have power to secure the "acquisition of property on just terms from any State or person, for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws." There again is a sharp limitation. If it had been intended to mean, as Senator Pearce has represented, that we have unlimited power to legislate in any direction in which it appears to us the "peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" demands, why do those limitations run throughout the Constitution? We have only power to legislate, or even to acquire property, under the section where that property is required "for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws." Curiously enough, this is one of the sections of the Constitution brought forward by Senator Pearce in order to show that we have power to legislate outside the Constitution. Senator Pearce also quoted article xxxix. of section 51, and I admit that it was surprising to me to find the honorable senator appealing to those articles for support of his contention that we have power beyond that there prescribed. Every authority cited by the honorable senator seems to repeat and confirm the limitations and prescriptions which are around us in regard to the extent to which we may, or may not, legislate. Article xxxix., following, of course, the preamble to the section, gives power to legislate on—Matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament, or in either House thereof, or in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in the Federal Judicature, or in any department or officer of the Commonwealth.

If that article proves anything, it proves that we are absolutely bound by the thirty-nine articles, and not, as the honorable senator desires to show, that we have any power beyond. If the words "vested by this Constitution" had been omitted, the honorable senator might have contended that we had a roving legislative commission. But turn where we may in the Constitution, we find ourselves hedged about sharply, and in the most pronounced fashion. Though we have ample sovereign power, as wide as it is possible to conceive, it is in regard to a very strictly limited number of subjects; and the subject on which Senator Pearce desires to legislate is not one of those set out in section 51. I think it must be held that our powers are limited to the various subjects for legislative action which have by this section been transferred from the States to the Federation. If it will be admitted that we are limited to these transferred powers, then I ask whether the power of carrying on manufactures and industries was one of the powers transferred, and, if so, where and how was it transferred? It may be presumed that every one will readily admit that, prior to Federation, the States had an absolute right to manufacture if they pleased. There can be no doubt that any individual State had unquestionable power to start any industry, any manufactory, or any distributing business which it might choose to carry on. If that power did rest in the States, it must rest there to-day, unless it has been specifically transferred. That it rests there unless transferred is made clear by section 107, which says—

Every power of the Parliament of a Colony which has become or becomes a State, shall, unless it is by this Constitution exclusively vested in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, or withdrawn from the Parliament of the State, continue as at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or as at the admission or establishment of the State, as the case may be.

That express and wise provision is the very basis of the Federation. I submit that prior to Federation the power of carrying on manufactures and industries was with the States. If it has been transferred, I ask for the proof of the transference. There is nothing in the thirty-nine articles, not even by implication, to say that it has been transferred. Therefore it has not been transferred, but still remains with the original repositories—the States. For us to legislate in what is unquestionably and constitutionally their domain is to do something which would be not only wrong in itself, but pernicious in its ultimate effects, and possibly produce between the States and the Federation friction, which I am sure we would all deplore. It is rather curious that Senator Pearce, who sought to show that we have power to carry on an industry, does make a little concession to the principle of States rights, does show a little inclination to occasionally recognise the binding power of the Constitution, when he admits that we could not take over the management of the mines of the States because they are reserved to the States. Where are they so reserved? In the Constitution there is no reservation in regard to mines that is not also a reservation in regard to every other State power. There is no list of subjects reserved to the States, because that was not necessary. All power remains with the States, except with regard to the thirty-nine transferred subjects. I challenge Senator Pearce to show that in the Constitution there is a reservation to the States of power in respect to mines which is not also a reservation in respect of the right to carry on the business of manufacturing or distributing. If it is constitutional for the Federation to carry on manufactures, it is also constitutional for the Federation to interfere with the management of mines, for the power which secured to the States their original rights over mining and such matters is exactly the same as the power which secures to them the right they originally had of entering upon trade and commerce in all its various forms. In dealing with this aspect of the question, Senator Pearce seemed to find some little comfort from the quite imaginary difference between the possession of a power by a State and the exercise of the power by the State. Speaking of manufacturing, he said—

This is a domain that has not been touched upon by the States authorities.

That is burking the whole question. Whether a State possesses a power or not is one thing; and whether it chooses to exercise the power or not is another thing. The honorable senator will see that the objection he takes—that the States have never exercised this power—could be taken against the Commonwealth to-day, with regard to many subjects upon which it has not yet legislated. It might be said that we have no power to deal with quarantine and light-houses, because we have not legislated regarding them. But that fact does not destroy our power in the slightest degree. It is still ours, and unquestionably we can legislate whenever we see fit. We are proceeding to deal with copyright, but we have not yet dealt with weights and measures, or with marriage and divorce, or with a variety of subjects. Will Senator Pearce, when a Bill is brought forward, contend that we have no right to deal with those subjects, because our powers, having been dormant, have ceased to exist? Yet that is exactly the point he raises with regard to the power of the States to carry on the manufacture of tobacco, or any other commodity. When he brought forward that remarkable statement, Senator Playford, with that point which always marks his interjections, said—

Senator Millen.

The States could manufacture tobacco and cigars.

Senator Pearce replied—

In taking over these powers we should not be interfering with any powers which the States have exercised.

He does not deny that the States possess the powers, but merely says that they have not exercised them. In other words, he contends, if his language means anything, that, because the powers have been allowed to lie dormant, therefore, the Federation can step in and take them. Nothing more destructive of the very basis of our Constitution than that was ever uttered, either inside or outside these walls. I think Senator Pearce began to recognise the extraordinary doctrine he was promulgating, because following the quotation I have just made, Senator Playford again returned to the charge with this question—

But we should be depriving the States of their right to manufacture tobacco and cigars which they have at present?

What was Senator Pearce's reply? He found the question too puzzling to answer, and, therefore, he brushed it aside, and proceeded to quote a statement from an author which had no reference to it. He ignored the unpleasant truth, which possibly was the wisest thing for him to do—and commenced his next sentence by saying, "There is a sentence from a writer on the United States Constitution, Ashley," which he proceeded to quote, and which had no reference to the very pertinent question put to him. In view of the fact that he retreated under the cover of silence from that question, he must recognise that his position is absolutely untenable. Does he expect the Senate to appoint a Select Committee to consider the advisability of doing something, the unconstitutionality of which he is beginning to recognise? No matter how desirable it may be—if it were fifty thousand times more desirable than he contends it is—surely that is no justification for us to attempt to do that which the Constitution expressly forbids? One of the many errors in which the honorable senator fell was in affirming that this is a domain into which the States have not yet entered. That is absolutely incorrect. It is not a question of whether they have entered into the domain of the manufacture of tobacco, because that article is a mere incident in the situation. The point is, Have the States entered into the domain of manufacturing; and I affirm that they have. Victoria has brick-works, while New South Wales, in addition to clothing factories, has a dock, which is prepared to manufacture as well as repair vessels, for private persons as well as for the Government. These are proofs that the States have—modestly, it may be—entered into this domain. The facts I mention afford conclusive proof, if it were required, that, prior to Federation, the States had the right to carry on industry of any kind. The Constitution is absolutely silent as to its transfer, and, therefore, we may assume that the power still remains with the States. If the States have that power, it is evident that they may exercise it at any time with regard to not merely tobacco, but a variety of articles. Victoria has just started a brick factory. If Senator Pearce can prove that it is constitutional for the Commonwealth to start a tobacco factory, it must be equally constitutional for the Commonwealth to start a brick factory. He wants a monopoly in the manufacture of tobacco, and presumably he would want a monopoly in the manufacture of bricks. What is he going to do with Mr. Bent and the Victorian brick-works? It is quite evident that the very fact that those State brick-works are in existence demolishes at once the slightest pretence that can be advanced for the contention that the Federation has any power to carry on these industries. I shall admit that there is no specific prohibition against the Commonwealth carrying them on. But my answer to that objection is that no specific prohibition is necessary, for the simple reason that there is a general prohibition against the Commonwealth legislating on any subject outside the thirty-nine articles. Senator Pearce also said that not only was there no prohibition against the Federation undertaking this business, but that this question of industries was not specifically reserved to the States. It was not necessary to specifically reserve anything. All that was done was to specify the subjects of legislation which were transferred to Federal control. There was no need to specify other articles, because the residue of powers continued with the States, and amongst these was the right to carry on manufactures or industries of any kind. I pass to the rather ingenious contention which Senator Pearce founded on section 51 of the Constitution, which gives us power to legislate, amongst other things, with regard to old-age pensions. He argued that as we have power to legislate in regard to old-age pensions, we must necessarily have power to raise the money for their payment in any way we like. That is another of those extraordinary doctrines which could only have been formulated by a gentleman who was prepared to interpret anything as supporting the cause which he was advocating. It is quite true that the Federation has very wide powers of taxation, though they are not absolutely supreme, as is generally assumed. The Court has already taught us that there is a limit even to our powers of taxation. It is a limit in one direction only, but it still exists. It is useful to remember it, because no matter how desirable, in our opinion, it may be to go outside the Constitution, there is a power which will pull us within it again, and that is the Court. In proof of what I say, I remind honorable senators of the case, instituted by New South Wales against the Commonwealth, to test the point whether the Commonwealth could charge duties upon States' imports. It is a little matter, perhaps, but it shows that our powers of taxation are not absolutely unlimited; and it illustrates the danger of going outside the Constitution. Senator Pearce has made a great mistake by regarding all money, irrespective of the way in which it was raised, as taxation. He confuses taxation and profits—two very different things in the case of an individual, as they are in the case of a State. He quotes Professor Harrison Moore on the point. Here again I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the very authorities whom Senator Pearce quotes take the ground from beneath his feet, figuratively speaking. Yet he seemed to draw some measure of comfort from them. Professor Harrison Moore said that —

An exercise of the taxation power occurs whenever a compulsory contribution of wealth is taken from a person, private or corporate, under authority of the public's powers.

I invite attention to those words. But Senator Pearce twists that statement of Professor Harrison Moore's into these words—that Professor Moore holds—

That the whole matter of the raising of money in any form by the Government is covered—by the word "taxation." Professor Harrison Moore never said anything of the kind. He was not so stupid as to say that the whole matter of raising money in any form is covered by the word "taxation." What he did was to give a general definition of what taxation is. That is surely a widely different thing from saying that taxation means raising money in any way whatever. It is the very contrary. Professor Harrison Moore's definition of taxation absolutely excludes the idea of profit. Before passing from this aspect of the case, I should like to refer to other authorities quoted by Senator Pearce. In Hansard, he is reported as having quoted Judge Cooley. Judge Cooley was writing with regard to the Constitution of the United States. The words upon which Senator Pearce relied, and which I shall briefly quote, were Judge Cooley's comments upon the section of the American Constitution which corresponds with our own section. Judge Cooley said—

The import of the clause is that Congress shall have all the incidental and instrumental powers. To secure peace, order, and good government? Not a bit of it, but—

Congress shall have all the incidental and instrumental powers to carry into execution all the express powers.

It is a curious thing that Senator Pearce should have relied upon the authority of Judge Cooley, who expressed himself in such pellucid terms, showing clearly that we cannot strain the Constitution in order to draw to ourselves powers which the Constitution does not convey. Senator Pearce relied upon that authority for saying that the simple words "peace, order, and good government," give the right to legislate outside the thirty-nine powers expressly conveyed—the very thing which Judge Cooley set himself to show could not constitutionally be done. Says the Judge—nor is it a grant of any new power to Congress. But it is merely a declaration for the removal of all uncertainty that the means for carrying into execution those otherwise granted powers are included in the grant.

It neither enlarges any powers specifically given—

Senator Millen.

Surely that is clear enough—

That is an authority upon which I, as an opponent of Senator Pearce's motion, could rely. But the honorable senator seeks to widen the powers of the Constitution by quoting an authority as diametrically opposed to his opinion as Judge Cooley is. The same fatalistic course was apparently driving the honorable senator when he selected another author to support him. He quoted from Mr. Ashley. Mr. Ashley says—

No one in our day denies that the United States Government has a right to supplement the powers expressly stated in the Constitution.

If that were all, the authority quoted would have supported the honorable senator's contention. But Mr. Ashley goes on to use the words —

By such means as are reasonable and wise—

to carry out those powers.

Not one jot or tittle is added or can be added to powers expressly conveyed. All that is meant by the term "implied power," is that Parliament has and must have, by implication, the power necessary to give effect to the powers specifically conveyed in section 51. I must again draw attention to the state of the Senate. [Quorum formed.] It may be said that the fight is hopeless, as the Senate has made up its mind. I do not know, nor in one sense do I care, whether that is so or not; but I feel that in this matter, up to the last moment, it is my duty, and the duty of those who feel with me, to advance any argument which we think will influence a single vote with a view to prevent the Senate from making a regrettable mistake. For that reason, I wish to refer honorable senators to the information conveyed to us by Senator Playford, when he indicated the opinion given by his then colleague the Attorney-General, and by the Attorney-General of the Ministry preceding. It could not be contended that the opinions of the gentlemen to whom he referred were prejudiced by political considerations, or that there was any party influence at work. I would not suggest that gentlemen occupying the position of Attorney-General would allow themselves to be so influenced in giving their legal opinions. That consideration makes their view all the stronger. Moreover, it was given at a time when there was no possibility of their being ever unconsciously biased. And, further, any influence that might have affected Mr. Deakin would have induced him to regard the proposition favorably; because his opinion was given with regard to a proposal which appealed to his colleagues, namely, the Iron Bonus Bill. Not even the bitterest enemy of the Deakin Government could say with fairness and truth that it was other than a friend of that measure. I think it is a fair assumption, judging from its general policy, that the Barton Government was, if anything, inclined rather to favour the course outlined by Senator Pearce, not with regard to this particular industry, but with regard to industries generally, than to oppose it. Now what did Mr. Deakin say? I shall not go through the whole of the long letter which he wrote, but I desire to invite the attention of honorable senators to the two or three more pertinent sentences contained in it, because they seem to me to sum up the position so accurately, and yet so forcibly, that I venture to say that they will stand with us for all time as an admirable and unchallengeable exposition of the powers which are ours by right, and also of the limitation placed upon those powers by the Constitution. Mr. Deakin's letter was written to Mr. Kingston, and I remind honorable senators that Mr. Kingston was at the time acting as President of the Bonus Commission, and had written to Mr. Deakin, as Attorney-General, to know whether or not it was competent for the Federation to carry on an industry, such as the manufacture of iron. Of course, the proposition here is the manufacture of tobacco, but it will be obvious to anybody that whatever limitation there is with regard to the manufacture of iron must be a limitation or prohibition against the manufacture of any other article. Therefore, the principles laid down here apply with equal force and validity to the proposition now before the Senate. Mr. Deakin wrote—

Dear Mr. Kingston,

You ask for my opinion for the information of the Bonus Commission as to the powers, if any, of the Commonwealth to establish iron works.

In my opinion no such power is included in the express gift of legislative power to the Federal Parliament.

The trade and commerce power, vast though it is, does not appear to extend to production and manufacture—which are not commerce.

I interrupt the quotation here, to say that Senator Pearce laid great stress on the trade and commerce sub-section. The honorable senator seemed to think that, under it, because the United States of America could build railways, we could manufacture tobacco. He quite overlooked the vast difference between trade and commerce and manufacture. Mr. Deakin points it out in the next line of his letter. He says—

Commerce only begins where production and manufacture end.

He quotes here a legal decision in the case of Kidd v. Pearson, a United States case; but, without referring to these authorities, honorable senators will recognise at once that crisp distinction drawn by Mr. Deakin.

Senator GIVENS.—Is there not often exchange between production and final manufacture?

Senator MILLEN.—Undoubtedly, but that does not affect the principle. It is a curious thing that Senator Pearce, who made a great deal of research in this matter, and who went to Webster for a definition of "commerce," did not also go to Webster for a definition of "manufacture." If the honorable senator had done so, he would have seen what Mr. Deakin so admirably points out, that, while the trade and commerce section carries us to the point of commerce, the commerce only begins where production and manufacture end.

Senator STEWART.—We can sell boots, but we cannot make them; is that it?

Senator MILLEN.—No.

Senator GIVENS.—That is commerce.

Senator MILLEN.—It is commerce, but I am not saying that we have the right to sell boots. The whole of our powers are limited in this way: If the States had the right to sell boots before Federation was accomplished—and they had—then unless honorable senators can show that the power to make and sell boots or to make and sell articles, which the States might prior to Federation make and sell, has been conveyed by the Constitution to the Commonwealth, that power still rests with the States.

Senator STEWART.—Could we not make boots for our own use?

Senator MILLEN.—Possibly we could, just as we could make arms or ammunition for ourselves, as the power to do that is necessary to carry out the power with respect to defence expressly given to us under the Constitution.

Senator MATHESON.—That power is not necessary, because we can buy those things.

Senator MILLEN. — The honorable senator could not have caught what I said. I did not say that it was necessary that we should make those articles.

Senator MATHESON. — The honorable senator said that power was necessary to carry out the power with respect to defence given by the Constitution.

Senator MILLEN. — I said that the power to make arms and ammunition is a necessary power co-incident with the power given with respect to defence.

Senator MATHESON.—And I contend that it is not necessary, because we can purchase those things.

Senator MILLEN.—Does the honorable senator admit that, as a Commonwealth, we can manufacture arms or ammunition?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, but at the present moment it is not necessary or expedient.

Senator MILLEN.—I will leave it at that, if the honorable senator recognises that in certain circumstances it might become absolutely necessary for the Commonwealth to manufacture arms and ammunition.

Senator DOBSON.—The power with respect to defence is given to the Commonwealth exclusively.

Senator MATHESON.—But not the power to manufacture firearms.

Senator MILLEN. — Do I understand Senator Matheson to contend that the Federal Government have not the power to manufacture firearms?

Senator MATHESON.—On the contrary, I contend that the power to manufacture firearms is identical with the power to manufacture tobacco.

Senator MILLEN. — Will the honorable senator tell me under which of the thirty-nine articles in section 51 of the Constitution the power to manufacture tobacco, previously enjoyed by the States, has been transferred to the Commonwealth?

Senator MATHESON.—Will Senator Mil- len say which sub-section transfers to the Commonwealth the right to manufacture guns?

Senator MILLEN.—Are we not given power with respect to defence?

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly; but the other power is not a necessary sequitur.

Senator DOBSON.—Every decision in the United States shows that it is.

Senator MATHESON.—That has nothing to do with us.

Senator DOBSON.—Our Constitution is built on that of the United States.

Senator MILLEN.—It is curious to have one honorable senator quoting from the United States Constitution, and supporting the contention with respect to decisions under that Constitution, and another honorable senator saying that the United States Constitution has nothing whatever to do with us. I am astonished to hear any one who knows anything about the Constitution, and who must know that its fundamental principles are identical with those underlying the Constitution of the United States, saying that decisions given in the United States as to the interpretation of the Constitution of that country have no bearing, or throw no light, on the working of our own. It is to me deplorable—

Senator STYLES.—It is.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not even except Senator Styles, who ought to know better. It is to me deplorable that honorable senators should give expression to utterances of that kind, which, honestly speaking, I think they would scout in their sober moments. Mr. Deakin in his letter goes on to say something which has a bearing on Senator Matheson's interjection. I have no wish to quote the whole of the letter, but honorable senators will see the application this has to the point with which I am dealing. Mr. Deakin goes on to say—

The manufacture of iron may be incidental to the execution of many such powers, e.g., defence or the construction of railways. The Commonwealth might clearly undertake the manufacture of any goods for its own use; and probably if it did so, and it were incidentally advantageous to the interests of the economical working of the undertaking that it should also manufacture for other consumers, such manufacture would also come within its implied powers. Except as above, it does not appear that any power to establish and conduct manufactures can be implied from the Constitution.

I say that these remarks of Mr. Deakin are going to stand side by side with the decisions of Judge Cooley and other eminent American authorities that I have quoted, for the benefit of those whose duty it will be later on to interpret the Constitution. These opinions are absolutely sound and absolutely clear, and they were given in circumstances which show that the author of them was free from any consideration due to any party or public crisis, and was in a position to judge on the points submitted to him coolly and impartially, and entirely upon the wording of the Constitution itself. Mr. Deakin is not alone. We have another opinion from his successor as Attorney-General, a much shorter one, and so short that I may as well read it. He states—

You ask me—Has the Commonwealth power to establish the manufacture of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, close all present establishments, and prevent private persons in future manufacturing of such articles.

This question appears to me to be governed, with the exception mentioned below, by the opinion given by Mr. Deakin on the 18th July, 1903, to Mr. Kingston, President of the Royal Commission on the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill in connexion with the establishment of iron works by the Commonwealth. The text of that opinion is printed at page 184 of the report of the Commission.

That is the opinion with which I have already dealt—

With that opinion I entirely agree. The only difference between the iron industry and the tobacco industry, so far as regards the principles there laid down, seems to be that it is not easy to conceive how the manufacture of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes can be incidental to the execution of any of the express legislative powers of the Commonwealth.

With regard to the manufacture of iron, I quoted the portion of Mr. Deakin's opinion which gives, if any can give, a colouring to the contention of the supporters of this motion. I did that in all fairness, but this opinion of the later Attorney-General makes it quite clear that, while incidentally it might be held that the manufacture of iron was necessary to the proper exercise of the power with respect to defence conferred by the Constitution on the Commonwealth, it is not possible, by the hugest stretch of imagination, to suppose that the power to manufacture and sell cigars is necessary to the carrying out of any of the powers expressly conveyed to the Commonwealth under section 51.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Who gave the last opinion which the honorable senator quoted?

Senator MILLEN.—It was given by Senator Drake, when Attorney-General, and it was given expressly in connexion with the original motion on this subject submitted by Senator Pearce. I stated just now that it was a great pity that Senator Pearce, when devoting so much time to hunting up authorities which suited his purpose, or which he thought did so, did not consult Webster's Dictionary for a definition of the word "manufacture," as well as of the word "commerce." I now draw attention to the distinction which Mr. Deakin made, in other words but with equal suggestiveness. It is interesting to compare Webster's Dictionary interpretation with that of Mr. Deakin. Webster's Dictionary, as quoted by Senator Pearce, defines "trade" as—"Specifically: The act or business of exchanging commodities by barter, or by buying and selling for money; commerce; traffic; barter." Webster's definition of "manufacture" is—"The operation of making wares, or any product by hand, by machinery, or by other agency." Had Senator Pearce turned from "trade" and "commerce" to the word "manufacture," he would have seen at once that "trade" and "commerce" do not include the same subjects, or the same acts, that are covered by the word "manufacture." The honorable senator would have been able to understand more clearly than he now apparently does, what Mr. Deakin meant when he said—"Commerce only begins when production and manufacture end."

Senator STEWART.—The honorable senator surely does not agree with that?

Senator MILLEN.—I must agree with the authorities which Senator Pearce quoted, and the definitions I give are those to be found in Webster's Dictionary.

Senator STEWART.—Webster is dead.

Senator MILLEN.—There are honorable senators here—iconoclasts in their way—who refuse to accept any authority—who tell us very candidly that, while they submit to reason, they will not bow the neck to mere authority. On occasions, however, when it suits, those honorable senators appeal to authority; and Senator Pearce, in this connexion, relies on Webster, though when I turn to the same authority, a colleague of Senator Pearce asks in other words—"Who pays any attention to Webster?" The authorities quoted by those honorable senators appear to be like nine pins—set up only to be knocked out as it suits the players. If the honorable senators are happy in that proceeding, I do not suppose it hurts Webster, and I very much doubt if it hurts even Mr. Deakin, who is not yet dead, and, I hope, will not be dead for very many years. Bearing on the sharp distinction set out by both Webster and Mr. Deakin between trade and commerce and manufacture, it is interesting to note that Webster gives a list of the synonyms of the word "commerce." The synonyms set out are "trade, traffic, dealings, intercourse, interchange, communion, communication." In no way is "manufacture" suggested as a synonym. I have looked into this matter as thoroughly and impartially as I can, and I feel bound to say, I have not yet met a single argument which disposes of the contention supported by Webster, and the legal and other authorities quoted by Senator Pearce, that the trade and commerce section of our Constitution cannot be held to cover the manufacture, sale, and distribution of goods. I have already said that I am in sympathy with the first two clauses of the motion, with the slight alteration I have suggested. But I ask honorable senators, if they are at all impressed with my argument, whether they think there is reason in the assertion that the creation of a Commonwealth tobacco monopoly would be constitutional? I ask honorable senators to refrain from appointing a Select Committee to inquire into a matter concerning which we have no earthly business. To do so would be to proclaim to the Commonwealth that we know absolutely nothing of the provisions of the Constitution—would invite ridicule, and justly so, from any student of constitutional history, and bring down on us the just condemnation of the press.

Senator GIVENS.—Especially of the free-trade press of Sydney.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not know that the free-trade press of Sydney would condemn the proposal more than would the journals which sometimes venture to kick the honorable senator, and at other times to pat him on the back. To me it is immaterial what the free-trade press says. What I am concerned about is whether my arguments are sound, or whether it can be shown that there is power to do what Senator Pearce desires. Even Senator Pearce expresses a doubt as to whether we have the constitutional power to create such a monopoly; and when the author and father of this doubtful infant takes up that position, surely it is time for honorable senators to call a halt, and to determine, before proceeding further, whether or not the contentions which I have advanced, as to the constitutionality of the proposal, are correct. For the present, I pass from the constitutional aspect of the question, with a view to saying a word or two as to the existence of the alleged monopoly.

Senator GIVENS.—I thought the honorable senator was going to call a halt.

Senator MILLEN.—When I have convinced a sufficient number of honorable senators of the error of their way, I may be justified in calling a halt. I propose now to deal briefly with the alleged existence of a monopoly and with the methods, operations, and possible effects of trusts on industry. Then I propose to deal with the possibility of our controlling a monopoly by legislation, and to make a suggestion or two as to the means we should take for dealing with trusts in general. We may fairly take it that there is sufficient evidence to justify the assertion that a combination of some kind exists. Knowing what we do of the history of trusts and combines elsewhere, it is only sound common-sense and good public policy to take the earliest opportunity to study the growth of trusts in Australia in their very inception. It would be foolish to wait until trusts were thoroughly established before we inquired into their operations and ramifications. No doubt a combine of some sort exists, but that it is not so pernicious or injurious as represented by Senator Pearce, I am willing to believe. It is inconceivable, in these days when ideas travel so rapidly from one part of the world to another, that trusts should not seek to raise their heads in Australia. It is, therefore, desirable, though not merely with regard to the tobacco industry, that we should make ourselves familiar with the methods and machinery employed, in order that we may know what particular form of legislation is necessary to curb and regulate trusts.

Senator DOBSON.—Has the honorable senator any authority to cite as to what power we have to control trusts?

Senator MILLEN.—I think that the section of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce gives us the power we require. A combination, if it exists for any purpose, exists, more or less, for the restriction of trade, and the power of the Federation to legislate for the removal of restriction is, I think, undoubted. I mistrust trusts and dislike monopolies as much as anybody does. I have been an opponent of monopolies all my life; at any rate, ever since I was old enough to understand what they meant. It is a matter of great pleasure to me to find that at last Senator Pearce is coming to my way of thinking in his abhorrence of monopolies. It is not always, when one has been battling for years in opposition to a pernicious doctrine, that one is cheered with the prospect of recruits from the other side. I hail with satisfaction the evident conversion of Senator Pearce, and, I presume, many of his followers.

Senator GIVENS.—When did the honorable senator initiate a crusade against trusts?

Senator MILLEN.—I never claimed to initiate the crusade, and the honorable senator is quite mistaken.

Senator GIVENS.—Then the honorable senator worked only in the ruck behind.

Senator MILLEN.—If the honorable senator means that I was only a member of the rank and file, he is perfectly right; I never claimed, like himself, to be a born leader of men—into mischief. It is not just to the parties who may be concerned in the "combine," or advantageous to the cause of those who seek for an inquiry into its operations, to overstate the case in any way. It might be useful for the purposes of platform work to draw a graphic picture of imaginary evils, but in a purely deliberative body like the Senate it weakens the case if statements are made without foundation. I wish to deal now with the question whether, if it was constitutionally possible for us to engage in this industry, it would be desirable to do so. I do not propose to go through the list of figures which Senator Pearce has presented, because in the first place it would be unprofitable, as their author admits that they are largely estimates. As they are estimates dealing with enormous operations, and made by one who, I do not think, will claim special opportunities for acquiring information, they are necessarily loose. I do not mean that the honorable senator has purposely put forward figures knowing them to be wrong, or doubting their accuracy. But I submit that it is utterly impossible for any one without special facilities for obtaining actual data to submit a balance-sheet, as Senator Pearce has attempted to do, which would be of any value in guiding the Senate to a decision. I wish to justify my act in challenging the figures by reference to one or two of them. If I can show, as I think I can, that the honorable senator has grievously erred in some particulars, it will justify my invitation to the Senate to discard altogether the financial result which he worked out. First of all, let me take the percentage which he allows for the cost of distribution. The figures he put forward were, presumably, intended to show the cost of purchase and manufacture of the article, assuming it to be a State monopoly, and the profit to the Commonwealth after disposing of the product. Senator Pearce allowed 15 per cent. for the cost of distribution, but I venture to say that the cost of distributing tobacco, sold ultimately, as it is, in small parcels, approaches more nearly to 35 than to 15 per cent. That may seem a somewhat startling statement, but I shall attempt to justify it. I do not claim any more than Senator Pearce claims, to have any special channels of information, but I base that statement on an experience which is common to myself, and probably to many honorable senators. Frequently, not only for myself, but for a property to which I send rations and supplies three or four times a year, I purchase "Capstan" tobacco at 6s. and 6s. 6d. per lb. from the merchants. The retail price in the shops is 8s. a lb., or 6d. an oz. Discarding the 6s. tobacco, let me take the 6s. 6d. tobacco, and compare it with the 8s. tobacco. What the merchant sells at 6s. 6d., the retailer vendes at 8s., so that the retailer charges  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the wholesale price. But the merchant does not handle the tobacco for nothing. If he purchases, as he does, from the manufacturer, he gets a profit in some way or other. The usual rule, I believe, is to sell at a set price, allowing a rebate. I estimate that in this case the price to the merchant is the price at which he sells, that is, 6s. 6d. a lb., minus a discount. What that discount is I have no means of knowing, but I do not think that the merchants of Australia operate on a less turnover in these matters than 5 per cent. The  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. which is added to the merchant's price, and which is 50 per cent. more than Senator Pearce's estimate, is only the first item in the real cost of distribution. To that percentage I add my estimate of 5 per cent. for the merchant's profit, bringing the cost of distribution up to  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. But before it reaches the merchant there is an expenditure which has to come under the head of distribution, and that is the cost of freights. Made anywhere you like, the great bulk of tobacco, or any other manufactured article, has to pay for carriage by road, or by railway, or by water, probably all three, before it reaches the final point of distribution. It is impossible to estimate what the cost of carriage is, but it is one which honorable senators will see must considerably load the cost of distribution. I do not pretend to know what it is but there it is. To the 27½ I mentioned has to be added railway freights, plus bad debts and advertisements. When these factors are brought together, it will be found that the cost of distribution, instead of being 15 per cent., will approach very nearly to 35 or 40 per cent. I mention that fact to show the unreliability of the figures, which, no doubt in all good faith, Senator Pearce has submitted. It will be seen at once that if his estimate of the enormous profit which the Federation is to make out of the monopoly—£2,000,000—is built up in the same loose way, it will be a very dangerous one for the Senate to accept. Let us take another set of figures. He spoke of the profits from the industry as being £2,000,000. Senator Playford very shrewdly discounted that statement by quoting the evidence given by an expert in the business, who prepared a statement for presentation to the Victorian Committee on the monopoly in the manufacture of tobacco. The very fact that the State Parliament did appoint a Committee to consider that question confirms all I said as to the power to manufacture tobacco being a State right. I would ask any one who is genuinely desirous of arriving at the kernel of this matter to study the report of that Committee, and the evidence, particularly that which was given by Mr. Bruford. He showed that the selling-price in Victoria was 4s. 7d. for the best, and 3s. 6d. for the lower-grade tobacco. Let us compare those figures with Senator Pearce's average selling-price of 6s. per lb., the price on which he built up the profit of £2,000,000.

Senator GIVENS.—That expert was altogether wrong, because I have bought tobacco in every capital in Australia, and I have never got the best tobacco at 4s. 7d. a lb., or anything like that sum.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator overlooks the fact that he buys his tobacco in a retail store.

Senator PEARCE.—But the honorable senator mentioned a case just now where he paid 6s. 6d. a lb.

Senator MILLEN.—Yes. For the tobacco I smoke I pay 8s. a lb., but for every lb. of the kind I smoke I send away 20 lbs. for which I pay 4s. 3d. or 4s. 6d. a lb.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator said just now that he paid 6s. 6d. a lb.

Senator MILLEN.—Does the honorable senator insinuate that I told an untruth?

Senator PEARCE.—No; I wished to point out the inconsistency of the honorable senator.

Senator MILLEN.—I can buy Welcome Nugget tobacco from any merchant in Sydney at 6s. a lb., and the honorable senator knows what he pays for that tobacco in a store—6d. an oz. The honorable senator has built up his estimate of profit by taking the selling-price at 6s. a lb., and the cost of distribution at 15 per cent. But Mr. Bruford estimated that the profit to Victoria would have been £55,000 a year. Senator Playford showed that that was equivalent to a profit of £200,000 for the whole Commonwealth, or just one-tenth of Senator Pearce's estimate. In view of two or three figures I have given, I am absolutely justified in saying that not only is there nothing in his figures to suggest that we should accept them for our guidance, but we ought to regard them as suspicious, not because of any want of good faith on his part, but because they have been compiled loosely on what can only be described as largely guesses. The honorable senator made another error, and for this one I can find less excuse. He said that France made a profit of £15,000,000 a year out of this business, but at almost the same moment he stated that the population of France was 40,000,000, that the consumption was 2 lbs. of tobacco per head, or 80,000,000 lbs. per year, that the cost of manufacture was 9d. a lb., and the selling price 3s. 10d. a lb., leaving France a profit of 3s. 1d. If honorable senators will take the trouble to work out these figures they will see the error into which Senator Pearce has fallen.

Senator PEARCE.—All of which figures, the honorable senator might say, were taken from the report of the very Committee which he has been quoting.

Senator MILLEN.—I accept the figures, but I wish to show where the honorable senator's mistake occurred.

Senator PEARCE.—They were not the only figures as to France that I quoted.

Senator MILLEN.—I cannot deal with them all at once.

Senator PEARCE.—I thought that the honorable senator did not intend to quote the others?

Senator MILLEN.—The figures which the honorable senator gave only required checking to prove that one set or the other must be wrong. It is the duty of every honorable senator who intends to quote figures here to take the trouble to work them out, and see that they are correct. But the honorable senator has affirmed that France makes a profit of £15,000,000 a year out of this business. Had he worked out the figures on the basis of 40,000,000 of people consuming 80,000,000 lbs. of tobacco per annum, sold at the rate of 3s. 10d. a lb., and upon which France makes a profit of 3s. 1d., he would have found that instead of the profit being £15,000,000, it was £13,000,000.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable senator know that, as a matter of fact, £15,000,000 is the sum which is usually obtained?

Senator MILLEN.—The figures contradict the assertion.

Senator PEARCE.—Will the honorable senator say that France does not make a profit of £15,000,000?

Senator MILLEN.—She does not. The figures which I have taken from the official journal show that France has not made that profit.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable senator deny that that is the average?

Senator MILLEN.—Yes, I do.

Senator PEARCE.—What was the profit made in France last year?

Senator MILLEN.—I think I can tell the honorable senator.

Senator DOBSON.—How much does England make from Customs and Excise on tobacco?

Senator PEARCE.—She only makes £10,000,000 a year.

Senator MILLEN.—That is another inaccuracy. The official figures show that Great Britain, in 1901, obtained a revenue from tobacco of £12,813,578. In 1903, the revenue was £12,451,000, and in 1904, the last year for which I have official figures, the revenue was £12,627,000.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator will admit that there was a war tax in those years.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator jumps about all over the place. He now says that there was a war tax.

Senator PEARCE.—I took the average.

Senator MILLEN.—Which merely proves that you can, by adjustment, get, through Customs and Excise, from tobacco, nearly as much as the profit which France makes, in proportion to population. But what I wish to point out is this: The honorable senator put before the Senate a statement that France made a profit of £15,000,000, and that England obtained a revenue of £10,000,000. What is the position? I have shown, from the figures, that France does not make £15,000,000, and that England makes more than £10,000,000.

Senator PEARCE.—France received £16,000,000 last year.

Senator MILLEN.—The official figures for last year, 1904, were a trifle over £13,000,000.

Senator PEARCE.—That is not correct. The amount was £16,000,000 last year.

Senator MILLEN.—I will undertake to produce the official statement of the returns for the year 1904. But I come back to the point—why did not the honorable senator check his figures and ascertain where the error was?

Senator PEARCE.—Did the honorable senator check Mr. Bruford's figures?

Senator MILLEN.—There was nothing to check. I have simply taken his estimates.

Senator PEARCE.—Did the honorable senator check his figures as to the retail price?

Senator MILLEN.—No, because they come within my own knowledge.

Senator PEARCE.—He gave them because it suited his case.

Senator MILLEN.—The whole of the case of the honorable senator reeked with picked information. He even tried to twist and turn the constitutional authorities. In dealing with these figures, I have perhaps been led into the display of a little temporary warmth, but I can appeal to the Senate as to whether I did not approach the subject in all coolness and moderation, with a desire to ascertain how far the figures might be taken as an indication of whether or not the nationalization of the tobacco industry would be profitable. It is in that spirit that I shall continue the inquiry. Looking into this matter, quite apart from its effect upon the revenue of the country, it is not at all unreasonable to ask how it will affect both the people who manufacture tobacco and those who consume it. When Senator Pearce referred to the enormous profits made by France, it would only have been reasonable to tell us something about the wages paid. The cost of the tobacco, he has told us, is 9d. per lb. It is sold at 3s. 10d. per lb. I ask honorable senators to bear those figures in mind. The explanation is the rate of wages paid to the employes in the State factories. France, in 1902, employed 14,942 women, and the average wage was 3s. 3d. a day of ten hours. In the same year that she employed nearly 15,000 women she employed 1,746 men.

Senator PEARCE.—I suppose the honorable senator is aware that I took into consideration the difference in wages?

Senator MILLEN.—I think the honorable senator made an ample allowance. But when the big profit made by France is pointed out, it is only reasonable to recognise the low wages paid which enable her to obtain such a return.

Senator DOBSON.—If France paid reasonable wages it would probably bring the profit down lower than the amount which England gets from tobacco through Customs and Excise.

Senator MILLEN.—It would bring it down to considerably less.

Senator PEARCE.—I allowed a considerably larger amount for the cost of manufacture than the actual cost in France.

Senator MILLEN.—I know the honorable senator did. I do not know whether there is anything in the figures as to the persons employed in France which will appeal to the Senate. We quite recognise that in the altered conditions of society, female labour is becoming more general. Not only is that so because the conditions of society demand it, but also to a large extent because women themselves are seeking for opportunities in business to a greater extent than they did a few years ago. But, at the same time, I am not at all keen to see established, especially under the authority of Parliament, industries which in another country are employing 15,000 women to fewer than 2,000 men. In Austria the position is even worse. In the year 1902, Austria employed 36,000 females at the munificent wage of 10s. per week of fifty-two hours. She employed at the same time 4,377 men. That is, she employed one man to nine women. The men were employed at wages of 11s. 2d. a week of fifty-two hours. These figures are exclusive of boys and girls who, in the official statistics, are grouped under the head of apprentices. When we are invited to consider the profit which Austria makes as the result of the State ownership of the tobacco monopoly, it is not only fair, but essential, to bear in mind that she is making those profits as a result of the labour of 36,000 women at 10s. a week, and of 4,377 men who receive 11s. 2d. per week of fifty-two hours. It is easy to make profits when men and women are employed on terms of that kind. Now, I wish to summarize what I have just said by asking this question: Who is to benefit from the nationalization of the tobacco industry? It is not at all clear that the revenue would benefit. The difference between the sum which England receives from taxation on tobacco through the Customs, and the revenue which France collects, is not, after all, very large. It may be that France does receive considerably more than England, but that is not material. What we have to consider is this: That it would be competent for England, as it is for us, to raise additional revenue through the Customs from tobacco if we wished to do so. Further, there is this aspect of the question to consider. Is it conceivable that if an industry of this kind were in national hands we should make the enormous profit that Senator Pearce predicts? Is it at all reasonable to suppose that the employes would refrain from asking for the highest wages that we could possibly pay them? One of the main arguments of our Socialist friends is that a nation ought not to carry on business for profit, but for use. The very purpose of the nationalization of the industry is that the workmen may have better conditions and better pay, and that the consumer may get a better and a cheaper article.

Senator DOBSON.—The workmen would want to divide all the profits between them.

Senator MILLEN.—I think I shall be able to show that they would get all the profits. It is inevitable that if this industry is nationalized the large body of public servants employed in it would naturally present demands for more liberality in their remuneration. That would be the first inroad made upon the profits. And when we consider the small difference between the revenue from the industry and the profits derived from it in England and France, respectively, it is not an unfair assertion that Australia, from the mere stand-point of revenue, may serve her needs with greater safety and more elasticity—certainly with more certainty—by means of Customs and Excise duties, than she could ever hope to do by becoming a manufacturer and distributor of tobacco. The next point to consider is whether the employes would benefit—whether their conditions, under a State monopoly, would be better than they are to-day. I have shown that their position in France and Austria is not enviable. It is quite evident then that the mere nationalization of an industry will not of itself secure reasonable remuneration for the employes in that industry. If it is sought to nationalize this industry in the interest of the employes, I point out that their interest can be conserved very much better, and without jeopardizing the interest of the consumer, by means of wages boards and arbitration courts. It is not very long since the members of the party advocating this proposal for the nationalization of the tobacco industry were advocating wages boards and Arbitration Acts. Before these measures have been in operation sufficiently long to enable us to say by experience what their ultimate effect is to be, we find an absolute attempt made to get away from them. I say that if the members of this party had the faith in those measures which they professed when they advocated that they should be placed on the statute-book, they should admit that the position of the employes in this industry, under private employment, is or can be sufficiently safeguarded. Now as to the third party to the contract, the consumer. Here I compliment Senator Pearce on his charming candour. The honorable senator makes no pretence with respect to the fact that he does not intend any benefit to the consumer. He says—

I have no objection to people paying a high price for tobacco and cigars.

One does not need to be informed whether the person who makes such an observation is a smoker. No one who does smoke would view this phase of the question as one to be so easily disposed of. It is pleasant to know that the author of this proposal does not contemplate the slightest reduction in the price of tobacco to smokers. It is not the honorable senator's intention that they should get any benefit from the nationalization of this industry. Not only is there the sentence I have quoted to prove Senator Pearce's mind on this matter, but in the figures to which I have made reference the honorable senator proceeds on the assumption that, under a Federal monopoly of the industry, the consumer will pay 6s. per lb., which is exactly the price which he admits the consumer has to pay to-day. It is quite clear that Senator Pearce does not contemplate that the consumer is to get any benefit from this transfer of the business from private to public hands. It is also obvious that if he did contemplate any reduction in price as the result of giving effect to this proposal, he would have to lower his estimates, based on 6s. per lb. as the selling value, and his estimate of profit from the industry would be correspondingly reduced. It is as well that the great body of the people of this country who do smoke should quite understand that the whole of the benefits of this industry, when nationalized, are to be devoted, not to the revenue, or only partially to the revenue, and certainly not to the consumer. There is only one other channel, then, into which they can go. I am not at this stage quarrelling with or wishing to discuss the propriety of diverting the benefits of this industry into any particular channel, but I merely wish to point it out and emphasize it. An additional light, however, is thrown on the subject of the nationalization of industries by the proposal that is here made, because it will be seen that the first effort we have made to socialize an industry is introduced with a statement that it is not intended that the consumer shall get any benefit from the change.

Senator DOBSON.—How many qualities of tobacco will he have to choose from?

Senator MILLEN.—There would be no quality, but I will come to that point directly.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is not much quality in France or in Italy.

Senator MILLEN.—I have pointed out that the consumer is not to get any benefit, and the benefit to the State is doubtful. I should like here to make a short quotation to show what Mr. Bruford has to say on this point—

Under these circumstances it would be necessary to administer the tobacco monopoly in the interests of growers and makers.

A literal confirmation of the words I have been using.

In the hands of the State the administration could, without doubt, encourage local manufacture and culture. There is but one source from which to derive money, namely, the tax on the consumer, but the amount drawn can, according to the policy of the State in fixing prices for the sale of tobacco and the purchase of the leaf, be applied either to the assistance of the grower, to the State employes, or to the revenue; or it can be reduced in the interests of the consumer, or increased within certain limits to his detriment.

I think that is a very clear exposition of the case. He says that there is only one source from which we can obtain money to carry on the industry, and that is the consumer. Senator Pearce says that the consumer is not to get any benefit, and, therefore, so far as he is concerned, he would still have to pay a price which the honorable senator has spoken of as being excessive. The benefit is apparently to be divided between the State on the one hand, and the employes on the other. The honorable senator, of course, may contend, that the consumer is not at all injured, provided the price is not raised, and that, so long as he is charged no more than the price which he is charged to-day, he will have no cause to complain. I wish to direct the attention of the honorable senator to an interjection made during the recent debate. Senator Playford had been urging with regard to the combine that it had not raised the price, and, therefore, had not so far proved injurious to the consumer, when Senator McGregor interjected—

It might be injurious also if the price is not reduced as much as it ought to be.

If the existence of the combine is injurious because the price is not reduced as much as the circumstances of the trade will permit, surely that argument is equally potent when applied to the manufacturer of the article in the hands of the State? Whilst it might be admitted that Senator Pearce does not propose that more than 6s. per lb. should be charged for tobacco, I venture to say that, in the absence of any alteration of the Tariff, sooner or later, the consumer will be able to get tobacco at a lower price than that which now obtains, but under State control of the industry it is impossible that he can do so. In connexion with an interjection which Senator Pearce made just now as to the cost of tobacco and so on, I should like to point out that Mr. Bruford says—

The tobacco would therefore have to be sold to retailers at something over twice its cost price to realize the present revenue of £250,000 per year. This has reference to a statement I made just now when questioning Senator Pearce's estimate of £2,000,000. I wish to turn now to the effect which State control of the industry might have on the growth of tobacco. I admit at once that it is difficult to dogmatize on this question, as the growth of tobacco in Australia is not only surrounded with uncertainty as to its results, but with a great deal of contradiction in the statements made, and the experience of different individuals. Even in this debate we have had varying statements made—on the one hand that the grower of tobacco, owing to the action of the combine, can only get the miserable pittance of 4d. per lb. for his leaf; whilst on the same page of Hansard I find that another honorable senator interjected that he knew of colonial tobacco being sold in London at 2s. per lb. Any one coming here without any knowledge enabling him to reconcile these statements, would be absolutely puzzled. If the combine is here, and is enabled by its operations to force growers of tobacco to accept less than the market value, and to beat them down to 4d. per lb. for a superior article, why is it that the people who can get 2s. per lb. in London are not also beaten down?

Senator STYLES.—Was that the price for Australian leaf in London?

Senator MILLEN.—I cannot say, but the interjection came from Senator de Largie, who stated that he knew of Australian tobacco being sold in London at 2s. per lb. It appears to me that it is idle to blame the combine in this matter. That, like all other business concerns, they have a keen eye to the main chance, I am quite prepared to believe. The one fact that stands out with more prominence than anything else, in a matter of this kind, is that we need not believe that tobacco manufacturers are philanthropists. I believe that they view every turn they take solely in the light of the entries in their bank pass-book. That being so, we are confronted with the position that on every pound of colonial tobacco which they purchase, they can make the difference between the Excise duty on the local article and the Customs duty on the imported article. That amounts to 1s. 6d. per lb., and I decline to believe that the combine would wilfully throw away the advantage to them of 1s. 6d. per lb. if the local article offered to them reasonably met their requirements. It is quite evident that they cannot import tobacco leaf from America at 4d. per lb.—the price which we are told they pay for the local article. If, therefore, they have to pay a much higher price—and I think I am probably safe in saying that the cost of the imported leaf averages from 8d. to 10d. per lb.—and they can buy local leaf at 4d. per lb., it is obvious that they will make from 4d. to 6d. per lb. on every pound of colonial leaf they can work into their manufactured tobacco. The fact that they do not work in more local leaf is, to my mind, sufficient evidence that the locally-grown article lacks quality. That, I venture to say, is the experience of any one who has any knowledge of smoking. Whether we can lift the tobacco-growing industry on to a better footing or not, I hesitate to express an opinion. I hope it can be done. We have already sufficient knowledge that in limited areas in Australia we can grow excellent tobacco leaf, but whether, in view of the peculiar climatic conditions and the uncertainty of the seasons, Australia will ever become an extensive grower of tobacco, is a matter on which I hesitate, as I believe other honorable senators will do, to arrive at any final conclusion. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that very many systematic and strenuous efforts, supported by considerable sums of capital, have been made to grow tobacco leaf in Australia, and so far, I regret to say, that no tangible result has been achieved by the expenditure to which I have referred. I have pointed out that Senator Pearce is prepared to accept my suggestion, that it is advisable to extend the scope of the proposed inquiry to cover the growth of tobacco. If this Select Committee has any useful work at all to perform, I venture to say it will be in the direction of throwing some light on the conditions under which tobacco is grown, and in endeavouring to arrive at some evidence from practical and impartial persons as to the steps which ought to be taken to improve the condition of the growers. New South Wales, and I believe also Queensland, have employed experts from America. These experts have gone amongst the tobacco-growers and endeavoured to teach them to improve their modes of cultivation, but, up to date, the results are disappointing. It may be that the Committee, extending its investigations over more than one State, may discover the source of the trouble, and be enabled, as a result, to indicate a remedy. But one of the dangers of monopolizing the manufacture of tobacco, while we are, at the same time, endeavouring to encourage the growth of the leaf, is that, possibly, interests will come into conflict—that the interests of the growers and the interests of the State tobacco manufacturer may not tally. We should then be in the position that a claim could be made on the Government, in the interests of the growers, to receive tobacco held to be inferior, and thus, instead of inspiring the grower to produce a superior article, the latter would be induced to rest content with an inferior product, in the certain knowledge that the only buyer would be obliged to take it. Honorable senators must see that, at the present time, under the financial sections of the Constitution, we must, until 1911, return to the States a specified proportion of revenue. But for that proposal, a very large proportion of the revenue of the States would be absolutely at the disposal of the Commonwealth, and the States would be short to that extent. I do not mean to say that this, in itself, represents an insurmountable difficulty, but it is one of the problems associated with the transfer of the industry from private hands to public hands at the present juncture. If ever the system be adopted—and I do not think that likely, in view of the constitutional difficulties—it would be extremely undesirable, and unfair to the States, if any effort were made to effect the change until at least the financial relationships between the States and the Federation have been put on a clearer and more permanent basis. I now pass to a question of which we have heard a great deal lately, namely, the operations of this alleged combine. Before doing so, however, I should like to point out that the motion leaves me in some little doubt as to whether or not, in any proposal to transfer the industry to the Commonwealth, importation will be allowed to continue. If importation is allowed, further complications may arise with regard to the growers. There will always be a conflict between, on the one hand, consumers who wish for particular brands of tobacco and cigars, and, on the other hand, the growers, who wish to sell their increased crops every year to the national factory. At the present time, there is no difficulty, because the manufacturer and the merchant look after the requirements of their customers. If we have a national monopoly, I can quite conceive that the growing claim of the growers to have their increased products taken by the Government will sooner or later come into collision with the strong demand of consumers for certain brands of tobacco. When that takes place, all I can say, as one of the great army of consumers, is that I am afraid the consumers will suffer. A popular cry will be raised in this connexion; and, as probably a large number of people will be induced to go into the industry, there will be no market but the national factory for the crops. The grower will then say to the Government, "You have shut out all other people, and you are the only buyer; and the least you can do is to take the product, irrespective of the fact whether the crop be great or small." Under such circumstances, is it reasonable to suppose that the national factory, with enormous stocks, is likely to look very kindly on any project for importation? If this industry is once nationalized, it will simply mean that Australians will have to limit themselves to locally-grown tobacco; and those who have acquired a taste for other, and, I think, better brands, will be placed in the position of having to take the Government tobacco or give up the habit.

Senator STYLES.—Does the honorable senator not think that if tobacco were grown in large quantities, the quality would be much improved?

Senator MILLEN.—I should hope it would, but I must say that so far as I can see there is something wanting in our climate, or our soil, or in the aptitude of our people for this particular cultivation.

Senator STYLES.—In Victoria the curing, and not the growing, has been the difficulty.

Senator MILLEN.—I include the curing in the growing, and I believe that the former is the weak spot. Curing is a process which apparently requires a lot of close attention to detail, and I suppose that, if the average Australian has one fault more than another, it is that he generally goes on the principle, "It is near enough." That principle does not do in the tobacco industry, which requires very close attention at all stages of the curing process.

Senator STYLES.—Has that sort of thing not been said about other industries—the sugar industry for example?

Senator MILLEN.—I do not know any industry in Australia which has been so long under experiment, and which has developed so little without being utterly abandoned. We have had industries started, which, after a few years, have been abandoned; and that might be taken as an indication of their unsuitability to the country. The tobacco industry, however, has neither advanced nor failed, and that would seem to suggest that it is capable of improvement, because if the country had been absolutely unsuitable, the industry would have died long ago. The fact that the industry has not gone ahead, with the liberal difference between the import duty and the excise, suggests that there is something wrong, and that we have not yet put our hand exactly on the weak spot. As to the sort of tobacco which would be turned out by the national factory, I ask honorable senators to consider the quality of tobacco which is smoked in France. I know that some honorable senators will say that this tobacco must, at any rate, be good, or the people of that country would not have put up with it for so long. In my youthful days I lived on the coast of Kent, immediately opposite France, and one of the recreations of the boys there, who absented themselves from school without leave, or were not otherwise engaged in those exercises of which you, sir, no doubt have a lively recollection, was to run with local boatmen across to the French coast. Not once, but frequently have I seen those boatmen haul alongside any home-going vessel from abroad, and obtain tobacco, whereas they used to go to the ports of France, and never think of taking a pound back to England. There was ample opportunity to smuggle French tobacco, but it was never thought worth while. I was not at that time of sufficient age to speak of the merits of the tobacco; and I merely relate my experience many years ago as a boy. That experience is borne out by every one who has written on the subject, except the officials of France, who themselves control the industry, and whom I can hardly accept as unprejudiced witnesses. I should like to quote an article which I think will be accepted as an authority on the general opinion of the quality of French tobacco. This is a statement of Mr. W. A. Penn, published in 1901, as follows:—

Cigarette factories are situated at Paris, Bordeaux, Marseilles, Mortaux, Nancy, Tantes, and Toulon. The tobacco, which has been aptly described as consisting of scorched linen flavoured with assafoetida and glue, is very coarsely cut, more so than for the pipe of England, and is very dark. The resultant cigarette is indescribably horrible. English smokers fail to recognise it as tobacco. Yet of these cigarettes France smokes some 300,000 millions a year; in any form but that of the cigarette it would be intolerable. An Englishman will face unmoved the armies of France or the howlings of her mobs, but from the cigarette he flies apace. In the Paris Figaro, a year ago, "Nestor" recounted his success with this horrible weapon. "There are still too many Englishmen in Monte Carlo. Still, during my trip I had the pleasure of making one old Englishman's life a misery to him by smoking him out, with my strong French cigarettes, from the railway compartment in which he sat with me. He left the carriage half asphyxiated at Lyons, and I felt that Fashoda was, at any rate, partially avenged. Childish, no doubt, but one must do what one can." Childish it was not, must certainly; France has no more terrible weapon than her cigarette.

This account, of course, is more or less humorous.

Senator STYLES.—It was "sheep-wash" he was smoking.

Senator MILLEN.—That is all the people get in France.

Senator STYLES.—We should not be content with that.

Senator MILLEN.—But what I have read is an indication that when there is a big Government monopoly, and an impossibility on the part of the people to obtain their supplies elsewhere, there is removed the incentive which does tend in private hands to keep up quality to a reasonable level. In a paper called the Traveller, another writer states—

As is well known, the products of the State monopoly of France, with the exception of its higher priced cigarettes and smoking tobaccos, are hopelessly inferior. French cigars of domestic manufacture are the worst in Europe—those of Italy alone excepted. The truth appears to be that tobacco manufacture in France has gotten into a rut, and there is not a man in the Republic who is strong enough to pull it out. For so rich a country as France, its State monopoly in tobacco is but a poor revenue producer.

I could multiply quotations of the kind, but I think I have read enough to convince honorable senators that whatever may be said of the national monopoly in France from the stand-point of revenue, it is, at any rate, not satisfactory to the consumer. Of course, it may be asked why the French people do not uproot the system, and allow private enterprise to have its way. But the same difficulty confronts the French people which confronts us, when it is proposed to establish a State industry in Australia. One of the big restraining influences is the recognition of the fact that there are vested interests; and, as the abandonment of an industry of the kind by the State would estrange a great many people, the French Government hesitate to destroy the monopoly. It must be remembered that there are an enormous number of electors in France concerned in the maintenance of the industry. Every man who wishes to retail tobacco there has to obtain a licence, and each one, to some extent, becomes an upholder of the system. It is true that he may be only an individual, but he is a little centre of influence, which works for the maintenance of the present state of affairs. Apart from that, one can quite understand the French Government shrinking from parting with a business which produces such a large portion of the revenue. A stock argument used in the House of Commons, in regard to the duty on beer, is that, whatever may be the moral aspect of the tax, the Treasurer cannot afford to give it up. The Treasurer of France might reasonably shrink from a change which might ultimately work out, but which for a few years would probably dislocate its finances. When a motion, corresponding to this one, was being discussed elsewhere, the question was asked, "Is not the Senate the special guardian of States rights?" and the reply made was "Yes, and pays about as much attention to them as does the honorable member." It has been the invariable practice here for the President to check any remarks derogatory to the other Chamber; and one might have hoped that that House would have followed so excellent an example. A little while ago, I touched on what I regard as the overstating of the case against this combination. It is affirmed that the combination has absolute control of the retail traders, that it binds them to prices at which they are to sell, that it has stipulations and conditions which practically make them, as it were, its bond slaves. I venture to say that there is not one word of truth in that affirmation. What the combination does is only what is being done by every large mercantile firm the world over. It has been said that the retailers affirm that they are not at liberty to lower their prices. That is perfectly true. But when it is looked into, as I believe it will be by the Select Committee, it will be found that the arrangement by which retailers have fixed certain prices is one arrived at by their union. The combination simply sends out its trade lists and binds merchants, to whom it principally sells, not to undersell it with the retailers. All the evidence I can collect is clear on this point, that the combination has never sought to control the retail selling price. If that be a fact, it is regrettable that contrary statements should be made, which can only tend to inflame the passions of persons who may not view the matter as coolly as do the members of the Senate. I think I may reasonably conclude my remarks now. I have pointed out that this proposal is, in my opinion, an absolute violation of the Constitution; and that even if it were constitutional it is undesirable that the Federation should enter upon an industry of this kind. I have endeavoured to show that, from the revenue stand-point, it would not be so materially advantageous as Senator

Pearce has represented, that the cost of distribution would be higher, and the amount of profit lower than he set out, and that the consumer could hope for no relief or benefit from the proposed monopoly. I have indicated where I think some advantage might result from an inquiry, and that is to the grower, and to him alone. But when I boil down my objections, all centred, as they are, in the final paragraph of the motion, I find myself in this position: That I would sooner lose the whole of the motion than accept it in its present form. I hardly suppose that Senator Pearce is prepared to strike out that paragraph; if he is, I shall vote with him entirely; but if he is not I can only vote against him, holding, as I do, that apart from its utterly unconstitutional character, it is a very pernicious proposal indeed. It is—and probably that is one of the reasons why it is made—the first direct socialistic proposal that we have had here. It is well that that fact should be emphasized and recorded. We have been told that the Labour Party is sometimes a party of Socialism, and sometimes not. I hardly know what it pretends to be. But here we have put forward, with the support of its members, a proposal which I submit is the first attempt to nationalize an industry of the Commonwealth. We have here a concrete illustration of what is proposed to be done should the electors give the Labour Party the power to carry it out—the nationalization of the tobacco industry; and not far down on the notice-paper is a proposal for nationalizing another industry. I shall vote against the motion, not only for the particular objections I have to this specific proposal, but because, in my opinion, it is the first attempt to, by the introduction of State enterprise, utterly abolish that which has so far built up this community to what it is, and that is private enterprise. I understand, sir, that it is not necessary to move an amendment for the elimination of the third paragraph.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—No.

Senator PEARCE.—I desire to state that I am willing to amend paragraph 2 by inserting after the word "industry" the words "and the cultivation of tobacco," and also to amend the last line of the motion by substituting the "12th October" for "9th August."

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—Does any other honorable senator wish to speak?

Senator DOBSON.—The leader of the Senate!

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I thought I spoke sufficiently long on this subject on a previous occasion, and my views have been very freely quoted to-day by Senator Millen. The Government treat this question as an open one.

Senator DOBSON.—The point is, do the Government treat the motion as a constitutional or as a grossly illegal one?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The question is not whether the motion is a grossly illegal one.

Senator DOBSON.—That is the only question.

Senator PLAYFORD.—My opinion is that it would be unconstitutional for the Commonwealth to establish this industry. I have spoken and voted in that direction before. My honorable and learned colleague voted in a contrary direction on that occasion. We do not look upon this as a party question at all, and we shall vote in the same way again. It is a proposal for an inquiry to ascertain the facts and collect information, and not a proposal to establish a tobacco monopoly.

Senator DOBSON.—Is the Minister going to vote for paragraph 3?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I certainly shall not vote for that paragraph if the motion is put in parts. I shall vote against that paragraph, but not against the other two, which merely relate to an inquiry. The third paragraph, if I recollect aright, is not in the form in which it was originally. At that time Senator Pearce embodied in his motion a proposal to provide funds for old-age pensions, but the present proposal has, I think, been toned down very considerably. I have not compared the two motions. I argued the point on the first occasion. Senator Millen has quoted my opinions on the subject very fully, and I fancy they are very well known. I look upon the proposal as absolutely unconstitutional. An alteration of the Constitution would be necessary before the Commonwealth could establish an industry of this sort. Whether the proposal is one to establish an industry for the manufacture of iron, or one for the manufacture of tobacco and cigars, I contend that it is absolutely unconstitutional, and therefore I shall be prepared to vote against any motion which would assert the contrary opinion. We know the opinion of the Prime Minister, and Senator Millen, in his most excellent speech, has put the constitutional question beyond all cavil. Even if we struck out the third paragraph of the motion, we could not prevent the Select Committee from expressing an opinion as to whether a monopoly they might find to be injurious to the public as a whole had better be taken over by the Commonwealth, or whether other means should be adopted to prevent the public from being prejudiced. I was a member of the previous Select Committee, and the evidence went unmistakably to show that there was no "combine" which was injuriously affecting the consumer. There was in existence a combination, but the evidence did not show that it was of such a character that the consumer was in any way injuriously affected by its operations.

Senator GIVENS.—If we had an inquiry, and it showed that it was advisable for the Government to take over the industry, we might obtain the constitutional power to do so.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That power can only be obtained by an amendment of the Constitution.

Senator GIVENS.—That might be shown to be very desirable by the new facts elicited.

Senator PLAYFORD.—If it were proved that the consumers were being injured by the monopoly, the Select Committee might report that, in its opinion, the best way to cure the evil would be for the Commonwealth to take over the manufacture of the article. But I do not wish by my vote to affirm—

The advisability or otherwise of the Government taking over the industry of such manufacture, importation, and sale, or any part thereof.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I intend to vote for all the paragraphs of the motion. I listened with very great surprise to those who take exception to the third paragraph, and yet are prepared to swallow the previous two. The motion simply proposes that a Select Committee should make inquiries. I fail to find in the Constitution anything which would justify, on the face of it, the Commonwealth interfering in the matter of trusts. Senator Millen seemed to find some difference between the powers of the Constitution when he dealt with trusts and the powers of the Constitution when he dealt with manufactures. But I fail to see any difference in the position in which the Commonwealth stands under the Constitution in respect of those two matters. I find nothing in the Constitution which would justify the Commonwealth in interfering with trusts, nor can I find anything which would justify us in interfering with manufactures. But I am perfectly prepared to support Senator Pearce's proposal that a Select Committee be appointed to look into this business, and to report to the Senate. That is the only logical position that any impartial person could take up. Senator Playford laid special stress on his opposition to interference with manufactures.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Not interference; I objected to the establishment of manufactures by the Commonwealth.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator objected to interference with the rights of the States. I may remind him that when the Barton Government brought in their Tariff Bill State imports were excluded from its operation. But the Bill was amended at the instance of the Government in the direction of charging duties on them.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We had a perfect right to do so under the Constitution.

Senator MATHESON.—According to Senator Millen's statement, the matter has been before the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and a judgment has been given against the Federal Government, which has not had the pluck to take the case to the High Court.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I know nothing of that.

Senator KEATING.—Possibly there was no High Court when the decision referred to was given.

Senator MATHESON.—I think I am quoting Senator Millen correctly.

Senator MILLEN.—I will fetch the law report, and show the honorable senator the judgment.

Senator MATHESON.—My point is that Senator Playford was a supporter of the Government that introduced that unconstitutional clause, and he voted for it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We are operating under it now, as far as I know.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator has heard that it is illegal. I emphasize the lack of logic on the part of Senator Playford in protesting against part of this motion as an infringement of States rights, when he was perfectly prepared to support a claim which, apparently, the Commonwealth could not sustain. I have no intention to discuss the question of the tobacco monopoly. I am satisfied to support the motion for the appointment of the Select Committee. But I wish to deal with another question introduced by Senator Millen. He most unfairly suggested that Senator Pearce ought not to proceed with his motion, on account of the scanty attendance at the time he was speaking. I wish to put it on record in Hansard that prior to 4 o'clock this afternoon there was as large an attendance of senators as there has been at any time this session. But as soon as Senator Playford secured the passage of a resolution that the Senate should, at its rising, adjourn until next Wednesday week, many honorable senators seized their bags and papers, and cleared off to catch trains for Sydney and Adelaide. It is scandalous that Senator Millen should use such an argument to support the contention that the debate on the motion should be dropped.

Senator MILLEN.—Is the honorable senator thinking of Randwick again?

Senator MATHESON.—The allusion is one which I fail to understand. This opposition to proceeding with the motion springs from the action of the leader of the Senate which we endeavoured to prevent this afternoon. If Senator Playford had waited until the ordinary time to discuss the question of adjournment, the whole of the New South Wales and South Australian senators would have been in their places at this moment.

Senator MILLEN.—I rise to order. Is that question before the Senate?

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator is not in order.

Senator MATHESON.—Where am I out of order? I am merely replying to the remarks of Senator Millen. I absolutely fail to see why, if other honorable senators do not choose to attend at the well-advertised days for the sitting of the Senate, a debate should be suspended. We who are ready to give our time and intelligence to the business have a right to expect that other honorable senators shall be in their seats.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I wish to propose the amendment suggested by Senator Millen. I move—

That after the word industry, in sub-paragraph 2, the words "and the cultivation of tobacco" be inserted.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—It is a little refreshing, after the admirable speech of my honorable friend Senator Millen, to find that the leader of the Senate has taken upon himself a wee bit of responsibility, and has announced to us the momentous fact that he is going to vote against a paragraph of the motion which he believes to be absolutely illegal and futile. My idea of the responsibility and duty of the leader of a party is not that he should sit smiling in his seat, and allow a large section of the Senate to do just as they please, and waste time in discussing motions which—

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable and learned senator in order in saying that honorable senators are wasting time?

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT. — Senator Dobson is not in order.

Senator DOBSON.—I bow to your ruling, but I am unaware that accusing honorable senators of wasting time is out of order.

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT.—Under standing order No. 404 it is provided that no senator shall use offensive words against either House of Parliament, and that all imputations of improper motives and all personal reflections are highly disorderly. It is, to my mind, a personal reflection upon members of the Senate to say that they are wasting time.

Senator DOBSON.—I bow to your ruling, but I am still under the impression that in the way which I used the term "wasting time" it does not come under that standing order. I do not accuse my honorable friends of wasting time wilfully. I accuse them of being so enamoured of their fads, so much in love with their own policy, so much in earnest about their platform, that they forget what is constitutional and what is not. The most dangerous men are sometimes the most sincere in their delusions, and I can quite understand some of my redhot friends opposite being perfectly sincere about some of the most frightful delusions possible. It is not the duty of the leader of a House of Parliament to allow a large proportion of his supporters to push forward a matter which he knows to be utterly unconstitutional. We are told that one Minister intends to vote against part of the motion, and that his colleague will vote for the whole of it. Thus we shall have Ministers nullifying their votes upon a motion which Senator Millen has shown to be absolutely illegal.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is nothing illegal in paragraphs 1 and 2.

Senator DOBSON. — Is that Senator Playford's idea of responsible government? Is that his notion of the duty which Ministers owe to Parliament, to the country, and to themselves? I doubt if Senator Playford would have risen at all if I had not suggested that the leader of the Senate should say something.

Senator GIVENS.—Is there anything illegal about a committee of inquiry?

Senator DOBSON.—I am very much amused to find some of my honorable friends saying that, even if this is illegal, it is only a proposal for an inquiry. I should have thought that if a thing was illegal, and the Senate had any respect for itself, for its time, and for the taxpayers' money, it would take no step even to inquire into it. I am inclined to agree with Senator Matheson that the whole thing is out of order.

Senator MATHESON.—I never said it was out of order. I think it is unconstitutional, but I think we should have an inquiry.

Senator DOBSON.—For once in my life I am able to agree with the honorable senator, who has got hold of a constitutional point which is so fine that some of my honorable friends opposite do not appear to be able to understand it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is it illegal for the Commonwealth Parliament to pass legislation to deal with trusts?

Senator DOBSON.—That is a point I am coming to. It is perfectly obvious that there can be no such thing as a Commonwealth nationalization of the tobacco or any other industry. That is a power which rests with the States.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If it is constitutional for us to pass legislation dealing with trusts, does that not justify the first two paragraphs of the motion, under which evidence might be secured to show that an existing trust is injurious?

Senator DOBSON.—I am sure every member of the Senate must be perfectly certain, after reading the opinions given by the present Prime Minister when he was Attorney-General, and by his successor in that office, Senator Drake, that what is proposed under paragraph 3 of the motion is unconstitutional. Senator O'Keefe seems to think that the first and second paragraphs of the motion may be constitutional, because he claims that the Federal Parliament has power to deal with trusts. If honorable senators will consult the textbooks they will find that a very great deal has been done in America in the direction of controlling trusts and monopolies. Many of the States have passed laws to put down trusts, and the Federal Parliament in America has also passed laws with the same object. But the Federal Parliament of the United States can only legislate with regard to trusts in so far as they are concerned with Inter-State trade. It cannot interfere with the operations of trusts which confine themselves to one State. As I read our Constitution, the Commonwealth Parliament has nothing whatever to do with the nationalization of an industry, but if a trust exists we can legislate to control that trust within proper limits with regard to Inter-State trade, or with regard to trade between the Commonwealth and foreign countries. But suppose there were a trust or combine in onions or in potatoes in the State of Victoria, we could not legislate with regard to that. We cannot legislate with regard to an industry confined to a State that may happen to be turned into a trust, as we should then be impinging on the power of the State. Suppose there were a trust formed in potatoes in Victoria, and it put up the price so much that none but the very wealthiest could afford to buy potatoes, although thousands of tons were for sale. The State Parliament of Victoria might pass a law at once to put an end to that state of things, but do my honorable friends opposite contend for a moment that the Federal Parliament would also pass a law on the subject? If it did we should have a State law in conflict with a Commonwealth law, and when the Constitution was referred to it would be found that our law would be a nullity, and it would be the State law that would regulate the matter.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Quite a number of lawyers contend that we have power to deal with trusts.

Senator DOBSON.—So we have, in the way I have stated, and with regard to Inter-State or foreign trade. But I have given my honorable friend as practical an illustration as I can think of, and if we tried to put down a local trust in this or any other State, and a State law were passed with the same object, the State Parliament and the Federal Parliament would be gnawing at the same bone, and the State law would prevail.

Senator STYLES.—This tobacco monopoly is an Australian, and not a State combine.

Senator DOBSON.—It may be an Australian combine, and I am inclined to think that under the trade and commerce subsection of section 51 we might try to regulate and control the trust as regards Inter-State trade in tobacco. But if we were to pass a law dealing with the tobacco trade in Victoria, and the State Parliament were to pass a law dealing with the same subject, the State law would prevail. I believe that the first two paragraphs of the motion are not in order, because they are unconstitutional, and with respect to the last I am astonished that any honorable senator who desires to uphold the dignity of this Chamber should for a moment propose to submit it to a division.

Senator PLAYFORD.—“The existence or otherwise of a combine, trust, or monopoly” are the words used in the first paragraph of the motion, and the honorable senator says that, to inquire into that matter is unconstitutional?

Senator DOBSON.—That is what I have said, and I have given my reasons.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It astounds me, that is all.

Senator DOBSON.—It is not for me to call attention to the fact that certain honorable senators have left the Chamber, and have gone home. It is sufficient that I should realize that they have done so. I think that it was quite excusable for them to do so, because some of us took the point some days ago that there was not sufficient work for us to do. The fact is now clearly seen, and instead of having had a holiday this week we propose to have a holiday next week.

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator is hardly discussing the question.

Senator DOBSON.—I am appealing to Senator Pearce and other honorable senators opposite to say whether it is fair or right that this motion should be pressed to a division when there are a good many of his supporters present, and when there is hardly a single opponent of the motion in the Chamber.

Senator PEARCE.—I am prepared to give honorable senators opposite a “pair” for every supporter they have lost.

Senator DOBSON.—If the honorable senator can assure me that he has lost more supporters than we have, I am content, but it appears to me that there is hardly any one present on this side.

Senator MATHESON.—Why did not honorable senators stop here?

Senator DOBSON.—Perhaps there is a “Mr. Randwick” that they desire to go and see. The fact is that they are not here. It is a common argument that an important matter should not be submitted to a division in a thin House. If Senator Playford had some regard for the dignity of the Senate, I think he would not permit the motion to go to a division. It is all very well for the honorable senator to smile, and affect to throw all responsibility off his shoulders, but he cannot do that. Every hour the responsibility of the Government is growing less, and we shall soon have no such thing as responsible government.

Senator MATHESON.—Certain honorable senators do not recognise their responsibility.

Senator DOBSON.—They do recognise their responsibility.

Senator MATHESON.—Then why are they not here?

Senator DOBSON.—Because there is no work to be done. The motion now before the Senate can only end in a fiasco. It can only end in the spending of the people's money on an abortive inquiry. We are having just the same argument over again as we had on the transcontinental railway matter. Although we have no power to go on with that matter without the consent of South Australia, honorable senators still said, “Let us have an inquiry.”

Senator PEARCE.—Are we discussing the transcontinental railway?

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT.—I was waiting to hear how the honorable senator would connect those remarks with the motion.

Senator DOBSON.—I am only using an illustration. Honorable senators say, as they said in dealing with that question, “It may be illegal, but let us have an inquiry; let us spend the taxpayers' money; let us take a step forward, although a small one.” That is not the way in which we would conduct our private business, and it is not the way in which the Federal Parliament should conduct its business. The leader of the Senate has no right to give his sanction to such a thing. We may have one Minister voting against the motion, on the ground that it is unconstitutional, and the other voting for it. We have a right to expect that Ministers will uphold the dignity of the Senate, and what can be worse than that they should assist in passing laws which they know are unconstitutional? Every one knows that the present Prime Minister, when Attorney-General, and Senator Drake, as Attorney-General, as well as the authorities quoted by Senator Millen, are against this proposal as being unconstitutional. We have now in office an Attorney-General who is a great sympathiser with the Labour Party. The honorable and learned gentleman manages, if he can, to give an opinion in their favour, and I should like to know what his opinion is on this matter. If Mr. Isaacs is of opinion that such a scheme as this would be illegal, I ask Senator Pearce, who I know tries to keep himself within the bounds of reason, and has some regard for the taxpayers' money, not to insist on going to the expense of this inquiry. The amendment which I desire to move is to add the following words to the third sub-paragraph of the motion :—

Provided that before No. 3 inquiry is proceeded with by the Committee, they shall obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General that in the case of a report of the Committee in favour of the said industry being taken over by the Commonwealth being adopted by Parliament, the Government has the power to enforce and carry out the Act embodying such report.

If this unconstitutional motion is to be carried, I desire to stay the Select Committee's hand until the present Attorney-General has given an opinion; and I think the amendment is a fair one. If Senator Pearce has any regard for the dignity of the Chamber, or for the legality and reasonableness of our legislation—if he has any regard to the fact that we ought to be most tender and delicate in infringing State rights—I ask him to accept the amendment which I have indicated. I cannot see the slightest justification for a motion which involves the expenditure of £200 or £300 on a project which we cannot legally carry out. We do not want to appear as fools, by instituting opinions which can only end in fiasco. Senator Pearce himself has a doubt as to whether the motion is constitutional, and he ought to endeavour to avoid expense which may only prove abortive. If Mr. Isaacs should express an opinion in favour of the legality of such a scheme, there might be some reason in the motion, though I should have to differ from him, with great respect; but if three Attorney-Generals declared the proposal to be illegal, there could not be the slightest excuse for spending even £5 on an inquiry. I am astonished that Senator Playford and other honorable senators do not seem to recollect that the Full Court of New South Wales has decided that duty cannot be imposed on State imports.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Duty is being imposed on State imports every day, and paid in New South Wales.

Senator MILLEN.—I have quoted the law report.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Government allowed that decision to pass, but since then have insisted on payments, and no State has troubled to go to law again.

Senator DOBSON.—Then there was another legal decision in the case affecting brewers' licences, which were held to be in the nature of an ordinary trade permit, and beyond the control of the Commonwealth. These decisions show how jealous the States are about the Federal Parliament going outside the Constitution, and passing Acts which are an interference with the trade or industrial life of the States. Senator Millen has shown clearly the distinction between the Canadian Federation and the Australian Federation. No power which is not expressly given by the Constitution can be exercised by us, but we have every right, implied, though not stated, in the Constitution, to carry out any legislation necessary to that which comes within our exclusive jurisdiction. If we desired to give the boys in the State schools military training, that would be deemed part of the defence of the Commonwealth, and could be undertaken by the Federal Government; and if we started the manufacture of arms, equipment, and ammunition, we might have the power to undertake the iron or other industries to an extent necessary to the enterprise. Whatever we undertake must be inherent in one of the exclusive powers which we possess under the Constitution. Let us carry the matter a little further, and try to imagine what would happen in Tasmania if Senator Givens were to move for an inquiry into the question of nationalizing the woollen industry. Though there are not many woollen manufactories, there are splendid machines, and capital stuff is turned out, and we are proud of the establishments both in Victoria and Tasmania.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That industry is not a monopoly.

Senator DOBSON.—But if it were a monopoly, what would the Tasmanian people say if it were proposed to nationalize the industry? The Constitution would have to be amended in order to get the power. My friends of the Labour Party have got it on the brain that Socialism and the nationalization of industries form a good policy, but they have "hedged" enormously since hearing the powerful arguments directed against it. They have thought it wise to put the latter part of their policy in their pocket, and to advocate only the nationalization of monopolies.

Senator GIVENS.—They have not done anything of the kind.

Senator DOBSON.—Senator Givens must allow me to be able to read plain English. The Labour Party have "hedged" immensely, and knocked on the head their proposals about the nationalization of industries.

Senator MILLEN.—They have not knocked the proposals on the head, but have merely hidden them.

Senator DOBSON.—Yes, and all they desire now is to go slow—"One step at a time," according to Mr. Watson—and nationalize only monopolies.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is all the Labour Party ever desired to do.

Senator DOBSON.—How can the honorable senator say that?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am speaking of the Labour Party as constituted in this Chamber and another place.

Senator DOBSON.—I have read the platform of the Federal Labour Party, and the "hedging" is perfectly plain. As to the power said to be implied in the words "peace, order, and good government," the Federal Parliament may one day desire to deal with the question of gambling. If honorable senators realized the extent to which the gambling mania destroys the manhood whom they are here to represent, they would deal with that evil, which is of far more importance than some of the fads over which they waste their time. Gambling is an evil which has exercised the minds of many of us, as I hope it is exercising the minds of members of the Labour Party, because it affects the lives of their kith and kin very materially. The only way to deal with this matter is to get the whole of the States to remit its settlement to the Federal Parliament.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable and learned senator connect his remarks with the question before us?

Senator DOBSON.—I shall do so in a moment. If that step were taken we should be able to pass a law which would have Federal effect. If there are monopolies, trusts, or combines in tobacco, onions, potatoes, or any other commodity, we cannot deal with them until the States give their legislative sanction, or we amend the Constitution. We cannot deal with State rights outside any power expressly given to us in the Constitution, or inherent in the powers mentioned in the Constitution. Honorable senators who vote for this motion are ignoring the provisions of the Constitution. There are disputes going on in the daily press as to the effect of our legislation on the opinion of the outside world.

Senator FINDLEY.—Those hackneyed utterances are threadbare, and belong to the "stinking fish" party.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator know to what I am about to allude?

Senator FINDLEY.—I suppose it is the "Petriana myth" or the six hatters.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not intend to refer to one matter only, but to the general effect of our legislation, on which we are judged.

Senator FINDLEY.—Judged by whom?

Senator DOBSON.—By the outside world.

Senator CROFT.—On misrepresentation.

Senator DOBSON.—We are not judged on misrepresentation, but on the legislation which we pass, and on our administration.

Senator O'KEEFE.—On statements of men like Fitchett.

Senator DOBSON.—We are judged on a common-sense interpretation of our legislation. If we pass unconstitutional laws, people in other parts of the world will believe that we are under the control of a party who desire more to carry out their fads than to observe the Constitution. I have been asked for one or two illustrations. If you insist on the inclusion of railway men in a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, when you are told that it is unconstitutional; if you insist on giving preference to unionists and the High Court declares that you have gone too far, and robbed men of their freedom; if you carry out the principle of this motion, and infringe State rights—and the whole world knows that no session ever passes without a certain party trying to strain the Constitution, and doing what is wrong—you will be severely criticised, and no comments in the press, and no amount of talk from Sir John Forrest, will get rid of the injurious opinions which men will hold of us. Supposing that Senator Pearce gets his way, that a favorable report is presented, and that an Act of Parliament is passed, how does he propose to carry out his project? Would he have power over any persons manufacturing or selling tobacco? Would he set to work to buy them all out, and if so, where would he get the necessary money? We know that only the other day the Premier of Victoria was complaining that the trade union label is an infringement of State rights. We have had an opinion from one of the first barristers in the Commonwealth that it is illegal. Well, supposing that Senator Pearce carries his motion, and an Act of Parliament is passed, how is he to accomplish his desire? When he takes his first practical step the States may say, "No; that is a matter which rests with us." How can he interfere with the manufacture or sale of tobacco? How can he deprive all these men of their living? The Constitution gives us no right of that sort — it rests with the State alone. I wish to make two appeals, and if they fell on deaf ears I cannot help that. The first appeal is that my amendment ought to be carried. I cannot conceive that Senator Pearce desires to enter upon an inquiry if it is to end in a nullity. The second appeal is that it is not fair in a thin Senate, when, as I believe, most of our supporters have gone, for the honorable senator to press to a division a question of vast importance, especially when he is in doubt as to the legality of the proposal.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—I shall put first the amendment by Senator de Largie to the second sub-paragraph, and secondly, the amendment by Senator Dobson to the third sub-paragraph.

Senator FINDLEY.—I desire to move an amendment to the concluding paragraph.

Senator GIVENS.—I rise to a point of order. It appears to me that we shall get into a state of confusion if we are to have two amendments before the Senate at the one time. I think that the amendment of Senator de Largie should be disposed of before any other amendment is accepted. I ask, sir, for your ruling on that point.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We must dispose of one amendment before another can be moved.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—That is the practice of the Senate. At the request of Senator Millen I have decided to divide the question, as it is a complicated one.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator DOBSON) negatived—

That the following words be added to sub-paragraph 3:—"Provided that before No. 3 inquiry is proceeded with by the Committee, they shall obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General that in case of a report of the Committee in favour of the said industry being taken over by the Commonwealth being adopted by Parliament, the Government has the power to enforce and carry out the Act embodying such report."

Amendment (by Senator FINDLEY) agreed to—

That the words "9th August" in the third paragraph be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "12th October."

The DEPUTY-PRESIDENT. — Does Senator Pearce wish to reply?

Senator PEARCE.—No, sir.

Question—That the first paragraph and sub-paragraph 1 be agreed to—resolved in the affirmative.

Question—That sub-paragraph 2, as amended, be agreed to—resolved in the affirmative.

Question—That sub-paragraph 3 be agreed to—put.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—The leader of the Senate told us—

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable and learned senator in order in speaking to this question?

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT. — The honorable and learned senator has already spoken.

Senator DOBSON.—I have not spoken to the amendment moved by Senator Findley.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—When I called upon the mover of the motion to reply he declined to avail himself of his right. I then commenced to put the question in parts, and there can now be no further debate.

The Senate divided.

Sub-paragraph 3 agreed to.

Second paragraph, and third paragraph, as amended, agreed to.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—I move—

That the Committee consist of Senators Keating, Stewart, Gray, Story, Styles, Findley, and Pearce.

I may mention that this is the old committee, with the exception of Senator Playford who, being now Minister of Defence, has intimated that he does not desire to be re-appointed. I have nominated another South Australian senator in his place.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I demand a ballot for the election of the committee.

The DEPUTY PRESIDENT.—Standing order 278 states that the senators to serve on a Select Committee shall be nominated by the mover, but on the demand of one senator they shall be selected by ballot. The ballot will take place.

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania).—May I suggest that if there is to be a ballot it should take place when there is a larger attendance of senators. Personally, however, I have no objection.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania). -- The fact had not struck me that the members of the old Committee have already secured a quantity of information, and I therefore withdraw my demand for a ballot. Nevertheless, I hope that the members of the Committee will obtain an opinion from the law officers which will enable them to come to a conclusion whether it is worth while to spend any more money on the matter.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

PAPER.

Senator PLAYFORD laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to Order of the Senate of 31st August—Copy of views on the present condition of the Defences communicated by the Prime Minister to the Herald on 12th June.

The CLERK laid upon the table:—

Return to Order of the Senate of 24th August, relating to the purchase of pistols for Light Horse.

ADJOURNMENT.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT: RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR: DECLARATION OF PEACE: BUSINESS OF SENATE.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) proposed—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I wish to refer to a matter which I consider to be of some importance, and which occupied the time of the Senate during the earlier part of the sitting. I refer to the determination to adjourn till Wednesday week. I wish to allude to the way in which that adjournment was arranged. I understand that an understanding was arrived at earlier in the day with a number of honorable senators that an adjournment should take place, and that it was perfectly understood before the sitting commenced that a motion to that effect would be carried. I heard nothing about that arrangement. If I had heard of it I should have been in a position to go to Queensland if I had desired to do so. But the matter was sprung upon me suddenly. I never expected any adjournment, and made no arrangement. That being the case, I have a double complaint to make against the leader of the Government; first of all that he did not acquaint me, as well as other senators, with his intention to move for an adjournment, and, secondly, that there should be any adjournment at all. Out of courtesy to honorable senators when an action of this kind is contemplated, the Minister ought to give due notice, so that we may make suitable arrangements to go away if we desire. We cannot make up our minds and get ready on such short notice.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I should like to ask the Minister of Defence whether he has not a Ministerial statement to make with regard to the peace which has been arranged between Russia and Japan. I understand that an announcement has been made in the other House, and surely we might expect a similar announcement from the Government in the Senate if they have any official information.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—So far as I know no official information has been received by the Cabinet with regard to the conclusion of peace in the East; at all events, I am not aware of it. In reply to Senator Stewart, I wish to say that I did not know what I was going to do with regard to an adjournment until a short time before the Senate met.

Senator GIVENS.—There was some sort of understanding.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There was not the slightest understanding with any honorable senator, so far as I was concerned; and I took the earliest opportunity when the Senate met to make it known what I proposed to do. If Senator Stewart had desired to go to Queensland he could have made arrangements to leave for Sydney at 5 o'clock.

Senator DOBSON.—What business will there be when we meet on Wednesday week?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Copyright Bill and the Electoral Bill.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 10.11 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 31 August, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BATCHELOR presented five petitions from certain residents of South Australia, praying that stringent legislation be enacted to prohibit the importation and sale of opium within the Commonwealth.

Mr. POYNTON presented four similar petitions, also from certain residents of South Australia.

Petitions received.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I desire to make a personal explanation with regard to a report in this morning's Age of some occurrences in this Chamber last night. With characteristic partiality, the journal omits practically everything that I said, but prints everything that my opponent said. The honorable member for Bland is reported to have said, amongst other things, that—

Ever since Ministers have assumed office, we have had from the Opposition a series of obstructing and stone-walling speeches. . . It is really amusing, when one remembers all the speeches which have lately been delivered, and which have been nothing less than stone-walling. . . . There has been an endeavour to stop business, and to prevent the Government from getting any credit for the work it has brought forward.

I asked if this was in order, and after your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I am reported to have said—

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, do you really rule that an honorable member is in order, in making a charge of deliberately obstructing the House? If so, I am glad to hear it.

I did not make any such statement. I did not say that I was glad to hear it. On the contrary, I deeply regretted hearing such a ruling given.

COUNT-OUT.

Mr. WILSON.—In this morning's Age, the following paragraph appears:—

Of course, the "count-out" signified nothing, as it was merely on the question of the adjournment. The Government could have kept a quorum had it desired.

Did the Government desire to keep a quorum?

Mr. DEAKIN.—When a Minister moves the adjournment of the House, it is because the Government desires that the House shall adjourn. No honorable member left this Chamber last night at my request, but honorable members were informed, when the adjournment was moved, that those who had trains to catch might leave to do so. I having moved the adjournment, the Government was no longer under the obligation to keep a House.

COMMONWEALTH STATISTICAL BUREAU.

Mr. KELLY.—Will the Minister for Home Affairs lay on the table of the library the correspondence with the States Governments in connexion with the proposed creation of a Commonwealth Statistical Bureau?

Mr. GROOM.—I shall look into the matter, to see to what extent the request can be complied with.

LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. TUDOR asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether the letter-carriers of other capital cities in the Commonwealth are compelled to do their work from the General Post Office similarly to those employed at the General Post Office, Melbourne?

2. What is the total cost to date of centralizing the suburban letter-carriers at the General Post Office, Melbourne?

3. What was the cost for the last twelve months?

4. Has any actual saving been effected by this scheme?

5. If so, how much has been saved by this centralization?

6. Who originated this scheme?

7. When this scheme was introduced was it not intended to amalgamate suburban offices, and thereby decrease the staffs of postmasters, &c.?

8. To what extent has this been done?

9. Is it intended to expend a further sum on the Melbourne General Post Office, which would not be necessary if this centralization had not taken place?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The answer to the honorable member's questions is as follows:—

Inquiries are being made, and the desired information will be furnished as soon as possible.

MILITARY CANTEENS.

Motion (by Mr. MAUGER) agreed to—

That a return be laid on the table showing—

1. The receipts during the past twelve months from military canteens throughout the Commonwealth.
2. The expenditure in connexion with the establishment and maintenance of same.
3. The profits, if any, on intoxicating liquors, and the way in which such profits have been applied.

PAPER.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN laid upon the table the following paper:—

Copy of reports by Mr. John Hesketh, electrical engineer, on (1) matters investigated by him during a recent tour in America and Europe; (2) the message rate or toll system of charging for telephone services; (3) further report on the automatic telephone exchange system.

IMPORTATION OF OPIUM.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I move—

That, in the opinion of this House, the importation of opium for other than medical purposes should be prohibited.

I think that this motion needs no apology, in view of the evil effects which the use of opium has upon its devotees, and the danger which threatens the community from the development of the habit of opium-smoking among the European population. I have some personal knowledge of these effects, because, in company with Senior-sergeant Jeffs, and Mr. G. E. Ardill, of the Sydney Rescue Society—a gentleman who for many years has been closely identified with a movement for mitigating the evils attendant upon the use of this drug—I have visited the opium dens in the Chinese quarter in Sydney, and have there witnessed scenes of the most appalling, degrading, and repulsive character, reflecting, not only upon the municipal government, but upon the intelligence of our race for permitting them. I have also visited similar dens in Melbourne, and have seen the same occurrences there. I have brought with me a photograph of one of the dens in Little Bourke-street, Melbourne, which is self-explanatory, though it does not illustrate the worst phases of this vice, being a picture of one of the more reputable dens. I shall leave it on the table for the inspection of honorable members. I hoped to have been able to produce, this afternoon, a series of photographs of some of the scenes which are enacted in the opium dens of Sydney; but they have not yet arrived, so that I am unable to do so. The majority of these dens are situated in the lowest quarters of the city. They are to be found chiefly in alley ways, and are ill-ventilated, so that the stench on entering them is abominable, and has a nauseating effect upon those who are unaccustomed to it. In my own case, a visitation of two hours to various houses in Sydney frequented by opium smokers resulted in a fit of nausea from which it took me some time to recover. In a small room, perhaps a little more than 10 feet square, the visitor will find a number of low tables or couches, supported upon trestles, and covered with matting. There is a pillow at the head of each couch, and a tray, and each couch accommodates two persons. In a room of the dimensions I have described, it is no uncommon thing to discover six or eight persons smoking opium. The doors and windows are kept closed, and the blinds are drawn, to exclude both light and air. When first the stranger enters such a room, everything is enveloped in a yellowish vapour resembling a London fog; but when the eye becomes accustomed to the gloom, the forms of Chinese, negroes, Portuguese, and men of other nationalities, together with European girls, ranging from tender years to ripe old age, are discerned, recumbent on the couches, smoking opium, and in a condition of stupor. One case in Melbourne struck me as being particularly abhorrent, for on one opium couch, smoking from the one tray, was a shrivelled-up, decrepit-looking old Oriental, resembling nothing so much as a revived Egyptian mummy, and a young European woman of scarcely twenty, very scantily clothed, who, I was informed, was married to a well-to-do business man, and was a frequent clandestine visitor to these dens. According to all the testimony that can be obtained from medical and police authorities, and from others who have had experience of the effects of this habit, its results upon the system are most injurious, and investigation of the reports of the authorities of China, India, and other countries where the drug is extensively used, shows that it is the universal verdict that opium smoking has a most destructive and demoralizing effect upon those who indulge in it, leading to physical decay and mental imbecility. Fortunately, in Australia the use of opium has not yet attained alarming proportions, but those proportions are sufficiently large to make it necessary for us to carefully guard against the spread of the habit. It would be very much easier to check this traffic now than it would be if we were to allow it to develop to a much more formidable extent. When we remember the number of petitions that have been presented to this House from persons residing in all parts of the Commonwealth, and we know that further petitions are being signed in opposition to the introduction of opium into the Commonwealth, except for medicinal purposes, we must realize that the people of Australia are awakening to the danger of the evil, and are anxious to see legislation of a repressive character introduced. One of the most satisfactory features of the agitation against the opium traffic is that the Chinese residents of Australia are joining in the crusade. Chinese merchants, who have been in the habit of importing opium and making large sums of money out of the traffic in that article are at the head of the reform movement, and are anxious that the traffic shall be suppressed. Ministers of various denominations are also entering into the anti-opium crusade with whole-souled sympathy and devotion. Moreover, opium smokers themselves will welcome the proposed legislation, because they are such slaves to the habit that they cannot resist their cravings whilst it is possible to obtain the drug. It may be urged that prohibition may lead to smuggling, but that consideration should not weigh with us. I understand that the Collector of Customs in Sydney reports that the authorities consider themselves quite capable of preventing the smuggling of opium to any great extent. They say that they make such a thorough search of all vessels coming into port that it is almost impossible for smuggling to be carried on to any great extent. Therefore, it seems to me that it devolves upon us, as an integral part of the Empire, to assist in trying to get rid of this curse, for the existence of which throughout the world we, as Britishers, are chiefly responsible. It is not to the Chinese themselves that we owe the existence of the opium traffic, but to the British authorities who in earlier years insisted upon the drug being imported into China against the repeated protests of the Chinese authorities, because the Indian Government found that through the cultivation of the poppy in that country and the exportation of opium to China, manufactured from the poppy, they were able not only to secure very large returns in the form of revenue, but also to enable the cultivators to reap very large profits. It has always seemed to me that the history of this subject constitutes one of the greatest blots upon our national escutcheon. One's reflections cannot be pleasant when one considers how largely responsible our race is for the degradation of the millions of people who have been perniciously affected by the use of opium. It is only just to the majority of the public of Great Britain to say that until recently they were not aware of the alarming effects of the use of opium, and the extent to which habitual indulgence in opium smoking prevails. By means of the dissemination of literature, however, chiefly through the agency of the Christian Union for the Severance of the Connexion of the British Empire with the Opium Traffic, the British people have been largely made aware of their full responsibility, and have displayed willingness to do what they can to remedy the evils which have arisen chiefly through the mistaken policy of their rulers in the past. In the beginning the British authorities forced this trade upon China, despite the repeated protests of the rulers of that country, and it may be interesting in this connexion to read something that has been said by the Chinese Imperial Commissioner, who issued a proclamation upon the subject some time before the first opium war. The proclamation, which was addressed to the foreign merchants in China, contains the following pertinent question and comment:—

Why do you bring to our land the opium, which in your land is not made use of, by it defrauding men of their property, and causing injury to their lives? Do I find that with this thing you have seduced and deluded the people of China for two years past; and countless are the unjust hoards you have thus acquired. Such conduct rouses indignation in every human heart, and it is utterly inexcusable in the eye of celestial reason.

In another document, the Commissioner says —

Of all the evils that afflict mankind, the greatest are those he perversely brings upon himself. . . . Reptiles, wild beasts, dogs, and swine do not corrupt the morals of the age so as to cause one anxious thought to the Sovereign. There are, however, men who do.

All the time the Chinese were protesting against the introduction of the drug into China they took a highly moral stand, and were actuated by a desire to preserve the physique and general character of the Chinese. In addressing a memorial to Queen Victoria on the subject, the Chinese Commissioner wrote as follows:—

In the ways of heaven no partiality exists, and no sanction is allowed to the injuring of others for the advantage of one's self. . . . Your honorable nation, though beyond the wide ocean, acknowledges the same ways of heaven, the same human nature, and has the like perception of the distinction between life and death, benefit and injury. . . . But there is a tribe of depraved and barbarous people, who, having manufactured opium for smoking, bring it hither for sale, and seduce and lead astray the simple folk, to the destruction of their persons and the draining of their resources. Formerly the smokers thereof were few, but of late the practice has spread . . . and daily do its baneful effects more deeply pervade this rich, fruitful, and flourishing population. . . . Hence those who deal in opium, or who inhale its fumes within this land, are all now to be subjected to severest punishment, and a perpetual interdict is to be placed on the practice so extensively prevailing.

It will be observed from this that, notwithstanding the determination of the British authorities to insist upon the drug being imported into China, the rulers of that country, realizing the evil effects of opium-smoking, did what they could to discourage the practice, and imposed penalties upon those who were found indulging in it. The Commissioner proceeds—

We have reflected that this poisonous article is the clandestine manufacture of artful schemers, and depraved people of various tribes under the dominion of your honorable nation. Doubtless you, the Honorable Sovereign of that nation, have not commanded the manufacture and sale of it.

. . . . We have heard that in your honorable nation, the people are not permitted to inhale the drug. . . . It is clearly, from a knowledge of its injurious effects on man, that you have directed severe prohibitions against it. But what is the prohibition of its use in comparison with the prohibition of its sale and manufacture, as a means of thoroughly purifying the source. Though not making use of one's self, to venture on the manufacture and sale of it, and with it to seduce the simple folk of this land, is to seek one's own livelihood by the exposure of others to death. Such acts are bitterly abhorrent to the nature of man, are utterly opposed to the ways of heaven. . . . We would now then concert with your honorable sovereignty, means to bring to a perpetual end this opium, so hurtful to mankind, we, in this land, forbidding the use of it, and you, in the nations under your dominion, forbidding its manufacture. . . . Will not the result of this be the enjoyment by each of a felicitous condition of peace?

Those are noble words, nobly inspired—written, not by a European, but by a representative of a nation which we have always been taught to regard as barbarous. I venture to say that if we compare the utterances of the Chinese Commissioner with some of the deliverances which have been made from our own side, the greatest credit must be given to the representative of the Celestial Empire on the score of right and justice, as well as wise and lofty ideals of statesmanship and morality. The action of the British authorities in forcing the opium traffic on the Chinese led to a series of wars—three in all—upon which I do not care to dwell, because that aspect of the question is exceedingly painful for any one of British origin to contemplate. There was absolutely no justification whatever for those wars. An attempt was made to induce the Chinese Government to legalize the introduction of opium. But throughout all the negotiations with China a continuous protest was made by that country against its introduction, and it was only the force of British arms which ultimately compelled its acceptance. Upon the subject of the war, I do not think that it would be out of place for me to read what Mr. Gladstone himself had to say. He denounced it in these terms—

A war more unjust in its origin, a war more calculated to cover this country with permanent disgrace, I do not know, and I have not read of. The British flag is hoisted to protect an infamous contraband traffic; and if it was never hoisted, except as it is now hoisted on the coast of China, we should recoil from its sight with horror.

The details of those wars were frightful, as anybody who has read an account of them must know. The Times of 3rd December, 1842, in the first leading article written upon the war, said—

We think it of the highest moment that the Government of Great Britain should wash its hands, once for all, not only of all diplomatic, but of all moral and political responsibility for this (the opium) traffic; that we should cease to be mixed up with it, to foster it, or to make it a source of Indian revenue. . . . We owe some moral compensation to China for pillaging her towns and slaughtering her citizens in a quarrel which never could have arisen if we had not been guilty of this national crime.

The Spectator of 29th October of the same year said in this relation—

It is impossible to read the account of the military operations in China without shame and disgust. It is not war, but sheer butchery—a battue in a well-stocked preserve of human beings. . . . The Chinese are hacked, shot, and drowned without resistance, overcome by their own sense of helplessness and their excited imaginations; and the details of the butchery are such that we should feel sickened to see it exercised on cattle or game. . . . Is it a sign of humanity to sanction such wholesale butchery of human beings? Is it a sign of morality to do all this in order that a poisonous drug may be smuggled into the markets of China?

That is very strong language, coming from reputable and responsible sources, but it expresses the opinions of some of the foremost leaders of public thought in Great Britain at that time. Yet, notwithstanding the strong condemnation of the traffic by Mr. Gladstone himself, and by the leading newspapers which I have quoted, it was still persisted in, and has continued to grow until it has reached its present colossal proportions. Up till 1902 the revenue derived from the traffic between India and China was, I think, something like £256,000,000. I have not the exact figures before me, otherwise I should give them; but the amount was a very large one. So great was the trade in opium that in some instances traders actually made a fortune out of a single cargo. One case is cited in which the ship Sir Edward Ryan, armed with sixteen guns, and carrying seventy men, made a net profit of £50,000 in one opium cruise. Seeing that such large profits were made out of this traffic with China, we can well understand that those who engaged in it did all that they possibly could to prevent interference with it. I mention these facts to show that we cannot blame the Chinese for having introduced the drug into our midst. We have to blame ourselves for forcing it upon a nation which was unwilling to accept it—a nation which clearly saw what a demoralizing influence it exercised upon its own citizens. In this connexion, I desire to read the opinion which Lord Ashley expressed in the Imperial Parliament upon the subject. Lord Ashley, afterwards the Earl of Shaftesbury, moved the following resolution in the House of Commons—

That the continuance of the trade in opium, and the monopoly of its growth in the territory of British India, are destructive of all relations of amity between England and China, injurious to the manufacturing interests of the country by the very serious diminution of legitimate commerce, and utterly inconsistent with the honours and duties of a Christian kingdom, and that steps be taken as soon as possible, with due regard to rights of Governments and individuals, to abolish the evil.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a good while ago.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Yes, it was in 1843. I am speaking now of that early stage. I am pointing out that, notwithstanding these protests, the traffic has been allowed to grow until it has assumed its present alarming proportions, which render it very difficult to deal with it effectually. Lord Ashley further stated—

I am fully convinced that for this country to encourage this nefarious traffic is bad, perhaps worse than encouraging the slave trade. . . . The opium trade destroys the man both body and soul; and carries a hideous ruin over millions, which can never be repaired.

His speech was the first great indictment of the trade in Parliament, and it was described by the Times as being far more statesmanlike than were the deliverances of those to whom he was opposed. It has been said that it is impossible to prevent the use of the drug entirely, because even if we prohibited its importation, it is possible to grow poppies in Australia and to manufacture opium within the country.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It has been done.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I was not aware of that, but I know that it can be done. In this connexion it should be remembered that when Li Hung Chang took the matter in hand he really advocated the cultivation of the poppy in China itself. When he found that he could not prevent the importation of the drug from India, he conceived the idea that it would be better to encourage the cultivation of the poppy in China for the purpose of cheapening the price of opium.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is alleged that in the centre of China, poppy cultivation and opium-making have always been carried on.

Mr. JOHNSON. — I believe that that statement is true, but only to a limited extent. As a matter of fact, the poppy was cultivated in China about the period of 600 A.D., if my memory serves me accurately. But at that time the use of opium for smoking purposes was not known; it was merely cultivated for medical preparations. It was not used for smoking purposes until a much later period. About 1730 A.D. it first began to be used for smoking, but only to a very limited extent. The effect of imposing a high tariff upon this drug was to cause it to be regarded as a greater luxury than ever, and to increase the desire of its devotees to obtain it. When once the opium habit has been acquired its victims will sacrifice almost anything to get the drug. They will even sell their own brothers, sisters, and wives in order to obtain it. For this reason, Li Hung Chang thought that by cultivating the poppy for the manufacture of opium for smoking purposes, he would be able to lessen the imports of the drug, and to encourage the use of the locally-grown article by reason of the fact that the Chinese would be able to purchase it cheaper. His idea was to discourage the importation of opium until, ultimately, he got rid of it, and then to employ internal means to suppress its use and even the growth of the poppy in China. As far as I am able to gather from a study of the subject, that was his aim in sanctioning the growth of poppies in China itself. I notice that a great agitation has been going on amongst the British people in opposition to the opium trade, and, on 9th December last, an overflowing meeting was held in Exeter Hall, London, calling upon Christians, under a deep sense of duty, to unite in a determined effort to bring our national connexion with the opium traffic to an end. I have already referred to the self-sacrificing efforts of the Chinese themselves in regard to this matter. In this connexion I wish to mention that a great meeting was recently held in the Centennial Hall, Sydney, in which prominent Chinese merchants and other Chinese residents took a leading part. That meeting was most enthusiastic, and was absolutely at one with the conveners. As far as I have been able to discover, whenever attention has been called to the evil effects of the drug, no opposition has been offered to those who desire to get rid of the traffic. Some idea of the extent of the volume of that traffic in China may be gathered from the fact that during the reign of Queen Victoria 284,582 tons of opium were exported from India to that country. These figures represent an average export of more than half-a-ton for every hour of her late Majesty's reign. These are appalling figures, and represent a terrible state of affairs. Of course, I recognise that the question of revenue is a very serious one to consider in this connexion. But to me that consideration is as nothing compared with the degradation and the iniquity of a traffic of this character. I cannot conceive of the possibility of the question of maintaining a revenue from such an unquestionably harmful source being defended upon any grounds of morality, expediency, humanity, or necessity. I now wish to say a few words in regard to the report of the Royal Commission which was appointed to investigate the question of the opium trade, and from which I propose to give some brief quotations as to that trade in Burmah, India, the Straits Settlements, and China; I also desire to quote the opinions of Dr. Roth and Sir John Cockburn in connexion with the traffic in Australia. The consensus of opinion of Burmese merchants is contained in the following sentence of one of the witnesses before the Commission:—

I would say that in Burmah total abolition would be the best thing to be done, as they have done in the case of ganja.

This ganja is made from a plant which grows wild in Burmah. It was found to be so harmful in its effects that the authorities took prompt and successful measures to suppress its use. That prohibition has proved most effective up to the present time. At page 148 of the report of the Royal Commission, the following statement, in answer to question 7232, will be found:—

It is desirable to prohibit the sale of opium. People of Burma would hail such a measure with delight.

The Royal Commission summed up their conclusions as to the Burmese trade as follows:—

The Burmans are specially susceptible to injury from opium, and there is among them a popular sentiment against the habit. Special regulations have therefore been introduced, which, short of universal prohibition, seem to us as restrictive as it would be expedient for any Government to enforce.

Having regard to the fact that this Commission was largely a partial one, and favorably disposed to those who were engaged in the opium traffic, it must be admitted that this was a very serious statement. The impartiality of the Commission has of late been impugned, and startling evidence has been brought forward to support the contention of those who have questioned the accuracy of its report. Coming to the position in the Straits Settlements, we find in volume 167 of the Royal Commission's report the following statement by Mr. Riecard, Superintendent of Police—

Opium smokers of the poorer class soon become physically unfit for labour, owing to not having means to support themselves with proper food. The majority become slaves to the drug.

In volume 176 we find the following statement by Surgeon-Major O'Sullivan—

Generally speaking, opium smoking, in those who persist in its use, leads to moral, physical, and social deterioration.

Mr. Koh Seang Tai, an ex-opium farmer, who was interested in the trade, and farmed out the business to others, is reported, in volume 158 of the same report, to have made this statement—

When used to any considerable extent, the consumer becomes worthless—morally, physically, and socially. . . . It is felt that the opium traffic is a stain on the fair fame of the British people, and that owing to her power in the matter, it is England's duty to mankind to efface the stain, if it be within the limits of possibility to do so.

The smokers ruin their health. Almost all the races consider the habit of consuming opium to be condemned and injurious.

I now come to the position in Hong Kong. Mr. Woodhouse, Police Magistrate, is reported in volume 191, to have said—

With regard to Chinese, the effects of any kind, whether moral, physical, or social, from taking opium, are in the direction of deterioration proportionate to the extent to which it is taken. . . . In every instance the adoption of the habit is a wound to the moral instincts of the individual, and lowers his self-esteem to the general weakening of his character.

The Acting Registrar-General made the following statement, which is also to be found in volume 191 of the Royal Commission's report:—

The Chinese become weak and anæmic, lazy and shiftless. . . . will steal in order to obtain opium, if not able to continue to buy it. The majority are inclined to be sots. The opium smoking divans are a disgrace to the Colony.

Dr. Eitel, the Inspector of Schools, is reported, at page 207, as follows:—

There cannot be, in my experience, frequent indulgence without a corresponding degree of physical, moral, and social injury.

Law Wai Chun stated that its effects were deadly—

In thus stopping the supply of opium, the whole of Asia will be benefited, and England will be carrying out the will of Heaven in protecting its children, and will receive in turn infinite blessings.

Chia-U-Tin also made the following statement, which is to be found at page 188 of the report of the Royal Commission:—

The Chinese are only too glad if the Government would adopt any method to exterminate this evil.

I propose now to quote statistics showing the value of the opium imported into the various States of the Commonwealth. In 1903-4, the value of the imports of opium into New South Wales was £16,180; Victoria, £9,438; Queensland, £24,831; South Australia, £6,196; Western Australia, £4,994; and Tasmania, £553, the total value of the importations for the year being £62,192. In Coghlan's Summary of Customs Imports for 1903, we find a return showing the various countries from which our supplies of opium came during that year. The return shows that 319 lbs. were imported from the United Kingdom; 21,147 lbs. from Hong Kong; 514 lbs. from India; 8,120 lbs. from Straits Settlements; 10,516 lbs. from China; 1,801 lbs. from Macao; and 10 lbs. from Dutch New Guinea; making a total of 42,427 lbs. These figures show that the consumption of the drug in Australia at the present time is exceedingly large, especially having regard to the fact that only a very small proportion of it is used for medicinal purposes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Under 5 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I believe that upwards of 95 per cent. is used for smoking purposes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The quantity differs in the different States, but the average quantity used for that purpose is about 95 per cent. of the total importations.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I believe that, roughly speaking, that average is correct. The House may perhaps be interested to hear briefly a few opinions on the subject by some of those who have been interested in the British Administration in China. Sir Rutherford Alcock, British Ambassador, in his despatch on the subject in 1869, said—

There is no doubt as to the frightful evils attending the smoking of opium, its thoroughly demoralizing effects, and the utter ruin brought upon all who once give way to the vice.

After twenty-five years' residence in China, he summed up his evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Commons in the words—

Every opium smoker considers himself a moral criminal.

Sir Thomas Wade, who occupied the positions successively of interpreter, Secretary of Legation, and Ambassador in China, wrote to his Government—

It is to me vain to think otherwise of the drug than as of a habit many times more pernicious than the gin and whisky drinking which we deplore at home. . . . It has insured in every case within my knowledge the steady descent, moral and physical, of the smoker.

The Rev. Dr. Griffith John, of Han Kow, with half-a-century's experience, declares it—

An unmitigated curse, a curse physically, a curse morally, a curse socially to the individual and the nation.

Mr. W. S. Caine, a member of the House of Commons, and a leader in temperance work, after visiting India, bore the following testimony—

I have been in East-end gin palaces on Saturday nights; I have seen men in various stages of delirium tremens; I have visited many idiot and lunatic asylums; but I have never seen such horrible destruction of God's image in the face of man as I saw in the "Government opium dens of Lucknow."

Mr. PAGE.—Why should the honorable member inflict all these statements on the House, when the Government are going to prohibit the importation of opium?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I hope that they are.

Mr. PAGE.—They have said so, and therefore the honorable member is merely flogging a dead horse.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think it desirable to place the House in possession of the opinions entertained on this question by many former British representatives in China—opinions formed by them after many years' residence, during which they gained a full knowledge of the evil effects attending the opium habit.

Mr. PAGE.—Are we not already familiar with those opinions?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Honorable members may or may not be familiar with them, but, for the benefit of those who are not, I propose to read one or two more extracts relating directly to the opium traffic in Australia. Dr. Roth, Protector of Aborigines in Queensland, in the course of his evidence before the Tariff Commission, made the following statement:—

The effects of opium upon the natives was utter demoralization of them body and soul; and they became so seized with the craving, that they sold themselves, children, women, or anything, to get it.

Sir John Cockburn, when Premier of South Australia, stated that—

From his professional experience as a medical man, he knew of large numbers, moving in fashionable circles of society, who were addicted to it in the form of morphia, and the disastrous effects it has upon them.

These are the only quotations that I purpose reading. Had I been sure that honorable members were familiar with these matters, as the honorable member for Maranoa has suggested, I should not have dealt with them; but it is as much for the information of those who may perhaps occasionally read Hansard, and have not had an opportunity to study the question, that I have put this information before the House. I sincerely trust that the Government will not be deterred by any considerations as to revenue from making a serious attempt to grapple with this question, for nothing short of the prohibition of the importation of opium into the Commonwealth will be effective. If we could secure the hearty co-operation of the States in passing legislation dealing with those who sell and use the drug, and also with the houses devoted to the use of opium smokers, much would be done towards the abolition of the evil.

Mr. PAGE.—Why not do away with the opium trade altogether?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Quite so; that is what I wish to do; but if we can secure the co-operation of the States, so much the better.

Mr. PAGE.—We can prohibit the importation of opium.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It seems to me that to ask the States to take action in this direction, while we continued to allow the importation of opium into Australia, would be to call upon them to incur a responsibility which they would be unable to discharge. They may pass legislation of that character, but, so long as we allow the drug to be imported into the Commonwealth, its provisions will be evaded, just as the laws relating to the sale of liquor on Sundays are evaded. The question of loss of revenue may be put on one side altogether, because I do not think that it is the desire of this Parliament, or of the people of the Commonwealth, to obtain revenue from legalized vice. I feel sure that if the Government resolutely set themselves to secure the prohibition of the importation of opium, they will deserve, and will receive, the best thanks of the community. I trust, therefore, that legislation will be introduced at the earliest possible moment, and we can rely upon the good sense of the people of the States to back it up by any action which they may think it wise to take in effectually stamping out this soul and body destroying, State-encouraged vice.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports). — I sympathize with the views of the honorable member for Maranoa in this matter, and am of opinion that the Government will save time if they at once definitely state their policy on this question. In view of the petitions that have been presented to the House, and of the fact that two-thirds of its members will vote for the prohibition of the importation of opium, the Government might as well at once declare their policy in regard to the question. I shall not traverse the ground which has been gone over by the mover of the motion, because the stage has been passed when it was necessary to convince members of Parliament, or the country, of the undesirability of allowing opium to be imported. Honorable members have made up their minds on the subject, and nine out of every ten in the community are in favour of prohibition. Therefore, I hope that the Government will not ask for any postponement.

Mr. DEAKIN. — I shall only ask for the adjournment of the debate until I have received replies from the States as to their proposed action in the matter.

Mr. MAUGER. — I do not think that we should wait a single instant for either State or individual. Our clear and straightforward duty is to take steps to immediately put an end to this traffic. The States Governments would be brought into line with us by the opinions of the citizens of the States if we showed that we were in earnest by prohibiting the importation of opium.

Mr. DEAKIN. — I wrote to the Governments of the States ten days ago, and their replies should all be received within a fortnight.

Mr. MAUGER. — What was the object of writing?

Mr. DEAKIN. — Because it would be of no avail for the Commonwealth to prohibit the importation of opium if the States did not prohibit its cultivation.

Mr. MAUGER. — And it would be of no avail for the States to prohibit the cultivation of opium if the Commonwealth did not prohibit its importation. Therefore, whatever the States may do, it is clearly our duty to prohibit importation. Those who are opposed to this prohibition would oppose the prohibition of the cultivation of opium. If the Governments of the States said that they would not prohibit the production of opium, would that relieve us of our duty to prohibit its importation?

Mr. WEBSTER. — To merely prohibit importation will only partially remedy the evil.

Mr. MAUGER. — Yes; but it is for us to apply to it what remedy we can, and then to leave it to the States Governments to do what is in their power. However, as I am assured of the sympathy of the Prime Minister, I shall not take up more time beyond seconding the motion, and expressing the hope that, if the replies of the States Governments do not come to hand very soon, this Government will at once take steps to provide for the prohibition of the importation of opium into the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs). — I shall not oppose the motion, because prohibition has my entire sympathy, and I agree with the honorable member for Melbourne Ports in the view of the duty of the Commonwealth which he has just expressed. But at the recent Hobart Conference, it was unanimously resolved by the representatives of the States—and the resolution was, to a certain extent, concurred in by the representatives of the Commonwealth—that joint action should be taken. It was thought that the States should pass Acts restricting to chemists the sale of opium within their borders, and placing the drug in the list of poisons, which, under most, if not all, of the States Acts can be obtained only under medical certificate. The States were also to do what they could in putting down opium dens and prohibiting opium-smoking, whilst the Commonwealth was to take steps to prevent the smuggling of opium, which, as honorable members know, can be compressed into small parcels of great value, and easily concealed. The late Minister of Home Affairs received a deputation on the subject, and expressed much the same views as most of us hold in regard to the end to be sought. He made a number of inquiries as to the extent of opium-smoking throughout the Commonwealth, with the result that he was informed that, though it prevails to an alarming degree, and works untold mischief, so far as statistics show, it is increasing only in the north of Queensland, amongst the aborigines, and in the northern parts of Western Australia.

Mr. MAUGER. — Those statistics are absolutely unreliable, as the honorable and learned gentleman was informed by the deputation which waited upon him.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Statements made on the faith of police reports show the extent of opium-smoking by Europeans to have been ridiculously underestimated, but the reports of officers and the figures relating to importation indicate that the only notable increase of its use occurs in the places mentioned. In the annual report of the Chief Protector of Aborigines, Queensland, for 1904, which has just been placed in my hands by the Minister of Home Affairs, it is stated that "the degree to which opium is supplied varies greatly in different districts." The inspector remarks that one district, which he names, has "an unenviable notoriety." In the Rockhampton area "the curse appears to have reached its climax."

Protector Fitzgerald expresses the opinion that the opium traffic at the different townships lately visited by him is worse than he expected, and that at Duaringa, Blackwater, Emerald, and Clermont it could not be worse. . . . Messrs. Cutten Brothers, of Clump Point, reported that they would probably be unable to get their coffee picked during the season, owing to the blacks with their gins being enticed away by the Chinese with opium. . . . Taking the northern districts of the State alone, as compared with last year's returns, it is a sad comment on affairs that judging from an increase of approximately 15 per cent. in the number of prosecutions, the evil is not yet under control, in spite of the vigilance exercised by the police.

The Chief Protector gives a list of 212 townships where permits for the sale of opium are in force—permits which he declares to be illegal, and against the issue of which he has annually protested. The evil is real, and must be coped with; but honorable members must realize that the hearty co-operation of the States is essential. It is impossible to suppose that when the question is considered by the States Parliaments they will not agree to provide for the total suppression of the traffic.

Mr. MAUGER.—But will the Commonwealth Government prohibit the importation of opium whatever the States may do?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member for Lang adjured the Government not to be greatly concerned about the loss of revenue that would follow the prohibition of importation. About £60,000 is obtained from the duties on opium, only one-fourth of which is retained by the Commonwealth, though the remaining three-fourths—£35,000—would be a considerable loss to the States. But when what the traffic costs for its regulation is considered, and what the community loses in those who yield to the fatal fascination of the drug, from which recovery is rare, and when vaunted, as in the case of the famous De Quincey, generally doubtful, I do not think that the loss of revenue will be regarded.

Mr. WILKS.—De Quincey drank laudanum.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Precisely; as another might drink port wine. The Conference determined that the States and the Commonwealth should take joint action.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is the danger of these Conferences.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is no danger in public conferences of representative men. At times by no other means can a way be paved for legislation.

Mr. MAUGER.—We have a clear duty to perform, and yet we are holding back because of the resolution of a Conference.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I decline to believe that the conscience of Australia differs from the consciences of the several States which make up the Commonwealth. But the representatives of the States have a right to express their opinions as to the effect of legislation on States revenue, just as we have a right to consider the effect of legislation on Commonwealth interests. We shall be paying to the States only that regard called for by the proceedings of the Hobart Conference if we write and ask them what action they propose to take in order to carry out the resolution to which they unanimously agreed.

Mr. MAUGER.—Suppose that they say that they intend to take no action?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Then the matter will be brought before this House, and honorable members will be asked to discharge their duty to the Commonwealth. We shall have definite proposals to make. It seems to me that we shall be paying the smallest courtesy to the States if, after the resolutions passed at the Hobart Conference, we ask them what they are going to do. It will be necessary for us to consult them in order that common action may be taken by the States and the Commonwealth to suppress, not only the opium traffic, but also the cultivation of the poppy. We shall want their assistance and shall require to work with them in that matter.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Can the Minister say how the revenues of the States will be affected?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The figures for 1902 show that the revenue from opium in New South Wales amounted to £21,000, Victoria £10,000, Queensland £27,000, South Australia £6,000, Western Australia £5,000, and Tasmania less than £1,000. During the following year New South Wales received £16,000, Victoria £9,000, Queensland £24,000, South Australia £6,000, Western Australia £5,000, and Tasmania £500.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Then there was a general reduction in the revenue.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, happily so. As this is a revenue matter, the States are entitled to be consulted, and in the second place, we shall require their co-operation in order to make any prohibition effective, to put a stop to the cultivation of the poppy plant, and to suppress the practice of opium-smoking where it exists. We may possess incidental powers to suppress opium-smoking through the instrumentality of the Customs Department, but the States have at their hands more ready means in the police of dealing with the evil. I think that if we can join hands with the States and work in harmony with them in carrying out a reform which the moral sense of the community demands, we shall be able to act effectively.

Mr. JOHNSON.—If the States are willing to give up their proportion of the revenue derived from opium, will the Commonwealth be prepared to make a similar sacrifice?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly, without a moment's hesitation. I had intended to move the adjournment of the debate so that I might have an opportunity to speak again after replies had been received from the various States, but some other Minister will be able to inform the House of the result at a later stage. I have plenty of evidence here to convince members of the necessity of taking action in this matter. I do not pretend that this is the only abuse for which action is demanded. The Premier of New South Wales at the Hobart Conference produced evidence from his medical officer, who stated that opium-smoking was not distinct from the inordinate use of stimulants. That, however, is not the question at issue. The question is whether we are not called upon to prohibit the drug, even though our action may involve a loss of revenue.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I shall only say a few words upon this subject, because I should like to see it definitely settled at the earliest possible moment, and I believe the House is ready to vote in favour of the motion. My impression is that the Prime Minister need not defer action until he has taken counsel with the States, because I do not think that there would be the slightest demur on their part if he, on his own initiative, took the most drastic steps to-morrow.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The States' Premiers practically asked that they should be consulted.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—May I remind honorable members, who urge that because the revenue would be affected, some consideration should be given to the wishes of the States in this matter, that the States Governments do not consider us in connexion with movements for the reduction of the drink traffic. I believe that on this very day the New South Wales Parliament is discussing the question of local option, which means, if anything, a movement in the direction of the limitation of the drink traffic, and consequently a serious diminution of the revenue derived from it. I do not suppose that the New South Wales Government have consulted the Prime Minister as to how this movement would affect the revenue, and I think that, apart from the States altogether, this is a matter which we might very well take into our own hands. There would not be any cavil on the part of any of the States, even of Queensland, where the revenue would be most seriously affected. This is essentially a moral question. The opium traffic is a beggaring and a degrading one, and the sooner we put an end to its existence the better it will be for Australia. There seems to be only one way of dealing with this question. The traffic does not appear to be susceptible of regulation. Every one knows that it is difficult to regulate the vicious appetites of the people, particularly when they take this brutalizing and degrading form, and, therefore, I think we should consult the wishes of the people of Australia as a whole, if at the earliest possible moment we did our best to strike a blow at the traffic. The victims of the opium-smoking habit are practically incapable of earning any money or contributing to the revenue in any way, and if we could restore such persons to their own right-mindedness and make them decent, respectable citizens, we should convert them into wage-earners and revenue producers. We should not hesitate, therefore, to put a stop to the traffic, which can only become more degrading the longer it is continued.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—I do not think there is any necessity to enlarge upon the evils of the opium habit. We are all of opinion that it is an evil which requires to be put down. I can hardly understand how any man can stand behind the bar of a public-house and sell liquor with a knowledge of the evil effects of the liquor traffic, and in the same way it is difficult to conceive how the Government can allow the opium traffic to continue for the sake of the revenue derived from it. I think the Prime Minister has taken a somewhat pusillanimous and timorous view of the matter, and that he should be prepared to at once take action. The honorable gentleman seems to think that unless the States pass laws to prevent the cultivation of the poppy plant we can do nothing. I see no reason, however, why that step should be taken. The plant may be grown for ornamental purposes in our gardens, and we may feel satisfied that no one will take the trouble to cultivate it for commercial purposes unless they can find a market for their product. We should prohibit not only the importation of the drug into the Commonwealth, but also its manufacture in our midst. If we prohibit its manufacture, no one will have the slightest inducement to cultivate the poppy plant.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member propose to prohibit the use of opium in all its forms?

Mr. LIDDELL.—No; I would still permit opium to be introduced for medicinal purposes, but the sale of such opium should be under Government supervision. By this means we might prevent the use of the drug for smoking purposes. New Zealand has already passed a law which deals very thoroughly with the evil. Their Act prohibits the importation of opium in any form suitable for smoking—nothing is said regarding medicinal opium. Provision was made in the first Act for a penalty of £100, but that was found to be insufficient, and it was subsequently increased by an amending Act to £500. Those who import opium, which may be converted into opium for smoking purposes, are required to obtain a permit. This provision is necessary because medicinal opium can be converted into opium fit for smoking.

It is required that every transaction shall be recorded at the Customs House; the penalty for default being £10. The manufacture of opium in New Zealand is prohibited, and under the amending Act of 1902 any one found with opium in his possession is liable to be punished. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he now has an opportunity presented to him to write his name in letters of gold in the annals of his country. If he shows that he is a man of the same type as the Premier of New Zealand he will have the approval of the whole of the people of the Commonwealth, and confer an inestimable benefit on his country.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—It appears to me that the argument upon this question has proceeded on altogether wrong lines. We are assuming that all we have to do is to pass an Act of Parliament when, hey, presto, all sin and misery will disappear from the world. Honorable members, in spite of their experience as to the futility of laws for putting down the evil habits of the people, are, nevertheless, ready to pass an Act for the prohibition of the opium traffic in the full belief that the evil will at once disappear. I venture to say that if we legislate on the lines proposed, the evil, so far from disappearing, will become ten times worse than ever. Four years ago, I pointed out that by imposing an excessive duty on opium we should probably encourage smuggling, and promote the illicit use of the drug.

Mr. JOHNSON.—According to the honorable and learned member, we should not prohibit robbery, because thefts will go on in spite of the law.

Mr. CONROY.—If it were proposed to imprison opium smokers for long terms the case would be different. The idea underlying all this proposed legislation is that it will put an end to the evil which it is designed to cure. I quite recognise the evils caused by the excessive use of any drug. We are asked by the honorable member for Lang to prohibit the importation of opium for other than medicinal purposes. What I desire to point out is that, although I agree with the object which he has in view, it is impossible to attain it by that means. We could exercise only an apparent limitation, and if we were to judge by the Customs returns, after we had imposed such a restriction, we should be under the impression that not a single ounce of "smoking" opium was being introduced.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Would not that be satisfactory?

Mr. CONROY.—Not if the drug were introduced in another form, and that is exactly what has happened. To-day, opium is being more largely used than ever, and it is paying a less revenue.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Does the honorable and learned member defend the practice of obtaining revenue from that source?

Mr. CONROY.—If, by dispensing with the revenue which we derive from opium, we could put an end to the evil complained of, I say that we ought not to consider that revenue for one moment. But, although we may pass a law declaring that certain things shall be accomplished, we know very well that the desired result will not be brought about, but that very probably a still greater evil will ensue.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is pure conjecture.

Mr. CONROY.—It is not conjecture. Four years ago I pointed out what would happen when we imposed a very heavy duty upon opium. I am just as much in sympathy as anybody can be with any steps which would abolish the excessive use of the drug. But, in the first place, I say that we cannot prevent it from being smuggled into the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Mr. Lockyer, the New South Wales Collector of Customs, declares that there is very little, if any, smuggling carried on.

Mr. CONROY.—I know a very great deal better than that. Probably Mr. Lockyer would tell me that not a gallon of illicit whisky is being distilled in the whole of Australia.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not think that he would say that.

Mr. CONROY.—I am perfectly certain that if the quantity of opium which is being smuggled into Australia at the present time were divulged, honorable members would be surprised.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It is proposed to ask the States to deal with opium smokers and sellers.

Mr. CONROY.—It appears to me that the Prime Minister was perfectly correct in declaring that the desired restrictions were a matter for State regulation. What authority have we to interfere in a question of this kind? It is true that we can prohibit the importation of opium, but by so doing we shall not accomplish the object at which we aim.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—We could not prevent the cultivation of the poppy and the manufacture of opium in the Commonwealth.

Mr. CONROY.—No.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But the States themselves could do so.

Mr. CONROY.—That is an entirely different matter. The honorable member for Parramatta spoke as if it were only necessary for us to pass a Commonwealth statute, in order to accomplish the whole object of the motion. In my opinion, when we had done that, we should not even have commenced to accomplish our object. The honorable member for Hunter, I think, will bear me out when I say that probably the most valuable medicine known is opium, in one form or another. I believe that even the various soothing syrups contain a proportion of that drug. The honorable member for Lang does not propose to restrict its importation as a medicine, and, consequently, it could be used in the form of morphia. I venture to say that there are far more evil results from the excessive use of opium as a medicine than flow from its use in any other form. The report of the British Royal Commission, which went very thoroughly into this matter—

Mr. JOHNSON.—Not very thoroughly.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member cannot have read the evidence, because I base the whole of my deductions upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—A more one-sided investigation never took place.

Mr. CONROY.—That statement is not correct, and it is a slander upon the men who heard that evidence, and who endeavoured to come to an impartial decision upon it. The honorable member for Lang does not relish the finding of the Commission, because it declared that greater evils resulted from the excessive use of alcohol in European countries than attended the excessive use of opium in Eastern countries.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Does not the honorable and learned member know that the report of the Commission has been absolutely discredited by recent writers?

Mr. CONROY.—Some persons affirm that the prohibition of the sale of intoxicants in portions of New Zealand has exercised a salutary influence upon intemperance in that country. If, however, we examine the Customs receipts, we shall find that a larger revenue is being derived from whisky at the present time than was obtained from that source prior to the enactment of the prohibition laws. When we begin to talk wildly about all that we can accomplish by legislation, I claim that we are deceiving both ourselves and the public. This Parliament alone could not legislate effectually in regard to this matter. The Prime Minister himself has made that admission, and I am bound to say that I agree with him. It is in strict accordance with fact, and, therefore, I cannot differ from him, even for the purposes of opposition. The moment the States commence to deal with the question we may be able to assist them in regulating the opium traffic. If, however, we suddenly prohibit the importation of opium for smoking purposes, we shall, I am sure, have the evil complained of perpetuated in other forms. The honorable member for Hunter, the honorable member for Laanecoorie, the honorable member for Corangamite, and the honorable member for Brisbane will surely confirm my statement that it is possible to take opium in a dozen forms, either as morphia, morphine, or chlorodyne. If we legislate in the direction proposed we shall induce the excessive use of the drug in those forms, making it more difficult for us to deal with the evil.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Opium cannot be smoked in those forms.

Mr. CONROY.—But its excessive use in any one of those forms is just as harmful to the individual as is its excessive use by smoking. I do not suppose that one person out of every five, who suffers from the inordinate use of opium, indulges in the smoking of the drug.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Does the honorable and learned member mean to say that its importation in other forms could not be prohibited, to a certain extent?

Mr. CONROY.—I do. The honorable member must know of many cases in which the excessive use of morphine has been most injurious to the person concerned.

Mr. LIDDELL.—It should not be dispensed without a doctor's prescription.

Mr. CONROY.—If we suddenly prohibit the importation of opium we shall not prevent its entry into the Commonwealth. Let me give a case to illustrate my point. Some time ago, a good many boxes of preserved ginger—or what was thought to be preserved ginger—were being introduced into Melbourne; but every one of those jars was so formed that the bulb which ran up the centre was made very large, and in these bulbs a large quantity of opium was secreted. As honorable members are aware, a large quantity of pure opium can be imported in a very small space, and the drug was being surreptitiously brought in in that way. The more we seek to prohibit the traffic the greater will be the incentive to smuggling. In this connexion, I would remind honorable members of the action taken by the Parliament when it was suggested that a heavy duty should be imposed on diamonds. As a matter of fact, we refused to pass that duty, not because we held the opinion that they should not be subjected to taxation, but because we were satisfied that the imposition of the duty would lead to smuggling.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It is proposed not to impose a higher duty on opium but to prohibit its importation.

Mr. CONROY.—That is so, but since we refrained from imposing a duty on precious stones lest the result might be to increase smuggling, surely it cannot be justly said that the prohibition of opium would lead to the suppression of the traffic in Australia. Some years ago the Queensland Parliament imposed a duty on diamonds, and I was told by the head of a large jewellery establishment in Brisbane that some time later, the Treasurer of that State asked him why no revenue was being obtained from that source. The gentleman in question replied, "We have given up the direct importation of precious stones; and now buy them locally." To this the Treasurer replied, "But the stones must have been imported and should have paid duty." "That is a matter into which we do not inquire," said the head of the jewellery establishment. "We do not encourage smuggling, but we buy precious stones from those who offer them to us." Surely if the imposition of a duty on diamonds failed to prevent smuggling in Queensland, an attempt to prohibit the importation of opium into the Commonwealth would be equally unsuccessful. I hold that we ought not to play the part of hypocrites. Those who have not had time to consider the question, should not be led to believe that we can stop this traffic. In all fairness, we ought to say to the people, "We agree that the evil should be stopped, but are practically satisfied that prohibition would not have that result."

Mr. JOHNSON.—Will the honorable and learned member suggest another means of remedying the evil.

Mr. CONROY.—I cannot, but I feel confident that the adoption of the proposal made by the honorable member would not have the desired effect. We should simply lose the revenue now derived from the duty on opium and the evils arising from the traffic would not be mitigated. I should be prepared to sacrifice the revenue derived from the duty on opium, if by prohibiting the trade we could put an end to the evil; but I am satisfied that prohibition would really intensify the evil. Probably, far greater injury arises from over-eating than from any other evil habit.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Over-drinking is worse.

Mr. CONROY.—It is certainly much more repulsive so far as appearances go, but we cannot by legislation put an end to these and kindred evils. Under the present system, there is more chance of grappling with the evils arising from opium smoking, than there would be if we prohibited the importation of the drug; for smuggling would be successfully carried on, and we should have difficulty in coping with it. It is not because I have no desire to see the evil abolished, but rather because I hold that the suggested legislation would be fore-doomed to failure, that I oppose the motion.

Debate (on motion by Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN) adjourned.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

Debate resumed from 17th August (vide page 1128), on motion by Mr. HIGGINS—

That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty as follows—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the members of the House of Representatives, in Parliament assembled, desire most earnestly in our name and on behalf of the people whom we represent, to express our unswerving loyalty and devotion to Your Majesty's person and Government.

We have observed with feelings of profound satisfaction the evidence afforded by recent legislation and recent debates in the Houses of Parliament of the United Kingdom, of a sincere desire now to deal justly with Ireland; and in particular we congratulate the people of the United Kingdom on the remarkable Act directed towards the settlement of the land question, and on the concession to the people of Ireland of a measure of local government for municipal purposes. But the sad history of Ireland since the Act of Union shows that no British Parliament can understand or effectively deal with the economic and social conditions of Ireland.

Enjoying and appreciating as we do the blessings of Home Rule here, we would humbly express the hope that a just measure of Home Rule may be granted to the people of Ireland. They ask for it through their representatives—never has request more clear, consistent, and continuous been made by any nation. As subjects of Your Majesty we are interested in the peace and contentment of all parts of the Empire, and we desire to see this long-standing grievance at the very heart of the Empire removed. It is our desire for the solidarity and permanence of the Empire, as a Power making for peace and civilization, that must be our excuse for submitting to Your Majesty this respectful petition.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—When this question was under consideration some days ago I occupied the last few minutes of the time set apart for the consideration of private members' business, and the House granted me leave to continue my remarks to-day. I was then entering upon a reply to the able arguments that had been put forward so calmly and dispassionately by the mover of the motion and the honorable and learned member for Angas, and urged that the mere fact that the motion was a lengthy one should in itself be sufficient to arouse suspicion. I pointed out that it was really a gilded pill; that the motion was nicely worded; and that the speeches of those who had supported it had been characterized by good taste and expressions of goodwill towards the Empire. If all the advocates of Home Rule simply desired the introduction of the system suggested by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for Angas, there would be very little necessity to debate the question. But the position is different. In the first place, I think, for reasons which I shall presently submit to the House, that the motion should not have been introduced at all; but, inasmuch as it has been moved and supported, it becomes my duty, as one who is opposed to it, to combat the arguments that have been submitted in favour of its adoption. In the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for Angas the motion finds two doughty champions. Their astuteness, their legal training, and their ready flow of arguments make them formidable antagonists, but I shall endeavour to show the House why I, and those who think with me, oppose Home Rule for Ireland, as advocated by the present leaders of the movement. If those who are prominently identified with the agitation for Home Rule in the old world were as philosophical as are those who have supported this motion, there would be little to fear from the carrying out of the proposition. I feel satisfied that if the members of the Imperial Government who are opposed to the granting of Home Rule for Ireland were convinced that its advocates all shared the views of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for Angas, their opposition to the proposal would be considerably modified. When the matter was previously under consideration, I pointed out, in reply to the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who had quoted the remarks of the younger Pitt, that Pitt's policy had not been carried out, and he admitted that that was so. We find, in the concluding paragraph of the motion, the statement that—

Enjoying and appreciating as we do the blessings of Home Rule here, we would humbly express the hope that a just measure of Home Rule may be granted to the people of Ireland.

I would point out, however, that we have Home Rule in Australia as a part of the Empire, while the advocates of Home Rule for Ireland, according to their most recent statements, seek "Home Rule with separation."

Mr. CONROY.—That was not so in the statement of Mr. Redmond.

Mr. WILKS. — If the honorable and learned member will permit me to deal with the subject in my own way, he will see that I am furnished with the most recent utterances of advocates of Home Rule in England to prove that their ideal differs from that of the honorable and learned members for Northern Melbourne and Angas. With regard to the words "just measure," the first question which arises is, "Who is to define a just measure?" Is that system just which is advocated by the honorable and learned member for Angas, who says that Ireland is prepared to receive a subordinate Parliament? What she asks for is a co-ordinate Parliament. She will not be satisfied with an extension of municipal government, because, under the Acts of 1903, she possesses advanced local government and advanced land legislation. My argument against interference is twofold. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne says that Australia has already interfered in matters in which she is not concerned, and instanced our action in sending troops to the Transvaal, and in protesting against the employment of Chinese on the Rand. But in that interference we were justified, because, in the first case, thousands of our citizens had gone to the Transvaal, and, in the second place, we had had experience of the effect of allowing large numbers of Chinamen to come into the country, which the people of the United Kingdom had not had. The last sentence of the motion reads—

It is our desire for the solidarity and permanence of the Empire, as a power making for peace and civilization, that must be our excuse for submitting to Your Majesty this respectful petition.

As I have already pointed out, the phraseology there employed is similar to that used by Daniel O'Connell, and, in an interjection, I charged the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne with having, consciously or unconsciously, almost cribbed the exact language employed in several of the speeches of that famous man. When, during the honorable and learned member's speech, I interjected that a large part of the Irish do not wish for Home Rule, he replied that I interjected officially, as leader of the Orange organization in New South Wales. I am sorry that he referred to that organization, and suggested that I am not a free agent in this matter. To say that I am not a free agent is as true as to say that he is not, and that he moved the motion at the dictation of the local Hibernian Society, and by direction of Archbishop Carr. I am as free in this matter as he is, and take full responsibility for my utterances; but I am sorry that he made that reference to the Orange institution. He further said that in 1800 the Orange lodges opposed the Union; but there he is wrong in his history, because Daniel O'Connell, speaking at the time, said that it was the Orangemen who caused it to be brought about. The honorable and learned member supported his motion by a very weak argument when he said—

I say, too, speaking now to members who have had to face elections in all parts of Australia, that we have a direct interest in removing this cause of friction from our Australian issues.

Do those who wish for Home Rule think much of an advocate who brings that forward as a reason?

Mr. TUDOR.—Why does the honorable member oppose the motion?

Mr. WILKS.—Because I am absolutely opposed to Home Rule. But I deny that it is a cause of friction in Australia, though, even if it were, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne would have placed himself in a most humiliating position in asking this House to vote for the motion on grounds of personal convenience and interest, to remove a cause of friction from Australian issues. The honorable and learned member said—

All I am asking for is a just measure of Home Rule. The decision as to what is just must be left to those who have the power.

Do the believers in Home Rule ask for a just system? What they ask for is Home Rule, and I warn them to beware of those who would modify the request by asking for a "just" system. It is the Imperial Government which has the power in this matter, and the question should be left to them for decision. The honorable and learned member drew a harrowing picture of the dire distresses of Ireland, and in support of his statements said—

I do not know that I can appeal to any statistical authority higher than Sir Robert Giffen—a man whose motives cannot be impugned, and whose skill is proverbial—a man who is himself a unionist.

The honorable and learned member accepts the authority of this great statistician in regard to Home Rule, but he refuses to take it in regard to the fiscal question. He said—

The union between Great Britain and Ireland is an admitted failure—conceived in blunder, consummated in fraud, and maintained to the discredit and the damage of the people of the Empire.

There, again, is a striking similarity between the words he employs and those of another Irish advocate of Home Rule, Mr. John Devlin, M.P., who, on the 14th July, is reported in the Galway Observer to have said of the Union, "It was born of treachery and corruption." The honorable and learned gentleman appealed to our sympathies by the sad picture which he drew of the depopulation of Ireland, but I ask, Are the only emigrants from the United Kingdom Irishmen? Have not Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen also left their native country, and gone to other parts of the world? Is not the bulk of the population of the United States English, or of English descent. And is not the bulk of our population of English descent? But we do not find Englishmen, Scotchmen, or Welshmen when abroad posing as exiles from their native land. They do not pretend to stand, with streaming eyes, on the shores of foreign countries, deploring their absence from the country of their birth. Irishmen, like others, go abroad for their own advantage and gain, and they, and their descendants are glad that they have come to Australia to settle. It is merely to play on sentiment to speak of them as exiles. If all Irishmen felt in that way, why do not men like the honorable and learned member and the honorable and learned member for Angus, who are able to do so, return to the Emerald Isle? Personally, I should be very sorry if either of them were to leave the Commonwealth. But although the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne expressed so much concern about the depopulation of Ireland, I understand that he is prepared very shortly to vote for the appointment of a High Commissioner, one of whose duties will be to try to induce the people of the United Kingdom to emigrate to Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I wish them to come here with friendly hearts.

Mr. WILKS.—How is it that Irishmen in America and Australia always profess hatred of England, while Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen have only kindly feelings for the land which they have left? I do not intend to turn back the dark pages of history; I am dealing only with things as they are to-day. Then, again, although the honorable and learned member deplored and bewailed the decay of Irish manufactures, he, as a protectionist, has always refused to open the doors of Australia to Irish goods. Why does he not prove his sympathy in a practical way, by assisting those of us who would make Australia free to the commerce of the world to open her ports to Irish manufactures? If the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne means to convey anything, he surely desires that the Union shall be dissolved. If he does not so desire, I cannot see how his advocacy of Home Rule can be of any use to those who are in the forefront of the Irish national movement. Now let us look at the conditions existing in Ireland to-day under the Union with Great Britain. The conditions under British rule are the same in the North as in the South of Ireland. The people in both parts of the island have to obey the same laws.

Mr. RONALD.—Oh.

Mr. WILKS.—I presume the honorable member will acknowledge that the people in the North and South of Ireland are subject to the same Constitution and the same laws.

Mr. RONALD.—I shall prove presently that they are not.

Mr. WILKS.—How is it to be accounted for that Antrim and Down are prosperous, whilst Wexford and Kilkenny are not? Why is it that Belfast is prosperous, and Cork and Galway are in distress?

Mr. MAHON.—How does the honorable member account for it?

Mr. WILKS.—I do not pretend to account for it. It cannot be claimed that the South is any less fertile, or its resources any less than those of the North. As a matter of fact, in both respects, the South has, if anything, an advantage over the North. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said that Pitt's prophecy with regard to the Union had not been fulfilled. I shall now quote from a prediction of Daniel O'Connell to show that he also was wrong. He said—

There lives not a man less desirous of a separation between the two countries—there lives not a man more deeply convinced, that the connexion between men, established upon the basis of one King and separate Parliaments, would be of the utmost value to the peace and happiness of both countries, and to the liberties of the civilized world.

Gladstone also, when advocating Home Rule for Ireland, was ever wont to point to the conditions existing in Sweden and Norway as constituting an argument in favour of the dual system of Government proposed to be applied to Ireland.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Sweden and Norway had not Home Rule; they were two independent kingdoms.

Mr. WILKS.—Mr. Gladstone said—

Not discord, not convulsions, not hatred, not aversion, but a constant growing sympathy, and he ventured to predict that the tie between men would never be broken.

Those were his remarks with regard to Norway and Sweden. Daniel O'Connell asked for separate Parliaments under one Government, and did not want separation. Gladstone advocated the adoption of the system under which Norway and Sweden were working.

Mr. CROUCH.—He did not advocate the adoption of that system, but made merely a casual reference to it.

Mr. WILKS.—The Union between Sweden and Norway was formed in 1814, each country being under its own Government, its own Constitution, and its own code of laws. The economic doctrine of Sweden was protection, and that of Norway was free-trade. The analogy between Sweden and Norway, and Great Britain and Ireland, was almost perfect, and I can quite understand Mr. Gladstone referring to the former countries. But history shows that the Union of Sweden and Norway was productive of ever increasing discord, which, after twenty-five years of agitation, resulted in separation a few months ago. The Norwegians were not animated by any spirit of animosity to King Oscar, but the majority of the Irish Nationalists certainly express hatred of King Edward VII.

Mr. RONALD.—That is a slander.

Mr. WILKS.—It is not a slander, because I shall show from their own speeches that what I say is perfectly true. Norway and Sweden existed under a dual system of government for ninety years, and a dissolution took place, as I have said, only a few months ago, as the result of the verdict of an overwhelming majority of the electors. The only members of the Storting who opposed the movement were five Socialists. The referendum resulted in something like 400,000 persons voting in favour of the dissolution, whilst those against it numbered only 182. One of my arguments against granting Home Rule to the Irish people is that they are aiming at separation from Great Britain. There is no use in beating about the bush, so far as that is concerned. They wish to establish a separate Parliament, not only with legislative power, but with Executive force. The honorable and learned member for Angas admitted that; but he suggested as a solution of the difficulty that there should be a Federal Council; that Scotland, Wales, England, and Ireland should each have its Parliament, and that over them all should be a Federal Council. We have a Federal Parliament here, and our experience has not been altogether a happy one. This, however, is not the system advocated by the Irish Nationalists, but is merely the solution proposed by the honorable and learned member for Angas. The weakness of the dual system of government has also been shown in Austro-Hungary. The Emperor of Austria is highly respected, and it is said that he exercises a great influence for peace in Europe. He is popular with both Hungarians and Austrians; but the dual system of government imposes an everlasting strain upon the people, and the union may be broken up at any time. Those who study European politics must bear out what I am now saying. I am now endeavouring to show the evils of dual government. Lord Rosebery, speaking on this subject during the current year, said—

I know it is said the views I have expressed are inconsistent with sympathy for Ireland. I do not agree with that view. Our view, as statesmen and legislators, is to do the best that we can for Ireland, and if we do not believe, from contemporary experience, that the measures contemplated at one time would now do good to Ireland, we are not to be accused of want of sympathy with her. We know her long sorrows; we know the crushing injustice to which she was subjected for centuries, but we also feel that we have done something to redress the balance, and that a country which has given them the freest county institutions in the last few years, and which has within the last two years pledged its credit to no less than £112,000,000 to redeem the soil of Ireland from any reproach of ownership to which it was liable, is not particularly subject to any reproach of not being sufficiently attentive to the wrongs of Ireland. My view, in a word, is this—I leave here for a moment my character of a city voter—that you may give much to Ireland—and in that respect we have at any rate the example of the recent dealings of the present Government with Ireland—you may do her inestimable good by proceeding on the grounds of administrative reform, but there is one thing to which no serious statesman would ever expose this country, and that is, the curse of dual government at the heart of the Empire. You see by the long protracted crisis in Norway and Sweden—I am not going to say who is right or wrong—you see by the constant crises which seem to have assumed almost a permanent character in Austria-Hungary—that are the results of dualism—vultures gnawing at the very vitals of the Empire, and we may be forgiven if we will not expose our Imperial heritage and Imperial future to any such danger.

That speech was delivered before the result of the referendum in Sweden and Norway was known. I say that, instead of making for the peace of the Empire, the granting of Home Rule to Ireland would make for the pieces of the Empire. If the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne desires to cause disruption and trouble, he is going the right way to bring it about. I have asserted that the advocates of Home Rule desire separation from Great Britain, and I shall produce proofs in support of my statement. I can understand Irishmen who believe in Home Rule asking for separation; but I cannot understand how proposals such as those which have been presented to this House, could be accepted by the Irish people. Parnell, in his celebrated declaration in 1880—and no one will deny Parnell's power with the Irish people—said—

None of us will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England.

Then Mr. William Redmond, M.P., who was recently in Australia—another authority on the question—when addressing the House of Commons on the Franchise Bill, said—

You need not think that this Bill, if carried, will stay the movement for separation. We will never cease that agitation until we fully attain our object.

On 31st January, 1883, Mr. Redmond said—

We look upon no concession as adequate until we have reached the goal of national independence.

Mr. RONALD.—Parnell referred in the first case to the legislative link.

Mr. WILKS.—It is legislative bunkum, so far as that member is concerned. Mr. John Redmond, who was leader of the Nationalists in 1885, said, "Perish the Empire! Live Ireland!" Was it a legislative "perish" that was then referred to? Do these men speak in such subtle phrases that we cannot understand them? Then, again, Mr. Dillon, on 30th January of this year, is reported in the Cork Examiner—I take these extracts from Irish, and not from English papers—as having stated at a meeting held at Thurles—

That grand meeting in the heart of the great county of Tipperary reminded him of twenty-five years ago, and he took it as a sign of the national revival in Tipperary, as in the other counties of Ireland, which would sweep before it all vestiges of English rule in Ireland. They never would have in Ireland a really prosperous and happy land until that rule was swept clean out of it.

Mr. RONALD.—Hear, hear!

Mr. WILKS.—Does the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne say that that is his idea of Home Rule? He is so fond of Home Rule that he cannot even interject an affirmation.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is disorderly to interject.

Mr. WILKS.—To the friends of Home Rule let me commend the attitude of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who, when asked a straight question, replies, "I cannot interject." He would not venture to be even a little disorderly on behalf of the cause he espouses. He knows very well that if he affirmed the resolution which I have read, the motion under consideration would not pass this House. The honorable and learned member is such a great friend of the Irish and of the Irish cause that he cannot answer a pertinent question. Quite recently he stated that I had no freedom of action. I ask him where his freedom of action comes in, seeing that he cannot interject even a "Yes," or a "No."

Mr. HIGGINS.—If the honorable member does not occupy too long I shall get an opportunity of replying to him.

Mr. WILKS. — The honorable and learned member can reply by a "Yes" or a "No." I wish now to quote a statement made by Mr. Devlin, M.P., upon 25th January last.

Mr. TUDOR.—Who is Mr. Devlin?

Mr. WILKS.—If the honorable member is acquainted with the subject of Home Rule, these names ought to be as familiar to him as are his nursery rhymes. He is a lovely specimen of a Home Ruler, seeing that he does not know even the names of the advocates of that cause.

Mr. RONALD.—The names of those advocates are all that the honorable member does know.

Mr. WILKS.—I am familiar with their speeches and their characters. Mr. Devlin in the Kilkenny Journal, said—

He appealed to them as lovers of their country, and as men anxious to lift her from the slough into which she had been reduced by the tyranny and oppression of centuries, to rally their forces together, and there, as in other parts of the country, make British Government impossible, as the most effective means of ridding the country of the greatest curse that ever plagued a nation.

Thus we learn that British rule is to-day considered the greatest curse that ever befel a nation. Yet we are told that Home Rule will make for the strength and peace of the Empire. These are the statements of the prominent men in the Home Rule movement. I now propose to deal with the power behind them. I intend to take the United Irish League as it exists in Ireland to-day, and to compare the character of its advocacy with that of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for Angas. I wish to make it clear that their desires in this connexion are not likely to meet with the wishes of the advocates of Home Rule in Ireland. The United Irish League is the official party organization of what is known in the House of Commons as the "National" party. It is that party's fighting organization, and it is composed of the electors of Ireland who believe in the system of Home Rule, advocated by the men to whom I have already referred. Upon 21st January of the present year the report of the Kinwarra branch of the league appears in the Clare Champion—

The treasurer of the branch announced:—Clonascree and Cartron will not be behind when the collection is finished, neither will Dungora. The town collectors will start on next week, and, as they are men of grit, 'tis to be hoped they will take no "soft sawder." . . . A rigid scrutiny will be kept of the payments made, and any one refusing to subscribe will appear in the list of defaulters to be published.

I quote that to show that the League takes good care that nobody shall stand outside of its ranks.

Mr. HIGGINS.—From what newspaper is that statement quoted?

Mr. WILKS.—From the Clare Champion of 21st January last.

Mr. TUDOR.—Has the honorable member got the paper?

Mr. WILKS.—Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I should like to see it.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member is doubting my authority. I have quite as much right to doubt the accuracy of his statement when he quoted Fox—a most miserable authority upon this question. The United Irish League is either copying the rules of the Labour Party in Australia, or that party is copying its rules. Possibly that fact may account for the great warmth of the sympathy which members of the Labour Party profess with the cause of Home Rule. The United Irish League is a beautiful specimen of a free agency—if a man does not pay up, he is marked down as a defaulter.

Mr. WILSON.—Does the honorable member call that a black-list?

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member may call it what he likes. Another branch of the League—the Clostown Branch—upon 29th January, carried the following resolution:—

That we give this, our final warning, to every member of this branch that they will not be allowed to retain their cards of membership if they support or associate with non-members.

If they associate with non-members they will not be allowed to retain their cards of membership! Under such circumstances will they be prepared to accept the milk-and-water resolution submitted by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne? Upon a former occasion, I asked him whether he had brought forward this motion merely for debating society purposes, or with serious intent, and he replied that he had submitted it with serious intent. He said that he hoped to get it forwarded to the Imperial authorities as the deliberate expression of the opinion of this Parliament. By resolution the members of the United Irish League have declared that they require exactly what their leaders have demanded, namely, a separate Parliament, with legislative power and authority equal to our own. In Australia, we have power to raise an army and navy, if we can find the money. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for Angas both deny that the Irish people desire power to be given to an Irish Parliament to create a separate army or navy.

Mr. RONALD.—That proposal was not contained in Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill.

Mr. WILKS.—No, but the Irish people declare that they will not accept Mr. Gladstone's Bill.

Mr. RONALD.—They have never said so.

Mr. WILKS.—I can show that they have said so quite recently. Surely the Imperial authorities know the requirements of the Irish people better than we do. Are we to understand that the position of the Saxon, with his foot upon the throat of the Celt, still obtains? I ask the honorable member for Coolgardie whether he thinks that the British Parliament to-day entertains the same opinion upon this question as it did twenty years ago?

Mr. MAHON. — I have not been there lately.

Mr. WILKS.—But the honorable member is familiar with what is going on. He took an active part in this movement with Mr. Parnell, and he must know that the opinion of the Imperial Parliament in regard to it has undergone a change. The cry that the Saxon wishes to get his foot upon the throat of the Celt does not hold good now. I wish to show that those who are foremost in the Home Rule ranks are absolutely in favour of separation from the mother country, and, as a citizen of Australia, I am opposed to anybody who would bring about the disintegration of the Empire. I will now quote from the utterances of the notorious Pat Ford, an earnest, outspoken Irishman. The honorable member for Coolgardie knows his name very well, and he cannot deny that he is an earnest, straight-out Irishman.

Mr. MAHON.—He is more an American than an Irishman.

Mr. WILKS.—The United Irish League look to him for assistance in Irish matters. They regard him as one of their leading lights. The Connaught Leader of 4th February says of the notorious Pat Ford—

England has displaced our race, not destroyed it; England robbed us in the old world, and she villifies us in the new. But the day of reckoning will come. And, oh! when it does come. What deeds worthy of the opportunity will be enacted! What sweet revenge will be taken! Greater Ireland—thirty millions of the American people long for that opportunity. The Irish world has raised many funds for Ireland. Some were for those in distress, some were for the Home Rule cause, and other sums were to be used at the discretion of the recipients. Whether they used the money for parliamentary purposes or for dynamite, or for both, we didn't ask.

Yet I am told by the honorable member for Northern Melbourne that the advocates of Home Rule to-day are animated by friendliness towards the United Kingdom.

Mr. CROUCH.—Ford always advocated physical force.

Mr. WILKS.—I will come to the question of physical force presently. I have quoted a few statements upon the political aspect of Home Rule by its advocates—so far as the South of Ireland is concerned. I have shown that their desire unquestionably is to establish a separate Parliament, and to obtain separation from England. If the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne believes that the existing Union is productive of all the misery which he has pictured he should fight for its repeal. If he does so, he will be found in opposition to the right honorable member for Swan. The latter has affirmed that we ought not to take a vote upon this matter because he has some Irish friends. Why should I not take up a similar position? He must hold opinions either for or against Home Rule. Let him boldly declare upon which side he is. Everybody is aware that I am an opponent of Home Rule. The right honorable member for Swan is equally an opponent of this motion, but he does not wish to make ill friends over it. I might as well argue that honorable members ought not to vote in favour of free-trade because by so doing they may offend their protectionist friends. As a citizen of Australia, I am opposed to this motion. I do not believe that it is in the interests of the people of Ireland that it should be carried; but, even if it be carried, it will not be acceptable to those who honestly advocate Home Rule, as we know it. Then there is another danger to be apprehended. Everybody knows that upon this question the North of Ireland is opposed to the South of Ireland. Mr. Gladstone admitted that there were 2,000,000 Irish people who were opposed to Home Rule. This admission was made by Mr. Gladstone in a speech which he delivered in 1886.

Mr. RONALD.—Two millions? What is the total population of Ireland?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—About 4,750,000.

Mr. WILKS.—That is so. My opposition to the motion is founded on good reasons. The people of the North of Ireland object to Home Rule being granted, while those of the South of Ireland are crying out for it. In these circumstances, why should the Parliament of Australia step in to decide the matter?

Mr. RONALD.—The people of the North of Ireland do not object to Home Rule.

Mr. WILKS.—If the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne had desired to inflame sectarian feeling in Australia he could not have done better than submit this proposition to the House. If his desire is to create party strife, then he certainly has taken a right step. If the motion be rejected, as I hope it will be, those who are in favour of it will immediately form themselves into camps to support the project in view, while, on the other hand, if it be accepted, its opponents will marshal themselves into line to combat the granting of Home Rule. It will thus be seen that this motion cannot be attended with good results to those who believe in the principle, but, on the contrary, is calculated only to foment sectarian differences in Australia. Those who really believe in Home Rule for Ireland cannot support the measure of Home Rule suggested by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, while, so far as those who are opposed to the principle are concerned, this motion is merely an attempt to throw the apple of discord into the arena. If I could put an end to sectarianism I should be ready to go a long way to do so. I know that this statement will not be accepted by many in the House, as well as out of it, but I make it in all sincerity. Had those who favour Home Rule desired to encourage the party to which I belong, they could not have taken a better step than they have done in this instance. The straight-out supporters of Home Rule for Ireland will object to the proposal embodied in the motion as a milk-and-water one, while those who are against it will certainly oppose it in the interests of peace. Either the difficulties under which Ireland labours, according to the honorable and learned member for Angus, must be very trivial, or the solution which he suggests is a very weak one. We know that the Imperial Parliament has, within a comparatively short time, agreed to a measure by which up to £100,000,000 may be advanced to enable tenants to buy their own holdings on easy terms, as well as £12,000,000 by way of a bonus on the purchase price to induce landlords to sell. In this way, as well as by the passing of the Local Government Act, giving the Irish people free institutions in the shape of County Councils, the Imperial Parliament has done much to remedy the troubles which formerly existed in Ireland. Although the people of the North of Ireland are bitterly opposed to Home Rule, we are urged to step into the arena, and to ask that it be granted. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said that we had a knowledge of the position of Ireland. Does he really think that that is so?

Mr. HIGGINS.—If the honorable member had he would vote with us.

Mr. WILKS.—I have compared the statements made by the mover of the motion and the honorable and learned member for Angus with those of prominent supporters of the movement in the old world, and have endeavoured to combat their arguments. I have no desire to see the present struggle continued. No one could wish to see one part of the British race pitted against another, but I am satisfied that the proposal made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne would not provide a solution of the difficulty. The people of the North of Ireland say that they are opposed to Home Rule, because they believe it would lead to clerical interference in secular matters.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The independent Orangemen, according to the London Times, say that to refuse to grant Home Rule is really to play into the hands of the priests.

Mr. WILKS.—I do not know whether the honorable and learned member, when he speaks of "the independent Orangemen," wishes to suggest that I am nothing better than a base slave. I am just as free as he is to act in this matter as my conscience dictates. As a matter of fact, an independent Home Ruler would not talk as he has done. In support of the contention of the people of the North of Ireland that Home Rule would lead to clerical interference in secular matters, I desire to point out that out of ninety-six meetings which were held under the auspices of the United Irish League, between the 21st of January and the 15th of February last, eighty-three were presided over by priests. At thirty of these meetings priests were speakers in favour of the resolutions submitted, while in fifty-six other cases they were supporters of the proposals. I think it is well for me to say at this stage that, in my opinion, a priest is just as much entitled as is any other elector in the community to exercise his civil rights, but it is somewhat singular that interference in secular matters on the part of one section of the clergy is described as "sectarian interference," while such interference on the part of those on the other side is said to be only the due exercise of a civil right. I hold that priests and parsons are just as much entitled to exercise their civil rights as are any other class of men; but the people of the North of Ireland have had so many evidences of interference on the part of the priests of the South of Ireland that they are strongly opposed to the granting of Home Rule. I have taken an extract from a speech made by a clerical gentleman, in order to demonstrate to the honorable member for Southern Melbourne, who was at one time an ecclesiastic—

Mr. RONALD.—And is.

Mr. WILKS.—I am glad to hear it. But for the honorable member's statement I should not have known that he was still an ecclesiastic, so well has he succeeded in disguising that fact. The honorable member holds certain views in regard to this question, and I now wish to put before him a statement made by another ecclesiastic—the Rev. Father Casey—who is reported in the Limerick Leader to have made this statement on 10th of June last—

They would secure Home Rule by the aid of a fighting party in the House of Commons. He would as quickly advocate a physical force policy, but he saw no prospect of its success.

Surely I am not to understand that this reverend gentleman was not speaking the truth? And can it be said that the statement I have just read gives evidence of a feeling of friendliness towards England?

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is the refusal of Home Rule for Ireland which makes statements of that sort possible.

Mr. WILKS.—All that has been refused Ireland is Home Rule with separation. The Imperial Government have shown their readiness to give her every freedom except that incidental to separation. If Ireland were granted the measure of Home Rule that Australia and Canada enjoy, she would need a navy and an army. We should refuse to give them those powers.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Home Rule Bill which was accepted by Parnell had a provision against that.

Mr. WILKS.—That was not the Home Rule Bill accepted by Mr. Redmond and other present-day supporters of the principle.

Mr. HIGGINS.—They hope to secure a better one.

Mr. WILKS.—And that better one is a Bill granting to Ireland a co-ordinate Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member will find no responsible person advocating a co-ordinate Parliament.

Mr. WILKS.—I have read extracts from statements made by John Dillon, John Devlin, John Redmond, and the United Irish League, which bear out my contention. According to the honorable and learned member, the United Irish League is not responsible for the utterances of John Redmond, but he himself must be held responsible for them.

Mr. HIGGINS.—None of those authorities have supported or asked for a co-ordinate Parliament.

Mr. WILKS.—I have shown that they ask for a separate Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Can the honorable member give a single instance in which a request for a co-ordinate Parliament has been made?

Mr. WILKS.—Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Where?

Mr. WILKS.—In the speeches I have just read such a request will be found.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Let us hear it.

Mr. WILKS.—I have already read speeches in which a demand was made for separation, and we know that the people of Ireland cannot have separation without having full legislative and executive power.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member ought not to play on terms. If he could cite an instance in which a request for a co-ordinate Parliament was made, I should like to hear it.

Mr. WILKS.—It is somewhat remarkable that a lawyer should say to a layman, "Do not play upon terms."

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member can give the lawyers some points.

Mr. WILKS.—To say the least, it is remarkable that a skilled lawyer should call upon an unoffending and innocent layman to refrain from playing upon terms. Let me give another illustration of the reason why the people of the North of Ireland fear the introduction of Home Rule. In 1868 Cardinal Moran, whilst private secretary to Cardinal Cullen, re-issued, as a meritorious and valuable work, Peter Lombard's De Regno Hibernia, in which it is declared that—

The Irish hold themselves bound in allegiance to the Holy See as its subjects, not only in spirituals, but also in temporals.

That is the crux of the position. The people of the North of Ireland to-day believe that the South of Ireland responds to the sovereign powers of the Pontiff in temporal as well as in spiritual matters. I have nothing to do with any inquiry as to what a man's religion may be. A man's religious belief is a matter which rests between himself and his Creator, and I hold that any one who seeks to come between a man and his religion is guilty of nothing less than downright impudence. But I should like to say that I am an Orangeman, not because of the religious belief of any section of the community, but because I hold that those of the Roman Catholic faith owe allegiance to the Pontiff in matters temporal as well as spiritual. It is for this, among other reasons, that the people of the North of Ireland are opposed to Home Rule. The people of the north and south would be able to form a happy, peaceful nation but for clerical interference. The honorable member for Southern Melbourne had the privilege of being acquainted with a distinguished Orangeman in this country—the Marquis of Linlithgow; but surely he did not find him anxious in any way to destroy the peace of the community? Although he was Governor-General of Australia, the present Marquis of Linlithgow—then Earl of Hopetoun—did not think that it was dishonorable to belong to the Orange Lodge, and that body to-day has among its members some of the leading men in England and Ireland. They have joined that organization, not because they disagree with the religious beliefs of any particular section of the community, but because they fear that British sovereignty will be destroyed by clerical domination in Ireland. They fear that, with the granting of Home Rule, the present clerical interference and domination would continue in Ireland.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member says that the clerical domination would continue.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member knows that it has continued.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is as bad now as it would be in the event of Home Rule being granted.

Mr. WILKS.—It is bad enough now.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may or may not be, but at the same time it would not be any worse under Home Rule.

Mr. WILKS.—I wish now to refer to a statement which appeared in a recent issue of the Freeman's Journal. I have no complaint to make against that publication. The conductors of it exercise their right as journalists to criticise my public actions in common with those of other public men, and in a recent issue they pointed out that when I made a certain interjection in the course of the speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, with reference to what happened in the days of the Irish Parliament, I should have been told that that was a Protestant Parliament. If I had made a statement of that character, I should have been accused of the basest and vilest sectarianism. If the excuse for the conditions which existed during the eighteen years' life of the Irish Parliament is that it was a Protestant Parliament, are we to take it that honorable members desire to see Ireland with a Roman Catholic Parliament? Does the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne think that that would make for peace? Would it not rather make for civil war? Even the advocates of Home Rule, and Mr. Gladstone himself, have said that the Irish would fight it out, north against south. I admire the splendid command of language which the Irish possess when appealing on grounds of sentiment, and I wish to see the distresses of Ireland removed. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne says that the passing of this bald resolution will remove them, but I do not think that the true advocates of Home Rule will be content with this lavender-water style of dealing with the question. Even my comparatively cold nature would not accept advocacy of that kind. Ireland's cries have little foundation, if the passing of this motion will satisfy them. The honorable and learned member referred to Fox as in favour of Home Rule. I did not think that my memory had served me false, but to make sure, I looked up my history again, and I find that when Pitt proposed to amend the navigation laws to allow Ireland to share in the benefits of the colonial trade, Fox protested that it was an attempt to make Ireland the grand arbitress of all the commercial interests of the Empire, and forced Pitt to recede from his position, and to give a more English colour to the scheme. The troubles of Ireland commenced with the Government which Fox supported.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Fox was always in opposition.

Mr. WILKS.—Not when the troubles of Ireland started. When Pitt had given way in this matter, Fox turned round, and protested that if Ireland joined the Union, she would resign her legislative independence. That is the way in which this reliable friend of Ireland blew hot and cold on the subject. If any nation has reason to complain of its friends, it is Ireland in this connexion. If I thought that the carrying of the motion would do good, I would support it; but I think that, on the contrary, it would have the effect of accentuating the difficulty. If the only way of relieving Ireland's distresses were to give her a Parliament, I would vote for giving her a Parliament with powers equal to our own. I am afraid, however, that if she possessed such powers, there would be a struggle between the north and south, and the history of Norway and Sweden shows how Parliaments in proximity tend to disintegrate a country. Ireland is only a few hours distant from the seat of the Imperial Parliament. Sydney is further removed from the seat of the Commonwealth Government than is Dublin from London, and it might as well be argued that New South Wales suffers from her connexion with the Commonwealth, as that Ireland suffers from her connexion with the Empire.

Mr. RONALD.—But New South Wales has a Parliament of its own.

Mr. WILKS.—And Ireland has advanced municipal institutions. Furthermore, she receives as a special concession representation in the House of Commons altogether out of proportion to her population. On a population basis, she would have seventy-one representatives in the House, whereas she has 103. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne in the Convention was strongly opposed to the granting of equal representation to the States, because he thought that representation should always be in accordance with population. There was no stronger advocate then of the democratic principle of representation on a population basis. But, although Scotland, Wales, and England have to be satisfied with such a representation, the honorable and learned gentleman thinks that Ireland has ground for complaint when she possesses a representation of thirty-two members more than her population entitles her to. The Irish question has caused a great deal of trouble in Imperial affairs. It was responsible for breaking up the Liberal party and forming the Liberal Union party, and drove from the Liberal ranks some of its greatest men. For years past it has led to the obscuring of other issues. But the more the Imperial Parliament does for Ireland, the more her people demand, and it is useless to shut our eyes to the fact that the Irish will not be satisfied until they get separation. They certainly will not be satisfied with the passing of this milk-and-water motion. In my opinion, the members of the Imperial Government are not fiends incarnate; they are not men without sympathy; nor are they unacquainted with the condition of Ireland. They know the condition of Ireland better than we can, and only two years ago the Imperial Parliament voted £112,000,000 for its amelioration, and granted a further extension of municipal government to Ireland. If, however, the Irish are given a Parliament of their own, the disintegration of the Empire will at once commence. I am thoroughly opposed to any such step being taken, and I think that the people of Australia as a whole are of the same mind. But, as the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has suggested that because I am an Orangeman I am not a free agent in this matter, I would again remind him that I am as free as he is free from the dictation of Archbishop Carr and the local Hibernian Society, and have as much right to express my opinions on the subject. The honorable member for Coolgardie is of the religion of the bulk of the Irish people; but I am sure that he will admit that the relations between us have always been of the friendliest. I tell him that if he intends to excite the Orange movement in Australia, the carrying of this motion is likely to have that effect. My remarks have been made, in my judgment, in support of the best interests of the Empire and of Australia, and I have endeavoured to combat the arguments of the honorable and learned members for Angas and Northern Melbourne. I trust that the House will not shelve the motion, but that there will be a division upon it, when, irrespective of party considerations, it will probably be defeated.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—I am very glad that the motion has been placed before this Parliament, and I wish to deal with what is the only argument worthy of consideration which has been submitted in opposition to it.

Mr. KELLY.—Why was this motion taken out of the honorable member's hands?

Mr. RONALD.—I will deal with that matter presently. Not one sound argument or good reason has been adduced against the granting of Home Rule per se. The only argument advanced by the opposition worthy of serious consideration is the "hands off" or "no interference" argument. It has been contended that the Federal Parliament has no right to interfere in a matter which is not of immediate personal concern, and it has been pointed out that the members of the party to which I belong were against interference by Australia in connexion with the troubles in the Transvaal. I, and most of those who will vote for the motion, certainly preached the doctrine of "non-interference," or laissez faire, in connexion with events in the Transvaal, because at the time war was raging there, and I thought that Australia should not be involved in a quarrel with which she was not concerned. But I hold that we may interfere in the interests of peace, so long as we approach the Imperial Government with due courtesy, and through the proper channel. We should not interfere to make war and strife. There is no parallel between the two cases. There is a reason for interference in this instance, but there was no reason for interference in the former instance. With regard to our action in respect to the proposed importation of Chinese into the Transvaal, that was justified on the ground that we in Australia had experienced the evil effects of employing Chinese, which the people of England had not. We desire to respectfully approach the Imperial Parliament, because we have had experience of Home Rule, and can therefore speak of its blessings, and advocate the application of the same principle to Ireland. The honorable member for Dalley has pointed to the many beneficent Acts that have been passed by the British Parliament in order to remedy Irish grievances, and to the fact that they have not proved effective. I make bold to say that if Ireland were granted the best laws in the world, and they were not home-made, they would be regarded as nothing more or less than coercive measures. Universal experience points to the fact that laws in order to have any efficacy, or any claim upon the loyalty of the people, must be home-made. Many good features have been introduced into the land-laws of Ireland, which have in some respects been models of justice as between landlord and tenant; but because such laws were not made by the people themselves they have been regarded as coercive. In order to make people law-abiding, they must have the right to frame their own laws; otherwise loyalty in the highest and best sense cannot be expected from them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Are not the Irish people represented in the British Parliament?

Mr. RONALD.—Yes; but the honorable member must know that they are represented by a miserable minority. Whenever any question affecting Ireland is brought forward for discussion, the English majority—as distinct from the British majority—oppose everything that is advocated by the representatives of Ireland, thereby making null and void the Irish representation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is a serious imputation on the fairness of the British Parliament.

Mr. RONALD.—It is a matter of history. National prejudices cannot be eradicated. If there were opportunities for State prejudices to have full operation in this Chamber, they would outweigh all national considerations. That is one of the reasons why Irish national sentiment has not found full expression in the British Parliament. The English prejudice is represented by the peer, the parson, and the publican—the three great controlling elements in British politics which regulate the national sentiment of Great Britain.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nonsense.

Mr. RONALD.—We know the great influence which the voting power of London has at general elections, and no greater forces than those of the peer, the parson, and the publican operate in the metropolis at such times. The honorable member for Dalley said that Orangemen were advocates of the Union in the first instance. That is perfectly true. The Orangemen, with their usual jealousy and suspicion, at the beginning of the last century gravely suspected the reigning Monarch, and, still more, the Heir-Apparent, of leanings towards Catholicism. They entered into a conspiracy to keep Queen Victoria from the Throne, and to place upon it the Duke of Cumberland. These men, who now call themselves members of the Loyal Orange Lodge, and who have had the impudence to falsify history, and to call themselves loyal, are loyal only just so far as it may suit their purpose. There was, however, no loyalty about them at the time of which I have spoken, and the statement that disloyalty lurks behind this motion for the presentation of a petition to His Majesty comes with very bad grace from the party which was begotten in disloyalty, and which utters the parrot cry of "God save the King" merely to serve its own purposes. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said he hoped that if Home Rule were granted to Ireland we should hear no more of the objectionable sectarian element which was everlastingly cropping up in local politics. The honorable member for Dalley, on the other hand, stated that he objected to a movement that would have that effect. I can quite understand that a certain type of politician would object to the disappearance of the sectarian issue, because he lives by it, and if that issue were no longer present in Australian politics his trade would be gone. We desire, however, to eradicate this element, whose existence in our politics all decent men must deplore. Some remarks have been made with regard to the depopulation of Ireland, and I shall endeavour to point out the intimate connexion between the want of political liberty and the lack of interest on the part of the Irish people in the country of their birth. I should like, however, to first draw attention to the distinction which exists between legislative union and Imperial union. I hold that the utmost devotion to the cause of Home Rule and legislative separation is quite compatible with the strongest attachment to Imperial union. It has been held by Gladstone, who was an Imperialist of the first order, that in the interests of Imperial union, legislative separation is absolutely indispensable. Efforts to keep together in a legislative union people who are not fit to be ruled and governed by the same institutions promote dissension and that feeling of dissatisfaction which some men are tempted to call disloyalty. The most effective way of bringing about Imperial separation is by insisting, in certain circumstances, upon legislative union. On the other hand, the best way to make a lasting and true Imperial union is to grant legislative separation. The experience of the world proves that.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It has been denied that legislative separation only is sought for.

Mr. RONALD.—I contend that the best way in which the unity of the Empire can be promoted is by granting the fullest political liberty to all subjects of the King. We can furnish an example of this in Australia. It is notorious that at one time the British Parliament desired us to separate from the Crown. They granted the fullest liberty of action in regard to the control of our army and navy, and legislation generally, and the result was that we have clung all the more closely to the Imperial power. It is notorious that if an attempt be made to hold a people, they are repelled; whereas if they are granted absolute liberty, they cling the more closely. When once legislative liberty is granted to any people they cling the closer to the central power. That is exactly what took place in Imperial Rome, which was, perhaps, one of the closest and most compact unions that the world has ever seen. It used to be a maxim amongst the Romans that they gave perfect autonomy in local and national affairs to the peoples whom they conquered. In this connexion I would commend to the notice of honorable members Cicero's letters to Atticus, as to how the Romans ruled their provinces. They gave to the people whom they conquered full liberty in regard to religion, marriage, and other concerns—liberty, indeed, in every shape and form. The Romans ruled their provinces by allowing the provinces to rule themselves. That is a secret which Imperial Britain has not yet discovered. The best way in which to bring about Imperial union is to grant legislative separation. Any man who chooses to seriously consider this great problem will find that the history of the world demonstrates the truth of my statement. Those who cavil at it are living in the face of all history. I repeat that the surest way to Imperial union is through legislative separation. It has been stated that the Irish people have never preferred a unanimous request that they should be granted Home Rule. But I would ask, "Have honorable members ever heard of any movement in any country upon which the people concerned were absolutely unanimous?" To my mind, the Irish Home Rule movement occupies a unique position in history, because it is the one movement which has commanded the support of an overwhelming majority of its people. The Province of Ulster has been trotted out as one which is opposed to Home Rule. Is the honorable member for Dalley aware of the fact that Ulster has always returned a majority of Home Rulers to the British Parliament? More than that, this so-called Protestant Ulster contains a majority of Roman Catholics. It is a minority—a minority which makes up in noise what it lacks in numbers—that is opposed to Home Rule. A vast majority of the people in the North of Ireland are in favour of that movement, together with an overwhelming majority in the South of Ireland. Reference is continually being made to the great battle which took place upon 1st of July, 1690. The people who endeavour to keep alive the racial and religious animosity upon which they wish to divide the Irish population, always desire to make it appear that that battle was really a victory for Protestantism over Roman Catholicism. It cannot be too often reiterated that as many Roman Catholics as Protestants fought under the banner of William of Orange, and as many Protestants as Roman Catholics fought under the banner of James II. A change of dynasty was involved, and the question of religion had nothing whatever to do with the struggle. Scottish Protestants were the most enthusiastic Jacobites, yet the most Protestant of the Protestants. It was the mongrel breed of Protestants in Ulster who mixed religion and politics. Consequently the man who represents that battle as a triumph for Protestantism over Roman Catholicism is the veriest ass. I wish, under cover of this motion, to correct many of the absurdities which have crept into this Irish racial discord, which should never have been allowed to show its ugly head in Australia. It is a state of things which we all deplore, and which this Parliament should endeavour to suppress. If the passing of the motion will do anything to correct these misunderstandings, and to remove from our political arena the everlasting sectarian question, it will serve a very good purpose indeed. The honorable member for Dalley has attempted to show that legislative separation would be sure to be followed by Imperial separation. In this connexion he instanced the position of Norway and Sweden as analogous to that of England and Ireland. I claim that there is absolutely no parallel between them. The conditions which obtain are diametrically opposite. The geographical position of Ireland, England, and Scotland is such that the idea of separation between Ireland and England is absurd. Ireland is absolutely united to Great Britain, and the idea of separation would be the most irrational that a sane man could entertain. Providence has ordained that these nations should be one, and it is only the stupidity and the malice of certain sections of the community that keep alive the boggy to which I have referred. The statement has been made that it would be dangerous to grant legislative separation to Ireland, because it would inevitably lead to the destruction of Imperial Britain. Mr. Parnell has been quoted as saying that the Irish people would never be satisfied until the last link which bound them to Britain was severed. Oh, that everlasting link! I have heard of it for the past twenty-five years. The slightest regard for the context of Mr. Parnell's speech will show that he was referring only to a legislative link. What he desired to convey was that when the last link of political subserviency as between Ireland and Britain was severed, the Irish people would have realized their ideal. That is what we all say. From the beginning to the end of his speech Mr. Parnell was speaking of a legislative union and a legislative separation, with no reference whatever to an Imperial union or an Imperial separation. No responsible leader of the Irish party from Dan O'Connell down to the present time has made any statement which can be construed into a declaration in favour of separation. We all know that we cannot accept the indiscreet utterances of a member of the rank and file as an official pronouncement of the policy of a great party. I challenge any opponent of Home Rule in this House to point to one statement by a responsible leader of the Irish party which can be interpreted as a declaration in favour of separation from Great Britain. One of the great movements of the present day is the direction of Imperial Federation. I do not care for the word "Imperial," but I like the word "Federation." I believe that in a very short time one question which we shall have to discuss will be that of the desirability or otherwise of entering into an Anglo-Celtic Federation. When that time arrives we shall find that our Home Rule proposal is a necessary preliminary to that great movement. We desire an Anglo-Celtic Federation—a union with America—which is bound to come.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member wishes to see the two peoples separate in order that they may unite?

Mr. RONALD.—Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is a most peculiar position to take up.

Mr. RONALD.—I shall show that it is a scientific attitude.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member wishes Ireland and England to go to the National Divorce Court in order to be remarried?

Mr. RONALD.—That is really the situation. Let me take an illustration from chemistry. In chemistry there are two processes—the process of analysis, and that of synthesis. The chemist always breaks up and separates his chemical constituents in order to bring them together again and secure a desired effect. And so in politics, two processes—the analytical and the synthetical—are always present. The analytical process is really the Home Rule stage, and the synthetical process is equivalent to the Federal stage. When a people speak of federating they have first of all to ascertain their legislative boundaries. That is the history, not only of the Dominion of Canada, but of the Grecian Federation, as well as of the Federation of Australia. It is indeed the history of every federation in the world. The breaking up process—the analysis—must be followed by the synthetical process. The people of Australia could not have federated until they had secured local autonomy; and we can never have a true federation of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales until each part of the United Kingdom has been granted home rule. Once we pass through the analytical stage, we reach the synthetical process, and if honorable members give the matter serious consideration they will find that every synthesis is preceded by analysis. From a legislative point of view, the analytical stage of Home Rule is sure to come. There can be no combination between the various nationalities of the British Empire until they have first secured their local Parliaments. England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, having once secured their local Parliaments, will be in a position to federate in the fullest sense of the word. But they must first of all separate, so to speak, for under one Parliament there can never be a true union. The man who says that there exists a real union between Ireland and Great Britain at the present time must indeed be a dullard. As a matter of fact, there is no union; and this talk about separating that which is not united is really the height of absurdity. There is, and always has been, a paper union between Great Britain and Ireland; but there has never been a union of hearts. The proposal now before the House is really one to tear up the paper union in order to accomplish a union of interests and of hearts which will last for all time.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is that not possible under existing conditions?

Mr. RONALD.—No.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then it will never exist.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member surely does not claim to be a prophet. I might quote parallel after parallel in support of my contention, but there is absolutely no parallel or precedent in history for the honorable member's proposition. History teaches the great lesson that we have first to separate peoples in order to bring them into conformity—

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member contends that it is necessary to disrupt a united force in order to bring it into true unity.

Mr. RONALD.—I have said that there must be a breaking-up process before a real union can be reached. The honorable member will find this fact illustrated in every department of politics. There must be an apparent separation—a breaking-up—before we can have the synthesis, the combination, the genuine union. We have, first of all, to define the various rights of the several nationalities concerned. If a parallel be necessary, let me point to the position of our own States. If there had been no States Governments in existence in Australia when Federation was first proposed, with whom would the advocates of that proposal have had to deal? They could not have dealt with the people as a people.

We can deal with a people only through their Parliament, and the Parliaments of the States were the basis of our Union. So it is in the old land. Before we can hope to see a federation of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, each of those parts of the kingdom must have its own Parliament. It will be seen that my contention, that every true political union is preceded by a breaking-up process, is correct. It is only the stupid, short-sighted man who would speak of that breaking-up process as a separation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then we are to break up and destroy the union.

Mr. RONALD.—If the breaking up of an Empire would bring about a federation of all the peoples of the world, I should be prepared, if I could, to break up twenty unions on such grounds. Even the Empire itself might have to be sacrificed in the interest of the world's peace. If we could see a reasonable prospect of a great Anglo-Celtic Federation by the dismemberment of the British Empire, dear though the Empire is to us, the sacrifice would be small compared with the gain in the interests of humanity.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then the desire of the Home Rule Party is to break up the British Empire?

Mr. RONALD.—No such suggestion has been made. I have said that in the interests of a higher union—the federation of the world—I should be prepared to break up the Empire; but I certainly should not be prepared to see it broken up for any lesser union. The honorable member will recognise that in order to secure a union between Great Britain and the United States of America it would be necessary for the British people to part with their Imperial sentiment, while the Americans would have to part with their Republican sentiment; but if, between the two, we could arrive at a common basis of union, where the best of our Imperial sentiment and the best of the Republican sentiment of the Americans would be conserved, we should secure a higher and better type of federation. We should break up the two in order to make one great nation; but neither the one nor the other would be sacrificed. I do not think there is any occasion to labour this question. We have stated, in the terms of the motion, what is our desire, but I should like to reply to the base insinuation that the words in which we express our respect for His Majesty the King are not sincere. I have no doubt that the honorable member for Dalley, who is associated with a society the members of which have drawn up many loyal addresses, perhaps with their tongues in their cheeks, imagines that we have framed this motion in the same way.

Mr. WILKS.—I do not question the sincerity of the supporters of the motion.

Mr. RONALD.—I am responsible for the terms of the motion to a greater extent than is any other honorable member. and I say, with all earnestness, that there is no one in the British Empire whom I esteem more highly for his liberal opinions, and his broad-minded sympathy with the people of various nationalities in the Empire, than King Edward VII. When the Home Rule movement was being carried on under the ægis of the great Gladstone. His Majesty—who was then Prince of Wales—gave his countenance and patronage to it. That is a well-known fact. He was anxious to do his very best for the Irish people in the interests of the Empire, and on ascending the Throne he availed himself of the very first opportunity to visit Ireland. That visit was not a mere rush across the Irish Channel and back again. It was undertaken by His Majesty with the full determination to show the people of Ireland that he was in sympathy with them, and understood their aspirations. He has never insulted the people or flouted their cherished opinions on any political or religious question; and it will always redound to his credit that he has done his best to bring about that union of hearts for which we are now striving. He has ever shown himself a true Liberal—a man of broad-minded sympathies for everything that is pure, lowly, and of good report—and was the first of the Hanoverian House to break away from the prejudices of mere sectarianism that had characterised that House for very many years. I rejoice to think that the time is coming when every honorable member of this House will have an opportunity to record his vote on this question. As the time allotted for private members' business has almost expired, I beg leave to continue my remarks on a future occasion.

Leave granted; debate adjourned.

BUDGET.

In Committee of Supply: (Consideration resumed from 30th August, vide page 1713.) on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST—

That the item, "President, £1,100," be agreed to.

Mr. WILSON (Corangamite).—Before commencing my remarks on the Budget, I wish to congratulate the Committee on the presence in the Chamber of the Attorney-General.

Mr. ISAACS.—Where is the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. WILSON.—Only two sittings have been devoted to the consideration of the important subject of finance, but last night, on the motion of adjournment, the honorable member for Bland took it upon himself to inveigh strongly against what he termed the obstructive and "stone-walling" tactics of the Opposition. In my opinion, his remarks were quite uncalled for, because honorable members may discover for themselves, if they look through our records, that the work done by the House since the present Administration came into power has been as great as has been done in any similar period since the inauguration of Federation. The Ministerial statement has been discussed, a number of Bills have been brought up to their second-reading stage, and the Public Service classification, which might have been expected to occasion a fortnight's debate, was disposed of in three days. It is one of the necessities of parliamentary government that every measure brought forward shall be thoroughly discussed, and if Ministerial supporters, for reasons of their own, choose to keep silent, the duty of the Opposition to inform the public mind on the proposals submitted becomes still more pressing, because, as a rule, the people absorb these various questions rather slowly. In contrast with the behaviour of the present Opposition during this session, I would direct attention to the conduct of certain members of the Labour Party last session, when that party was certainly guilty of wilful obstruction and out-and-out "stone-walling." The honorable member for Darling then, on one occasion, took four hours and thirty minutes to deliver a speech. He gave a résumé of socialistic movements, which was afterwards published, and largely circulated throughout Australia. The honorable member for Gwydir made a speech extending over four hours and thirty-five minutes; the honorable member for Melbourne occupied more than three, and, I believe, nearly four hours. I remember an occasion in the State Parliament when he spoke for six hours, and would be speaking now, had not certain of his fellow-members removed the books on which he was relying. The honorable member for Canobolas spoke for four hours and twenty minutes, and then excused himself for not proceeding further, on the ground that he was rather tired through having travelled down from Sydney on the previous evening.

Mr. MAUGER.—What would the honorable member call a fair thing?

Mr. WILSON.—If the honorable member were delivering one of his famous utterances at Port Melbourne, about two hours would be enough. As a rule, two and a half hours would be sufficient for Ministers on subjects of importance, though, on occasion, they might be permitted to exceed that limit. I congratulate the Treasurer on the example which he has set for future Treasurers, by following the tactics of the corner party, and adopting a minimum. He has established a minimum, below which none of his successors should be allowed to sink. One of the things which struck me in his speech was his remarks on the subject of immigration. He says that the Commonwealth should select immigrants, and bring them to Australia on terms to be arranged, and that the States should find holdings for them, and finance them through a land bank. He offered no new or striking suggestion for the development of the resources of the Commonwealth, nor did he speak as though he were enunciating the policy of the Cabinet. I should, however, like to see this and future Governments do all they can to promote immigration and the settling of the people on the land. The right honorable gentleman made a great boast of what he had done in Western Australia by giving applicants 160 acres on the Canadian plan, without cost. But I would remind him that what intending settlers require is land, and not sand.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A good many thousands are settled on the sand that the honorable member speaks of.

Mr. MALONEY.—There is some good land in Western Australia.

Mr. WILSON.—That is not the land which is being given away. The encouragement of settlement is surrounded with very many and great difficulties. It is difficult to obtain suitable immigrants, and it is equally difficult to make a satisfactory arrangement for bringing them here. The right honorable gentleman spoke of the great evil of centralization which exists in Australia, and it is the cause of another great evil to which the Governments of the States should pay attention, the limitation and prevention of families which now take place. In connexion with the opening up of the lands of Australia, the Federal Parliament has a great work to do in providing for the proper use of the waters of the Murray, so that large areas in the interior which are at present undeveloped may become fit for settlement. In this connexion, I should like to quote the following passage from the report of the Inter-State Royal Commission on the River Murray:—

The birth of the Commonwealth has brought into existence a new authority, vested with powers which within certain limits are supreme. The introduction of this new, and, to some extent, controlling factor, made it more than ever necessary that the States interested in the disposal of the waters of the Murray basin, should come to some conclusion as to their respective rights and interests in the river and in works for the utilization of its waters. Several successive years of drought, too, had made the residents in the Riverina district of New South Wales, keenly anxious for the realization of some of the projects for the irrigation of their lands, already so long under discussion. This anxiety found public expression in March of this year, when an organization, called the Murray River Main Canal League, invited the Federal Premier, the Premiers of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, and other representative men, to a Conference at Corowa. At the Conference several resolutions were passed, the principal of which are the following:—

1. That the Governments of the Commonwealth and the States concerned be urged to co-operate in preparing and carrying out a comprehensive scheme for the utilization of the waters of the River Murray, which, while improving the navigability of that river, will also provide for the imperative needs of the residents on both banks in the conservation and distribution of its waters.
2. That, owing to the urgent necessity for a scheme of water conservation for the Riverina, Northern Victoria, and South Australia, and as an instalment of a comprehensive scheme, the States of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia be asked to empower the Federal Government to provide storage reservoirs on the Upper Murray and a weir at Bungowannah, as proposed by Mr. McKinney, and indorsed by Colonel Home and Mr. McGregor, such head works to be National.
3. That, contingent upon the above resolution being adopted by the Governments concerned, this Conference recommends the public bodies interested to approach their respective Governments, and request that the distributing works, for utilizing the Upper Murray storages and Bungowannah weir, be commenced at such time as will enable them to be completed concurrently with the head works named.

Mr. Wilson.

4. That, in the opinion of this Conference, the circumstances of Australia demand that all natural waters not already appropriated under legal sanction shall be declared public water, and made subject to a suitable system of law applicable to the whole of the Continent, and that the Commonwealth and State Governments be respectfully asked to consider such legislation as will provide for its regulation and disposal, in such manner as shall secure its fullest possible use in the interests of the whole of the people.

On going into this question further, we find that in the basins of the Murray and its tributaries the Murrumbidgee, Darling, and Lachlan there are 255,754 square miles of country, mostly consisting of delta land or alluvial areas, which could be utilized for the purposes of irrigation. At page 15 of the report we find a statement referring to all the matters previously mentioned, such as the overflow of the rivers, and the quantity of water running to waste. It is stated—

All this points to the necessity for storing largely of the winter flow to provide for dry years, and also to the need of accurate and complete records. To this end, the officers intrusted with the measurements and observations should be expert surveyors and trained to the work.

Then at page 17 we find the following statement:—

So far there has been little development of irrigation in New South Wales; although, at Hay and at Wentworth, irrigation schemes were started some years ago, under the authority of Acts of Parliament. Some of the land at Hay is not considered suitable for irrigation, the site, as a whole, not being so good as that at Mildura. But perhaps the chief reason the settlement has not been quite successful is that those who first took up the land lacked experience. Regarding this, one witness said:—"I consider the soil is adapted for irrigation, and I have confidence in the scheme if we only had practical men on the area, men who understood fruit culture and the growing of crops by applying water to the land. . . . We have found that land and water in themselves are not sufficient, that there is a proper method of putting water on, and that method has to be learned by experience.

That shows the enormous quantity of water that is running to waste every year—water which would be of very considerable value if it were properly applied to the land. On page 18 it is stated—

The estimated storage capacity of the proposed reservoir at Yass is about 18,000,000,000 cubic feet. This quantity of water would irrigate 275,482 acres to a depth of 18 inches, which would be sufficient to grow two crops of sorghum, or four of lucerne.

It is further mentioned—

Two-sevenths of the waste flow of the Murrumbidgee would irrigate 2,203,856 acres of wheat, oats, or barley, to a depth of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches; which would, judging from my experience, give a return of forty bushels of wheat or sixty bushels of oats to the acre, worth, say, 2s. for the former and 1s. 4d. for the latter, or a gross return of £8,815,424 in either instance.

At page 22 we find that the irrigable area in the basins of the Murray and its tributaries amounts to no less than 50,042,400 acres. That is an enormous area, and I feel quite sure that we have too long neglected the opportunities presented to us in connexion with this vast tract of country. It should be turned to profitable account, and be made to yield enormous wealth to the Commonwealth. At page 25 reference is made to some of the lessons to be learnt from the experience of other countries in irrigation. It is stated—

In the United States of America, on the other hand, in the arid western regions especially, irrigation has brought profitable employment, provided abundance of nutritious food, comfort, and luxury for the masses; while it has also found a profitable field for the investment of capital, and for the operations of the merchant and financier. . . . Few areas on the world's surface support so dense a population as the narrow strip of land lying along the banks of the Nile. On both sides of that river, for hundreds of miles above Cairo, the fringe of fertility is hemmed in by the desert, which in many places extends down to the river itself. For many centuries it has supported a total population of nearly five persons to each acre of cultivation; a density which, if it could be extended to countries like Australia, where there are millions of acres of irrigable land, would bring about a social revolution of unimaginable magnitude.

I should like now to return to the statement that we have over 50,000,000 acres of land fit for irrigation. In Egypt the irrigable land supports five persons to the acre, and if we could make the irrigable land in the Murray basin support one person per acre we should be able to settle 50,000,000 people in the centre of Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is not quite in the centre of Australia.

Mr. WILSON.—No. The centre of Australia is an absolute desert; a land of "sin, sand, sorrow, and sore eyes," through which the right honorable gentleman desired that we should run a railway.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The honorable member's knowledge of that country is not very extensive.

Mr. WILSON. — I have derived my knowledge largely from the reports of the right honorable gentleman, who has conducted more than one surveying expedition through that country, and who was very glad to get out of it alive.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The country along the track of the proposed railway is not very bad.

Mr. WILSON.—Water is very scarce there, and the country is practically valueless unless mineral discoveries are made. On page 35 of the report previously referred to, we find the following reference to the reports of surveyors with regard to the area of irrigable land in the Murrumbidgee basin:—

Mr. Cobcroft is of opinion that the present water supply is quite inadequate for the requirements of settlement, as the principal water-courses, the Billabong Creek, is generally a chain of water-holes. Mr. Broughton, district surveyor of Hay, states that 9,100,000 acres within his district will be affected by the proposed Murray and Murrumbidgee scheme, the whole of which is suitable for grazing. The best agricultural land is situated south of the line running westerly from Coree to Morago, and comprises an area of 300,000 acres.

Then we have the report of Mr. Kenyon, who says there would be no difficulty in providing at a reasonable cost for the irrigation of 2,000,000 acres in Victoria. That is the limit of the area that he thinks could be irrigated.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Is that land useless without irrigation?

Mr. WILSON.—Yes, and if we could in any way assist to develop it, we should confer a great benefit upon the Commonwealth. One of the means by which this Parliament could assist in this great work is by, at the earliest opportunity, arranging for the construction of large storage reservoirs on the Murray, and for the locking of that river. Of course, we have not a great deal of money to spend in that direction at present, but we could commence by constructing a few locks and increase the number as time went on. We could also make a beginning with the storage of the waters that are now running to waste. At page 54, reference is made to the proposed Cumberna reservoir on the Upper Murray, as follows:—

That, as the proposed Cumberna Reservoir, on the Upper Murray, if constructed of a capacity of 25,367,000,000 cubic feet, will be capable, in conjunction with the natural discharge of the tributaries between the site of the dam and the gauging station at Albury, of so regulating the river as to insure a practically uniform discharge of 180,000 cubic feet per minute below the affluence of the Kiewa; the volumes so regulated shall belong in equal shares to New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, conditionally upon these States bearing equal shares of the cost of the reservoir.

I think I am perfectly justified in directing attention to this matter, which comes within the purview of the Federal Parliament, and to the opportunities which are presented to us for rendering valuable assistance in the work of developing our territory. It is desirable that the settlement of the land in all the States should be promoted as much as possible. In Victoria, we have large areas of land of very poor quality which, however, are being opened up by the Government through the agency of experimental farms. There must be similar areas in every other State which could be opened up by means of scientific farming, and the Federal Government could afterwards launch a grand scheme of irrigation, or of decentralization, with the idea of inducing people to leave the cities and settle on the soil. In certain parts of Victoria, notably in the Beech Forest and the Heytesbury Forest, we have large numbers of settlers who are doing the finest possible work, and who are really the backbone of the country. These men, who are opening up the land, deserve every consideration. Although we cannot assist these people in many directions, we can render them some aid by providing them with facilities for frequent deliveries of letters, newspapers, and literature, so that they may educate themselves and their children.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But we never consider the men in the back-blocks.

Mr. WILSON.—We ought to give these men constant consideration, because they are the backbone of the community. I should like to draw attention to a paragraph which appeared recently in the Herald, in regard to a letter which has been forwarded by the Victorian Agent-General, Mr. Taverne, to the Premier of this State, asking if the Government would set apart 1,000 acres of good land for twenty families who would be sent out by the Tunbridge Wells Colonizing Society. That communication shows that the Agents-General are endeavouring to obtain the best men possible to place upon Australian soil. These are the people whom we wish to establish upon farms of their own, and if the Government render the Agents-General of the States any assistance in that direction they will be performing a great and very useful work. At the present moment, there seems to be no disposition on the part of the States to relinquish this work, and until they enter into some arrangement with the Commonwealth, I think that it would be very unwise for us to appoint a High Commissioner. When that appointment is made, I trust that the person chosen for the office will be a thoroughly practical man, who can impart reliable information to the people at Home as to the conditions which obtain here. Whether rightly or wrongly, it is a fact that the operation of certain sections in the Immigration Restriction Act is doing great harm to this country in the old world. This Parliament should do all that it can to remove the prejudice which exists in the mother country against Australia. We wish to give every encouragement to people in the old country to immigrate to Australia. For my own part, I should like to see the contract labour section excised from the statute to which I refer. There can be no doubt that in some instances, through the indiscretion of officers, that Act has been administered in such a way that people arriving in Australia have experienced a very bad time. These little indiscretions have increased the feeling of irritation which existed in England against us. I agree with the objects of that legislation, so far as they relate to the prevention of the importation of bodies of men in times of industrial trouble. That contingency, however, is already sufficiently provided for. I should like to see the Government and the members of the Labour Party prepared to welcome some of the poorer classes from the old land who are at present living under most unsatisfactory conditions. During the delivery of his Budget, the Treasurer made one statement, to which I wish to direct attention. He said—

We have often heard that Queensland has lost an immense sum of money owing to the operation of the Commonwealth Tariff. But the people of Queensland have in their pockets the money which is said to have been lost. That is a strange statement to emanate from the Treasurer of a protectionist Administration.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member find fault with it?

Mr. WILSON.—I merely call attention to the fact that the right honorable gentleman made that statement, which is a queer one to come from the Treasurer of a protectionist Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I made it; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WILSON.—Another matter of considerable importance to us is that of the expenditure upon our Naval and Military Forces. The Treasurer, during the course of his speech, made reference to the Naval Agreement which has been concluded with the Imperial Admiralty; but we have had such excellent speeches upon the question from the honorable member for Wentworth and the honorable and learned member for Corinella, that I do not propose to traverse the ground which they have already covered. I may be permitted to say, however, that the contribution which we make to the Imperial Government under the naval agreement is, in my judgment, wholly inadequate. I have no sympathy with the idea entertained by some honorable members that we should establish an Australian Navy. Such a navy would be absolutely valueless if any great power were to attack us. I hope that the Government will proceed with the works outlined by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, in order that the scheme for the proper equipment of our land forces may be completed. Another important question which was touched upon by the Treasurer was that of the Braddon section of our Constitution. He said—

I do not see that much good can result to the States by extending the duration of the Braddon provision. It may restrict the spending powers of this Parliament, but I cannot imagine that we shall do anything to injure the people of the States. They are our constituents, and to injure them would be to injure ourselves. This Parliament will neither injure nor ignore the people of the States.

The right honorable gentleman seems to have completely changed the opinions which he formerly entertained in this connexion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Did I ever say anything different?

Mr. WILSON.—I believe so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is quite enough. The honorable member "believes so."

Mr. WILSON.—Does the right honorable gentleman deny that he has previously expressed himself in favour of the retention of the Braddon section? Did he not say that it was one of the best provisions contained in the Constitution? It may be that the framers of that charter of government foresaw that some day the right honorable gentleman would fill the position of Treasurer of the Commonwealth, and thought it necessary to restrict his spending powers, and to impose a check upon any tendency which he might have towards extravagance. I am glad to know that all the States are giving attention to the Braddon section, and I hope that as the result of their united action, the operation of that provision will be extended. In this connexion, I should like to draw attention to the opinion expressed upon page 827 of Quick and Garran's Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth—

The amount of Federal Expenditure.—The chief influence of the section will undoubtedly be in the direction of ensuring economy of Federal expenditure. The Federal Parliament will be subject to two opposite forces; the national impulse which will tend towards enlarging the scope of Federal operations, and, therefore, of Federal expenditure; and the restraining influence of the States, and of their representatives in the Federal Parliament, which will make for limiting Federal expenditure so as to ensure an adequate subsidy to the States. The chief merit of the Braddon clause is that it fixes the maximum ratio of Federal to provincial expenditure, and thus checks, during the early years of Federation, any attempt at an undue encroachment of the Federal power. If the vast revenues of the Commonwealth were entirely at its disposal, subject only to such political pressure as the States could bring to bear, there might be a serious temptation to Federal extravagance, and a serious risk of the diminution of the State revenues.

That is a very important statement, and one which should be laid to heart by every member of this Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was one of those who was instrumental in getting the Braddon provision inserted.

Mr. WILSON.—Yet the right honorable gentleman, at the dictation of the Labour Party, is one of the first to run away from it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have never said so.

Mr. WILSON.—I can only refer the Treasurer to his own words. If he does not believe in them, he should withdraw them. I now come to the receipts of the Commonwealth from Customs and Excise. In 1904-5 the actual revenue received from this source was £8,799,530; and the amount which it is estimated will be received during the current year is £8,683,000—a decrease as compared with the receipts for last year, which in themselves fell below the estimated revenue by £180,470. This is a very serious matter to each of the States, and it is most important, therefore, that the Braddon section should be retained. The estimated amount of the deficit, compared with the receipts for 1904-5, is £72,710. It is satisfactory to note that the income from the Post Office has increased, and promises to still further increase during the current year. But when we come to analyze the Customs revenue, we find that the returns obtained from the majority of the items in the Tariff show a serious deficiency so far as most of the States are concerned. In Victoria there has been an increase in the revenue derived from apparel and textiles, oils, paints, &c., drugs and chemicals, wood, wicker work and cane, jewellery, leather, paper and stationery, and vehicles. All the other items, however, show a falling off of revenue. The estimated sugar Customs receipts in Victoria for 1905-6, as compared with the returns for 1902-3, show a decrease of £216,491, whilst the estimated sugar Excise returns show an increase of £133,285, or a net deficiency on the two items of £83,206. This diminution of revenue must have been due to one of two causes. Either it has been brought about by a slackness in trade, or by an increase in our local manufactures. I think we may set aside the suggestion that this diminution of imports is attributable to slackness of trade, for we know that there was a very satisfactory increase in the manufactures of Victoria in 1904 as compared with the output for the previous year. I have here a statement from the Age, giving the official statistics relating to Victorian factories. It sets forth that—

The Government statist has issued summaries of the manufacturing returns of the State for the year 1904. These show that the number of factories was 4,208—an increase of fifty-seven on the previous year. The hands employed numbered 50,554 males and 25,733 females—increases of 1,120 and 1,038 respectively. The amount paid in wages was £4,704,365, an increase of £220,570. The value of machinery, plant, lands, and buildings was £13,668,185, as against £12,978,841 in 1903.

The article goes on to point out that—

Proper comparisons with years prior to 1903 cannot be made, on account of the new classification adopted by the statist in that year.

These figures show that there has been a very satisfactory increase in Victorian manufactures. When we examine the details we find that the number of hands employed in the following industries has increased:—Soap and candle making, cement making, glass bevelling, mantelpiece making, wood carving, turnery, agricultural implement making, engineering, boilermaking, iron foundries, sheet iron and tin works (including japanning), brass and copper works, smithing, &c., biscuit and confectionery making, coffee, cocoa, spice, &c. works, tobacco and cigar factories, woollen mills, hat and cap factories, boot and shoe manufactories, coach and carriage factories, and chemical, leather ware, and rubber works.

Mr. PAGE.—What is the meaning of the increase in rubber goods?

Mr. WILSON.—I am informed by the honorable member for Oxley that it is due to an increase in the output of mackintoshes. The official statistics also show that there has been a diminution in the number of hands employed in the following trades:—Glass bottle and asbestos works, wire works, and jam, pickle, sauce and vinegar works. I would draw particular attention to the decrease which has taken place in the number of hands employed in jam factories, because we have been told that the present price of sugar is hampering the industry. This has an important bearing on the question of the sugar bounty, and it doubtless accounts for the diminution in the number of hands engaged in the industry. There has also been a decrease in the number of hands employed in the following lines:—Cabinet making, including billiard table manufacturing, and brush and broom manufactories. I believe, although I am not quite sure, that the brush and broom making industry has been removed to a large extent from Victoria to Tasmania.

Mr. STORRER.—A portion of it has.

Mr. WILSON.—That will account for the falling off in the number of hands engaged in the industry in Victoria. What has been Victoria's loss has been Tasmania's gain. The Age also draws attention to another important fact to which honorable members should give consideration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why? Because it appears in the Age?

Mr. WILSON.—Not necessarily; but we should not despise information of this kind simply because it is given by that journal. It is pointed out by the Age that the most striking increase is in connexion with the implement factories, and that the wages paid in that industry in 1904, as compared with 1903, show an advance of £51,348. Another notable increase, showing that we are able to turn out goods that compare favorably with those manufactured in other parts of the world is that relating to the number of hands and wages paid in the boot and shoe trade. I come now to the important question of the sugar bounty. In the course of his Budget statement, the Treasurer informed us that the Government proposed to continue the sugar bounty, and also the excise duty on sugar, for five years.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Is the honorable member one of the ten-year men?

Mr. WILSON.—I rather doubt the wisdom of continuing the present bounty for a further term of five years. As most honorable members are aware, the attitude, which I take up in regard to the policy of a White Australia is that we should have a white-owned Australia; but I feel that it is only fair to all concerned that, having entered upon a policy of a White Australia, we should give it as fair a trial as possible. I am prepared to follow the Government to this extent: that I would continue the existing sugar bounty for two years, and at the end of that time would allow it to gradually disappear by means of a sliding scale.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member desires the bounty to begin to disappear almost at once.

Mr. WILSON.—Two years after the expiration of the period fixed by the Act. That would allow of the bounty disappearing altogether by means of a sliding scale extending over a further period of three years.

Mr. MAUGER.—Would it not be better to continue the bounty as at present for five years, and then to allow it to be gradually abolished by a sliding scale extending over three years?

Mr. WILSON.—This question has a very serious bearing on those engaged in fruit-growing in the cooler parts of Australia, as well as upon our jam manufacturers. It is proposed by the Government to expend £146,000 during the current year by way of bounty on white-grown sugar, but this does not represent anything like the actual loss which the several States will sustain. In addition to that sum, they must suffer considerable loss in the shape of a decreased revenue from the sugar duties. In this connexion I desire to draw attention to two leading articles, which, in my opinion, should be carefully perused, for they practically represent both sides of the question, and are exceedingly valuable contributions to this question. The first of these was published in the Argus of 22nd instant. It was pointed out in this article that—

So far from the growers having been strengthened in their position so as to live without it, they one and all declare that the continuance of the industry depends upon a renewal of the bonus. They cannot, they assert, produce sugar by white labour with anything less than £5 per ton protection.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They are all alike; they are not prepared to give up the bonus.

Mr. WILSON.—The Argus points out that—

The subject is a most important one from several points of view, and more particularly in respect to revenue. The consumption of sugar in Australia is, roughly speaking, 180,000 tons a year, and the position with regard to revenue may be indicated thus:—

Revenue if all sugar were imported ...	£1,280,000
Revenue as at commencement of Federation ... ..	£780,000
Revenue, 1904-5 ... ..	£680,000
Revenue if all sugar be grown by white labour ... ..	£180,000

It will thus be seen that in the first year of Federation revenue to a large amount was sacrificed in order to protect the industry on the then basis of Australian production; but since then an additional £100,000 a year has been sacrificed in order to stimulate the growing of sugar by white labour, whilst, if this process becomes ultimately successful, and all sugar required by Australia be grown by white labour, we shall only receive a revenue of £180,000. It may be thought that the consumer gets the benefit of a reduction of price by using the Australian-grown sugar, but that is not the case, for he at present pays the same price for all sugar, whether it be imported, whether it be grown by black labour in Australia, or whether it be grown by white labour in Australia, though the revenue obtains respectively £6, £3, and £1.

The statistics I have quoted show that the quantity of sugar produced by black labour in Australia is not diminishing.

Mr. PAGE.—Why does not the honorable member say, in all fairness, that the quantity produced by white labour has increased?

Mr. WILSON.—I have no desire to be unfair. The quantity of sugar grown by white labour has undoubtedly increased, but the quantity grown by black labour has also advanced, and pro rata the increase of black-grown sugar is the larger of the two. To continue my quotation—

The additional protection of £2 per ton to sugar grown by white labour has, up to the present, had no effect in reducing the quantity of sugar grown by black labour—quite the contrary. It has, however, largely stimulated the growth of sugar by white labour in parts of the Continent less suited to sugar production. Thus the production of white-grown sugar in Queensland was in 1902 12,000 tons, in 1903 24,000 tons, and in 1904 31,000 tons.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It should be 39,000 tons.

Mr. WILSON.—I thank the right honorable gentleman for his correction.

As to New South Wales, Sir George Turner, in his last Budget speech, said:—

"New South Wales has undoubtedly received a very large benefit from the sugar rebate, because before Federation they were growing nearly all their sugar by the aid of white labour; consequently the bonus has been a little godsend to them.<sup>11</sup>

Quite true. A little godsend to the extent of £114,000 in three years for doing exactly what they were doing before. Alongside the sugar farms in New South Wales and Southern Queensland are dairy farms, carried on with white labour to the great profit of their owners and the community, and receiving not one penny of either bonus or protection from the Commonwealth. Contrasted with the tenderness to sugar-growers is the treatment of the fruit-growers of Victoria and Tasmania. They are heavily burdened in order that the sugar-growers may be coddled. They have to carry on their industry, contribute largely to the revenue, and afterwards make a profit if they can. But the sugar-growers are paid large bounties to keep them in an unprofitable industry, and prevent them taking up a profitable one.

There is a great danger that this attempt to grow sugar under hot-house conditions, by paying bounties for its production, may lead to the substitution for the kanaka—who is a good man for the work, and can be, and has been, properly regulated—of Chinamen and Hindoos, who are much less desirable. A great many farms in Northern Queensland are now being worked by, or are coming into the possession of, Chinamen. A conference of sugar-growers of Northern Queensland, whose discussions I have studied, by no means minimizes this great danger.

Mr. PAGE.—Black sugar-growers or white sugar-growers?

Mr. WILSON.—I am referring to a conference of white sugar-growers.

Mr. PAGE.—I do not think that they are crying "stinking fish" about the bounty.

Mr. WILSON.—No; but many of them say that white men cannot work upon the cane fields, although others are of a contrary opinion.

Mr. PAGE.—Does not the honorable member consider that a man of his race could do any work which a black man could do?

Mr. WILSON.—Certain parts of the globe seem to have been set aside by the Creator for black men.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Queensland is not one of them.

Mr. WILSON.—From the information which I have gathered, there are parts of Queensland where it is possible for white men to act as supervisors, but where they cannot be asked to go into the cane-fields to do the trashing.

Mr. MAUGER.—Then why did not the Almighty place black men there for the purpose?

Mr. WILSON.—There are black men in abundance in Northern Queensland, in the aboriginal population.

Mr. MAUGER.—I mean black men of the race who have been employed to do this work.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member is ridiculous. In the belt between the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn the aboriginal inhabitants are all black men.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Were there not black men in Victoria originally?

Mr. WILSON.—Yes. I did not say that there were no black men outside that belt; but there were originally only black men inside it. If we look at this matter from the commercial stand-point—

Mr. PAGE.—It is from the humanitarian, not the commercial, stand-point that we are looking at it.

Mr. WILSON.—I wish to see Australia developed on commercial principles, and to see white men earning a comfortable living. A white man trashing in a cane-field in Northern Queensland would not be earning a comfortable living. I wish now to draw attention to some statements in an article which appears in to-day's Age. In that journal Mr. Swayne, of Mackay, is reported to have stated at the recent conference of sugar-growers that—

It is quite within the bounds of possibility for Australia to produce annually 1,000,000 tons of sugar, of which 800,000 tons would have to find markets abroad.

This would involve the assistance of coloured labour to the extent of 35,000, an estimate which the writer of the article regards as so exaggerated as to be unworthy of consideration. The article continues—

It may be taken for granted that the production of sugar from cane is established and has become essentially a genuine Australian industry.

I hope that that is the case, and that Australia will shortly meet, and continue to meet, her own sugar requirements. The industry, however, should be carried out under the conditions which will most benefit Australia, and these are the best economic conditions. It is pointed out that the cutting of the cane involves the greatest amount of trouble, and that north of the Burdekin the supply of labour is wholly insufficient. It is suggested that gangs of white labourers might travel from farm to farm, as shearers travel from station to station, going from north to south as the season advances. A statement of considerable importance is this—

4,491,407 gallons of molasses was obtained. The distribution of the latter is interesting, and as it indicates that cane-growing has an indirect influence in various directions, it may be well to give some particulars. According to the official reports 66,300 gallons of molasses went in 1904 to the distilleries; 491,500 gallons was sold, chiefly for the production of treacle and golden syrup; 600,415 gallons was used for stock feeding purposes; 201,600 gallons was burnt as fuel in the furnaces; 29,200 gallons was taken for manuring purposes; 797,653 gallons was held in store, and 2,304,738 gallons was allowed to run to waste.

This statement is well worthy of the consideration of the representatives of country districts. It seems to me that it should be possible, by mixing this waste molasses with foodstuff, to make a cake for the feeding of animals in times of drought, because, as is well known, molasses mixed with fodder makes a very good food for stock when pasture is not available. The Age says very wisely that the fact that so much molasses is going to waste suggests want of enterprise. Most great fortunes in recent years have been made by the utilization of waste products, and here we have a waste product which would not only provide a good food for the poorer classes, but which might, if mixed with other foodstuffs, make a valuable fodder. The suggestion that the expansion of the sugar industry is likely to be largely confined to what may be called the temperate districts claims special attention. If that occurs, it will be a sad thing for Australia, because the temperate districts have always been devoted to other purposes. The tropical areas of Northern Queensland are said to comprise the richest land in that State.

MR. CONROY.—The temperature there does not fall below 35 deg. or 36 deg., and, therefore, the settlers are not troubled with frost.

MR. WILSON.—The settlers there have the advantage, both in fertility of soil and in climate. I desire to direct the attention of honorable members to another matter which is referred to in the same article. It is one which seriously affects the industries in which sugar is used. It is stated—

What makes sugar dear in Australia is the big profits obtained by the refinery. As a fact the whole of the Australian and New Zealand markets are under the control of a single company. The organization is so strongly entrenched that it not only fixes the price at which it will sell sugar, but also deals with the grower in the same manner, by deciding the price of the cane, juice, or raw sugar. This is an intolerable state of affairs, and demands the attention of the Federal Parliament. The huge profits disclosed in the published balance-sheets of the Colonial Sugar Company show where the money goes. If anything is to be done to place the Australian sugar-growing industry on a sounder footing, the first step must be to break down this monopolistic organization.

We have others besides the sugar-growers and the Colonial Sugar Company to consider in connexion with this matter, namely, the consumers, for whom the position becomes very serious, when a monopolistic company is able to keep up the price of sugar in the way that it is now being maintained. The Age recognises that some means should be found for the establishment of refineries, which would compete with the Colonial Sugar Company, and I suggest that a portion of the money, which is now allotted to the payment of bonuses, should be devoted to assisting in the establishment of co-operative refineries. In the early days of the dairying industry in Victoria, the Government assisted very materially towards its development, by means of a bonus, and now the production of butter is one of the greatest industries in that State—in fact, it has been the saviour of Victoria. I do not see why we should not, with the assistance of a bonus, succeed in establishing co-operative refineries, because the principle of co-operation amongst farmers has been successfully adopted in the past, and there is room for its further application to other branches of the agricultural industry. I would earnestly commend the articles, from which I have quoted, to the consideration of honorable members who are interested in the sugar industry. A matter of considerable importance is referred to at page 40 of the Budget papers. I find that the defences of Thursday Island in 1904-5 involved an expenditure of £12,049, which was borne by Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, and Western Australia; neither Tasmania nor South Australia contributing anything. Then, again, the expenditure upon the defences at King George's Sound amounted in 1904-5 to £4,842, and it is estimated that in 1905-6, the outlay will be £5,104. This expenditure is contributed to by New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia, Tasmania again contributing nothing.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—Western Australia contributes one-fourth of the amount payable in regard to the defences at King George's Sound. Digitized by Google

Mr. WILSON.—Yes; and that State also contributes towards the cost of maintaining the defences at Thursday Island. At page 45 of the Budget papers, various items of new expenditure are dealt with. I find that in the Department of External Affairs and the Attorney-General's Department, increases have taken place; that in the Home Affairs Department the expenditure has risen from £34,804 to £42,136; that there was an increase in the Department of Trade and Customs, a decrease in the Defence Department, an increase in the Postmaster-General's Department, and a slight increase in one or two other smaller items. I think we should watch this new expenditure very closely, in order that we may prevent, so far as possible, any further serious diminution of the amount returnable to the States.

Mr. MCCAY.—The Treasurer says that he is economical, and that everything is all right.

Mr. WILSON.—I hope that the right honorable gentleman will, at the end of his term of office, which I hope is not far distant, be able to show us that the statements about his extravagant ideas are without foundation. At page 55 of the Budget papers, we find figures which show that there has been a very serious diminution in the amount returnable to the States, and that, according to the Estimates for the current year, there will be a further falling-off, as compared with last year, of £357,920. At page 82 of the Budget papers, a table is printed, showing the amounts of deposits and of coin and bullion held by the banks of issue in Australia. In 1904 the deposits amounted to £90,000,000, and in 1905 to £96,000,000. That is a very satisfactory increase, and I think that we may congratulate ourselves on the fact that trade continues to show an improvement. The coin and bullion held amounted to £21,490,355. That is also very satisfactory. The honorable member for Kooyong reminds me that it is not a good sign when money is being locked up in the banks. It is satisfactory to have the money to lock up, although perhaps it would be preferable to see it invested in profitable enterprise.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The amount of coin and bullion is not excessive.

Mr. WILSON.—No; I think it is very satisfactory. Table C, on page 83, shows that the deposits in the savings banks are on the increase, and that the number of depositors is also larger than formerly.

In 1904 there were 1,100,422 depositors, and that indicates that our workmen are continuing to save their money, and that the number of those who are able to put by some portion of their earnings is increasing.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Are the legs of the table solid?

Mr. WILSON.—I think, when we find that the deposits amount to £34,658,430, we may consider that the legs of the table are very solid indeed.

Mr. MAUGER.—There is nothing to equal it in the world.

Mr. WILSON.—It is very satisfactory indeed, and we may congratulate ourselves upon the fact. From page 84 of the Budget papers I learn the acreage which was under cultivation in Australia between the years 1900-1 and 1904-5. This information is contained in table G, which shows that last year the total area under cultivation in the Commonwealth was 11,923,667 acres. I have already shown that along the Murray, Murrumbidgee and Darling Rivers, in the centre of Australia, there is another 50,000,000 acres, which is suitable for intense culture, and that in Australia we have room for a population of more than 60,000,000. Table J sets out the quantity and value of the butter exported from Australia between 1899 and 1904. This is a matter in which Victoria is especially interested. From the official figures, I find that, whereas in 1903, 32,124,709 lbs. of butter were exported, in the following year the quantity had increased to 64,807,962 lbs. of a total value of £2,461,450, which is the highest upon record. In this connexion I maintain that many of the areas which are at present being utilized in New South Wales for the cultivation of sugar-cane could be profitably used by white labour to increase the output of butter.

Mr. LIDDELL. — But sugar-cane pays better than does butter.

Mr. WILSON. — Whilst the sugar-planters are receiving a bonus it does. But in the absence of any exotic conditions, the butter industry would amply repay those who cared to embark upon it. Upon page 89 of the Budget papers appears a table relating to preferential trade.

Mr. MCCAY.—This is the speech which the Treasurer should have delivered.

Mr. WILSON.—The Treasurer laid certain papers connected with the Budget upon the table of the House, and I am endeavouring for the information of honorable members and the country generally to show that certain matters in those papers are of extreme importance to the people from a financial stand-point. Because the Treasurer failed in this respect—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not fail. If the honorable member will look at page 1220 of Hansard he will find all that information.

Mr. WILSON.—I desire to show the comparative trade which the Commonwealth did with the United Kingdom, with British Possessions, and with foreign countries between 1901 and 1904. From the official statistics I find that in 1903 the proportion of the total trade which we did was with the United Kingdom 46·31, with British possessions 23·80, and with foreign countries 28·89. During 1904 the proportion of our total trade with foreign countries had decreased to 26·15. Coming to the question of preferential trade, which, I hope, will be developed during the next few years by a Colonial Conference upon the matter—

Mr. MAUGER. — Why wait for a few years?

Mr. WILSON.—Australia is perfectly willing to enter into a Conference at the present moment.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why does not Australia grant a preference to the goods of the mother country immediately, just as Canada has done?

Mr. WILSON.—I should be perfectly prepared to do that. It is extremely important that we should do as much trade as possible with the Empire. At the same time we should approach the consideration of this question in a business-like way.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Pull down the Tariff wall.

Mr. WILSON.—There is no need to pull down any Tariff wall, because it is merely a question of entering into reciprocal arrangements with the old country. I wish now to direct the attention of honorable members to the fact—as will be seen by reference to page 90 of the Budget papers—that whereas in 1903 the imports into Australia from the United States were £6,368,552, in the following year they had diminished to £4,591,945. In 1903 the exports from Australia to the United States were valued at £2,625,399, but the next year they had decreased to £2,228,843. I should have thought that the quantity of wool exported from the Commonwealth would have increased the value of our exports to that country rather than have diminished it, but the figures are against my supposition. Our imports from Japan in 1903 were valued at £330,121, and in 1904 they had increased to £421,153. In 1903 we exported to Japan £115,992 worth of goods, and in the following year the amount had increased to £581,214. No doubt that increase was largely due to the war which has just terminated. These figures show that if we will only treat the ally of the Empire in a proper manner, we can do a very large reciprocal trade with her. The rise of Japan amongst the great powers of the world has been a phenomenal one, and it behoves us to do all that we can to foster trade with that country. According to table V. of the Budget papers, Australia has only 1,017,652 pigs, whereas Canada possesses 2,353,838. It will thus be seen that we are weak in pigs. This is a matter of very considerable importance, because I hold that there is a great future for the Australian farmer in pig raising and pork packing. I should like honorable members to recollect the letter of an American merchant to his son, in which he stated that one of the best ways in which a farmer could carry his grain to market was to let it walk there. I wish to impress on our farmers the extreme value of that wonderful rent-paying quadruped, the pig. I have gone carefully through the Budget papers, and have endeavoured to direct attention to various matters which I regard as important. Unfortunately we have a declining revenue and an increasing expenditure. Whilst we should develop the resources of Australia in every possible way, we should always have a due regard to economy, and though I do not suggest that we should be niggardly in our grants, I would urge upon the Treasurer the necessity of keeping a strict eye on the finances, if only for the sake of the States in the Union, which have comparatively small populations.

Mr. McWILLIAMS (Franklin).—I do not propose to detain the Committee very long. There are, however, one or two matters connected with the Budget which so vitally affect Tasmania—one of them particularly affecting my own electorate—that I should be failing in my duty if I did not deal with them now. The question to which I wish chiefly to direct attention has reference to the sugar bounty. So far as Tasmania is concerned, that is unquestionably the most important item with which the Treasurer dealt in his Budget statement. I have no prejudice against the State of Queensland, or the sugar industry as such, but the position which the people of Tasmania take up is that, whilst the Commonwealth Parliament is seeking to foster one industry, it must be careful that in doing so it does not crush out of existence another of far greater importance to that State, and one which, I venture to say, is equal in importance to the Commonwealth with the sugar industry.

Mr. PAGE.—Does the honorable member know that Queensland has taken £23,000 worth of jam from Tasmania during the last twelve months?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Let me remind the honorable member of the effect which the sugar bounty and the duties on sugar have had on the jam manufactures of Queensland. To-day there is not one jam manufactory in Queensland, whereas prior to Federation there were over a dozen. They have been crushed out of existence by the sugar tariff.

Mr. PAGE.—How does the honorable member justify that statement?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It is supported by the evidence given before the Tariff Commission at Hobart a few days ago. Honorable members will find that, whereas before the imposition of the Commonwealth Tariff Queensland was annually manufacturing 50,000 cases of jam from pulp sent chiefly from Tasmania—a small quantity also being imported from Victoria—she has now no jam manufactories. The reason for this change is that, whereas the jam manufacturers of Queensland, prior to Federation, could obtain sugar at £9 per ton, they would now be required to pay nearly £20 per ton for it.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Has not the price of sugar increased all over the world?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That is so. But the market value of sugar in Australia to-day is the world's market value, plus a duty of £6 per ton.

Mr. GROOM.—But Tasmania is now sending more jam to Queensland than she did prior to Federation?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That is correct.

Mr. GROOM.—And the competition of Tasmanian manufacturers has interfered with the Queensland manufactures to the benefit of the State of which the honorable member is a representative.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The production of small fruits in Victoria and Tasmania is being seriously handicapped by the duty of £6 per ton which we have imposed on sugar.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member should speak of something of which he knows.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I say distinctly that the Minister of Trade and Customs has not learnt the alphabet of the practical working of the sugar duties. I would refer him to the evidence given before the Tariff Commission at Hobart by Mr. H. Jones, whose firm is the largest manufacturer of jams in Australia. That gentleman distinctly told the Commission that the present duty on sugar was crushing many of the small fruit-growers of Tasmania out of existence. I know that this statement is correct, and I wish that some honorable members who favour the present sugar tariff could be induced to take a trip through the small fruit growing districts of the Huon and the Derwent Valleys. Speaking in all seriousness, I say that it is enough to make one's heart bleed when one visits these districts and sees cattle turned into the raspberry plantations, black and red currant trees being uprooted, and plum trees being cut down, simply because the price of sugar has so seriously affected the growers.

Mr. GROOM.—Does the honorable member say that since Federation there has been a decrease in the manufacture of jam in Tasmania?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I assert that there has been no increase. Before Ministers come down to the House with proposals in regard to the sugar industry, they should endeavour to make themselves familiar with all its ramifications. It is said that Tasmania had a duty of £6 per ton on sugar prior to Federation.

Mr. HUME COOK.—How can the honorable member say that the present price of sugar has had the effect, so to speak, of chopping down plum trees in Queensland and planting others in Tasmania?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have not said anything of the kind. I venture to assert that in Victoria and Tasmania plum-growing has practically ceased to be remunerative.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Prior to Federation Tasmania had a duty of £6 per ton on sugar.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Quite so; but the point which the Minister has utterly failed to grasp is, that Tasmania allowed a rebate of the full amount of the duty in respect of every ounce of sugar used in jam exported from that State.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A rebate is now allowed in respect of jam exported to parts beyond the Commonwealth.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—That is not the point. Prior to Federation, Tasmania was manufacturing jam practically for the mainland, and for parts beyond the Commonwealth. The local consumption of jam would not be sufficient to keep one factory going, because the great majority of the people in the fruit-growing districts make their own preserves. Prior to Federation, the whole of the sugar used in the jam which Tasmania exported—and which represented practically the whole of her output—was absolutely duty free. A rebate was allowed on every ounce of sugar used in jam sent from Tasmania to the mainland as well as to parts beyond.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is making a mistake.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—I certainly am not. If the conditions prevailing prior to Federation now applied to the jam manufacturers, their position would be markedly different. I wish honorable members for Queensland to remember that, under the Commonwealth system of granting rebates, the manufacturers of jam in Tasmania are being deterred from using Queensland sugar. If Queensland sugar be used in jam manufactured for export beyond the Commonwealth a rebate of five-sixths of the excise duty of £3 per ton is allowed, whereas, if our manufacturers use the imported sugar, they secure a rebate of five-sixths of the duty of £6 per ton.

Mr. MAUGER.—Then why is the honorable member complaining?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Because I should prefer to see the jam manufacturers of Victoria and Tasmania using Queensland sugar.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member has changed his premises.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—I do not think that I have. I wish honorable members to understand that, under existing conditions, the largest jam manufacturer in Tasmania last year used 1,400 tons of sugar, 1,300 tons of which were imported from parts beyond the Commonwealth, the reason for this preference being that a rebate of five-sixths of the duty of £6 per ton on foreign sugar so used is allowed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I would not allow it.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The right honorable gentleman would give us nothing. We have never had to thank him for anything. The practice of using foreign-grown sugar is forced upon our jam manufacturers by the stupidity of Ministers. They have to use it in preference to Australian-grown sugar, in order to carry on successfully. Would the honorable member for Melbourne Ports seriously suggest that the jam manufacturers should use Queensland sugar, on which they would receive a rebate of only £1 per ton, seeing that they would be entitled to a rebate of £2 per ton on the imported sugar?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Was there not a duty on jam coming into Victoria prior to Federation?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then Tasmania has been benefited by the removal of the duty as the result of Federation.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Victoria is practically producing all the jam that is required for local consumption. Every statement I make, when speaking on behalf of the small fruit-growers of Tasmania, is distinctly applicable to the small fruit-growers of Victoria.

Mr. GROOM.—Did not the Queensland duty have the effect of keeping Tasmanian jam out of that State, and of allowing only the pulp to come in?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—That is so.

Mr. GROOM.—And now, instead of the pulp being sent to Queensland, the manufactured article is shipped from Tasmania to that State?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Exactly. But honorable members forget that the high price of sugar compels the jam manufacturer to give as little as possible for his fruit. He is forced to do this in order to be able to place his product on the market at a certain price. The moment his price goes beyond that level his output is thrown open to competition from other sources, such as treacle, &c.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Will the honorable member tell me why the fruit-growers of Queensland are altogether opposed to the rebate?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The fruit grown in Queensland is entirely different from the small fruits of Victoria and Tasmania. In the one case we have a tropical, and in the other a temperate product. Sugar is wholly the raw material of the jam manufacture—of Tasmania and Victoria, and I wish to briefly state what I think ought to be done in favour of an industry which has just as much right to the consideration of this Parliament as has any other industry in the Commonwealth. I have the authority to state, on behalf of the jam manufacturers of Tasmania, that the duty on jam may be removed to-morrow, so far as they are concerned, for it is not worth a snap of the fingers if they are given sugar free of duty.

Mr. MAUGER.—If it were abolished they would soon cry out.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am speaking on behalf of the jam manufacturers of Tasmania.

Mr. GROOM.—Did they give evidence before the Tariff Commission to support your assertion?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—They did. There is now a duty of practically £14 a ton on jam; but, as Tasmania exports most of her product, that duty has never been of the slightest use to her. When Mr. H. Jones was being examined by the Commission the following question was put to him by Senator McGregor:—

If the £14 per ton duty were knocked off jam is there any risk of jam being imported from the old country?

Mr. Jones replied, "Not the slightest." He went on to say—

The duty is not of the slightest use to us. Give us our raw material free, and you can take the entire duty off jams.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—He sang a very different song not very long ago.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—He did not do anything of the kind. I have been acquainted with Mr. Jones for some time, and have no hesitation in stating that the Minister of Trade and Customs is distinctly wrong if he wishes to suggest that this gentleman was not always prepared to advocate the removal of the duty on jams, provided that the sugar imposts were removed. When Mr. Jones was before the Tariff Commission the following question was put to him by Mr. Clarke:—

If you had duty-free sugar, would you also be prepared to see the duties taken off fresh fruits, fruits in pulp, all kinds of preserves and fruits; also jams?

That was a pretty wide question. It covers practically everything. The answer is distinctly, "yes."

Mr. Clarke.—You would be quite prepared to stand or fall on your own?—Yes.

I want honorable members to remember the effect of this sugar duty. The honorable and learned member for Corinella last night stated that the percentage increase of white-grown sugar was three times as large as that of black-grown sugar; but in this instance no more ridiculous comparison could be made than that of the percentage. It is just as if the honorable and learned member had compared the increase of two towns by saying that one had doubled its population, and the other had increased it by one-sixth, when the true facts were that one town of 1,000 inhabitants had gained another 1,000, and that another town of 5,000 inhabitants had also gained 1,000. The facts in connexion with the sugar industry are that the production of white grown sugar has increased from 12,000 to 52,000 tons, and that of black-grown sugar from 65,000 to 105,000 tons.

Mr. GROOM.—But the honorable member must remember the start which the black-grown sugar had.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That does not affect the present result.

Mr. GROOM.—It was alleged that white men could not work in the cane-fields, and the effect of the bounty has been to show that they can.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am not one of those who said that white men could not work in the cane-fields of Queensland, though it may surprise some honorable members to learn that the chief opposition to me at the last elections was because I was not disposed to vote to rescind the White Australia provisions of our legislation.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member was following the Prime Minister then.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think he knows whom he has been following.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I should be very hard pressed if I followed the Minister of Trade and Customs. I have never taken part in "stone-walling" proceedings in this Chamber, nor have I spoken except on subjects in which I take a serious interest. I claim my right, however, when any matter of public importance, or vitally affecting the interests of those who sent me here, comes up for discussion, to speak on it; and the Minister will gain nothing, and will not draw me off the track, by endeavouring to introduce personalities. The Queensland sugar industry has never stood on its own basis, because it has always had the support of the Government. The Queensland Parliament has legislated in regard to it for the last thirty-five years; and I hold in my hand a return prepared during the recess, to the order of the House on my motion, just before the prorogation, as to the conditions on which sugar mills were erected in Queensland by the Government of the State, and the extent to which the planters of Queensland have carried out the obligations into which they had entered in regard to those mills.

Mr. GROOM.—The honorable member should read the report of the inquiry made by a Queensland officer into the subject.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I moved, on the 16th November last—

That a return be laid upon the table of the House showing—

1. The number of sugar mills erected in Queensland, for the cost of construction of which the Government of that State is directly or indirectly responsible.

2. The conditions imposed by the Government on those on whose behalf the said mills were erected.

3. The number of such mills which have not fulfilled their monetary obligations to the State.

4. The amount of arrears in interest and other liabilities (if any) owing in connexion with the mills, and total responsibilities therein of the State of Queensland.

The reply I received was that in respect to eight mills, the total responsibilities of the Government were £415,000, and the total liabilities of the planters to the Government, £583,788.

Mr. WILKINSON.—They are pulling up now.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—This information was obtained from the Government of Queensland only a short time ago. With what was done by the State of Queensland for the encouragement of the sugar industry I have no concern. It is now proposed to extend the operation of the bounty for another five years, at the end of which time the planters will again come to us for assistance. That is the history of all bonuses. Of course, it is not fair to suddenly deprive an industry of a bonus; and I would be prepared to agree to a sliding scale reduction, which would eventually extinguish the bonus, as was suggested by me last session, and has been suggested by the honorable member for South Sydney and the honorable and learned member for Corinella during the present session. Let the bonus diminish as the duties on the special Tariff of Western Australia diminish.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Convention provided for the reduction of the Western Australian duties.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Yes, and I regret that Tasmania had not a representative there who would have shown the same forethought in regard to her finances as the right honorable gentleman showed in regard to the finances of Western Australia. If she had, it would have helped her enormously through the first years of Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would have suited Tasmania to have had a similar Tariff.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have always congratulated Western Australia on the possession of her special Tariff. If Parliament would allow to the manufacturers of jam a full rebate on the sugar used as their raw material—

Mr. GROOM.—Does the honorable member mean a refund of £2 of the Excise?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I would give manufacturers whose raw material is sugar the same right to a rebate as is given to other manufacturers.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is a selfish proposal.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Is it selfishness for the manufacturers of Victoria to want protection?

Mr. MAUGER.—Certainly.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am surprised to hear the honorable member for Melbourne Ports describe as selfish what is a fundamental principle of protection.

Mr. MAUGER.—The fundamental principle of protection is to protect every manufacturing industry that can be established in Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Does any protectionist desire to ruin one industry in order to bolster up another?

Mr. KENNEDY.—How would the honorable member meet the difficulty to which he is drawing attention if we were producing all the sugar used in Australia? Would not his proposal be equivalent to the giving of a bounty on the export of jam?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Unless we allow a monopoly to control the business, the market price of the world will rule in Australia in respect to sugar when we produce all that we can consume, supposing that the Queensland sugar-grower is placed in the same position as the wheat-grower or fruit-grower of other States. The figures produced at a conference of sugar-cane growers in Queensland prove conclusively that although sugar has jumped up in price to from £23 to £24 per ton, the cane producer is receiving a very small proportion of the increase. He has not received nearly the same increase that the Sugar Company has appropriated to itself.

Mr. KENNEDY.—How would the honorable member deal with the position I have stated? Assuming that Australia produced sugar sufficient to meet all requirements, would the honorable member give to the jam manufacturers a rebate equivalent of the present duty?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—So long as the duty is retained at £6 per ton, and the price of imported sugar is increased by that amount, the jam manufacturer has a perfect right to a rebate equivalent to the duty.

Mr. PAGE.—The jam manufacturer already receives that rebate on the jam he exports.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, he does not.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—My point is that under present conditions the jam manufacturer is discouraged from using Queensland sugar. There is a duty of £6 per ton upon imported sugar, and an Excise duty of £3 per ton on sugar grown in the Commonwealth. If the jam manufacturers use Queensland sugar, and export, as do the manufacturers of Tasmania, fully one-half of their output, they receive a rebate to the extent only of five-sixths of the amount of the excise duty of £3. If, on the other hand, the manufacturers use Fiji or Mauritius sugar, which is subject to a duty of £6 per ton, they receive a rebate amounting to five-sixths of that duty. Therefore, they receive twice as much rebate upon foreign-grown as upon Queensland sugar. The result is that Messrs. Jones and Company, who are the largest jam producers in Tasmania, use almost entirely foreign sugar—thirteen-fourteenths of the sugar they use is imported from parts beyond the Commonwealth.

Mr. PAGE.—I shall not eat any more of their jam.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable member must not blame the manufacturer, but the stupid arrangement which compels him for his own protection to do as I have described. I desire that Queensland sugar shall be used, as far as possible, to meet every requirement of the Commonwealth. No one will be more pleased than I will, when I find that the production of Queensland sugar has increased to such an extent that it will meet all our requirements. Under the present stupid conditions, however, we give the jam manufacturer a bonus equivalent to £1 out of every £2 if he will use imported sugar. In the name of all that is reasonable, is that to the interest of the sugar-growers of Queensland?

Mr. KENNEDY.—The trouble is that we have collected a duty upon imported sugar, and thereby obtained money with which to pay the rebate; but if we do not collect that duty we shall have to find the money for the rebate from some other source.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Under present conditions we are giving 100 per cent. inducement to the jam manufacturer to use imported sugar in preference to the Queensland product.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I admit that.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I would ask honorable members if that is the way to encourage local industry?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is bad protection.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I say that it is bad business, and opposed to the dictates of common sense.

Mr. MAUGER.—Imported sugar is used only in jam intended for export.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Half the jam produced in Tasmania is manufactured for export to parts beyond Australia. We send our jams to South Africa, to Japan, and the East generally. It may surprise honorable members to know that the manufacturers of Tasmania have not waited for the Commonwealth to appoint commercial agents, but have made their own arrangements in that regard all through the East. As honorable members may see from the evidence given by Mr. Jones before the Tariff Commission at Hobart, half his total output is sent to parts outside Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—What about the sugar used in the other half?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It would not be possible for him to make any special distinction between the jam manufactured for the home and for the export trade, and as it is necessary for him to use imported sugar in order to secure the larger amount of rebate in respect to the jams exported, he makes one deal of it, and buys the whole of his sugar in one lump. In dealing with this matter, I would ask the Government to consider whether it would not be possible, alike in the interests of the jam manufacturers and the sugar-planters, to devise some means by which they can get rid of the present hampering influences. Present conditions are not fair to the Queensland planter, because one of the chief sugar users in the Commonwealth is compelled for his own protection to use imported sugar, whereas he would naturally prefer to buy what he requires here if the conditions were equal. I know that the Government desire to help the Queensland sugar industry, and I suggest that they should, in pursuance of that object, do their best to remove the inducement which is at present held out to manufacturers to go beyond Queensland for their raw material.

Mr. MAUGER.—How many manufacturers do that?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I could not say, but I should think that any manufacturer who exported jam beyond the Commonwealth would use imported sugar if only in order to secure the higher rebate.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What remedy would the honorable member suggest?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I contend that the manufacturer should receive a rebate equal to the full amount of duty for every ounce of sugar he uses for manufacturing purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is practically what is done now, the only distinction made being between the amount of the Excise and the import duty.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That is precisely what is not being done now. The rebate is allowed in respect to all the exported jam, but none is granted in respect to the jam consumed in Australia.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why should a rebate be granted if no duty is charged?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The jam manufacturer has to pay an equivalent to the duty, owing to the extent to which the sugar is increased in price by the operation of the duty. The ordinary price of sugar f.o.b. at Melbourne, Hobart, or Sydney is from £12 to £13 per ton.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Last year the price went up to £20 per ton.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I know that the present conditions are unusual, but I have figures here to show that in 1899 Queensland sugar was quoted at £13 per ton; in the following year at £13 15s. per ton; in the succeeding year at £13 5s. per ton, and in the next year at £15 per ton. In 1902-3 Queensland sugar was quoted at £15 12s. 6d., and foreign sugar at from £11 17s. 6d. to £12 12s. 6d. In 1903-4 the price of Queensland sugar was £15 12s. 6d., and of foreign sugar £12 12s. 6d. These prices are exclusive of duty and excise.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Whence does the honorable member obtain those figures?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—They were quoted by Mr. Jones, of Jones and Co., of Hobart, when giving evidence before the Tariff Commission.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The figures which I have in my office are very different.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—In 1904-5 Queensland sugar was sold at £15 7s. 6d., and foreign sugar at £12 7s. 6d., and the prices for 1905-6 are quoted as Queensland sugar £15, and foreign sugar £12 17s. 6d. per ton. The last prices presumably are those at which Mr. Jones has contracted for the supply of sugar for the current year. These figures show that I was well within the mark when I said that the price of foreign sugar f.o.b. at Melbourne, Hobart, or Sydney was between £12 and £13 per ton in ordinary years. I know that shortages will sometimes occur, and that the price will go up, as happened recently when sugar was quoted at £24 per ton. No matter, however, what may be the price of foreign sugar f.o.b. at our principal ports, the quotation for Queensland sugar will, owing to the monopoly of the Sugar Company, always represent the price of the foreign sugar, plus the full amount of the duty.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member's figures do not bear out his statement, because the difference between the prices for 1905-6 is only £2 17s. 6d. per ton.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—To that must be added the excise of £3 per ton. I do not wish to labour the matter; but I ask honorable members, whilst they are considering the assistance they are prepared to give to the sugar industry, to remember that there are, scattered throughout Victoria and Tasmania, hundreds of the very class of men whom we want to settle in Australia. These men have gone into the forest, without any capital beyond their own energy and industry, and have established little homes for themselves, and have planted gardens with raspberries, currants, and other small fruits, and we are now placing a heavy burden upon them by reason of the provision we have made for the assistance of the sugar industry. I would also point out that the sugar planter is receiving a very small proportion of the increase which has been brought about in the price of sugar. This is owing to the huge monopoly which now controls the whole trade.

Mr. MAUGER.—Does not the honorable member think that it would be a good thing to nationalize the sugar industry?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—If matters are allowed to proceed as at present, I may be induced to assist in nationalizing a good many things. I do not shy at the suggestion of the honorable member so much as might be thought, but I want honorable members to recollect that by offering heavy bonuses and imposing high duties they are encouraging monopolies.

Mr. MAUGER.—The sugar monopoly is not a new one in Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am aware of that fact. Personally, I am of opinion that there should be no Excise duty chargeable upon Queensland sugar. I have always held the view that it is no fairer to levy an Excise duty upon Queensland sugar than it is to make a similar charge upon Tasmanian apples, Victorian wheat, or New South Wales butter. All these commodities are the natural products of the different States. So long as protection is the accepted policy of this House, I am prepared to give to the Queensland sugar-grower a measure of protection proportionate to that which we extend to every other producer in Australia. But I do not wish to perpetuate a system under which assistance is rendered to an industry in one State in such a way as to crush out an equally important industry in another State.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Under existing conditions, does not the exporter beyond the Commonwealth obtain a rebate of five-sixths of the Customs and Excise duties which are collected?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Anything in excess of that would practically be in the nature of a bonus?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The fruit-growers of Tasmania do not desire a bonus. They pay the full amount of duty upon the total consumption of their manufactured article within the Commonwealth.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Do they want a rebate upon that, too?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No, but they do not wish to pay a duty upon their raw material.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They enjoy a protection of 1½d. per lb. upon jam.

Mr. TUDOR.—As half of that jam consists of sugar, they pay in reality only about three-eighths of a penny per lb. in duty.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I do not quite follow the honorable member.

Mr. MAUGER.—What is the amount of duty that is levied upon a tin of jam?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It works out at about a halfpenny. I want honorable members to recollect that the fruit-growing industry in Tasmania is not a small one. It is a natural industry—the one above all others which is suited to the conditions that obtain in that particular State. I claim that this House should exhibit the most complete sympathy with an industry in which a man without capital can make a comfortable living upon a very small block of land. There is no industry in Australia which is so conducive to closer settlement as is the fruit-growing industry.

Mr. MAUGER.—From how many acres can a man obtain a living?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I think that the average in Tasmania would be under 10 acres of orchard per family. Scores of men are making a good living off 6 or 7 acres of orchard. These people do not ask for a bonus—they do not ask for assistance. They merely say—"Do not place a handicap upon our natural industry." All they desire is that they shall be left alone. Only to-day I had an interview with a Tasmanian member of the Fruit-growers' Conference, who is at present in Melbourne, and he informed me that the average production this season would be about 7,500 lbs. of raspberries or currants per acre. To convert that fruit into jam would require about three and a half tons of sugar, upon which a duty of £21 would be collected. Half of that quantity would be exported, and upon that proportion five-sixths of the duty would be refunded; but upon the other half, which is consumed in Australia, no rebate would be allowed. I am sure that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports will be interested to learn that during last year the number of employes of Messrs. H. Jones and Co., of Hobart, ranged from 140 in midwinter to 750 in midsummer. Even in a city like Melbourne, an industry which employed that number of hands would be regarded as a very considerable one.

Mr. MAUGER.—How many factories are there paying less than 30s. a week?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The number of hands at present employed by the firm I have mentioned is 170.

Mr. TUDOR.—Are those the figures which were given before the Tariff Commission?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Yes. I am giving these figures, because I know that the evidence taken by that body will not be available until after this debate has closed. The total wages paid by Messrs. H. Jones and Co. amount to £214 weekly, or an average of 25s. per hand. Labellers—girls upon piecework—average from 20s. to 30s. per week all the year round—the Victorian rate being 14s. per week.

Mr. TUDOR.—I have heard quite a different statement from that.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That may be so. I am aware that a member of the Tasmanian Parliament came over to Victoria and vilified and scandalized the industry to an extent which was discreditable to himself rather than to the State which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. TUDOR.—I made personal inquiries into the matter whilst I was staying in Hobart.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The figures which I am quoting were given before the Tariff Commission, so that the honorable member will have an opportunity of verifying them. I know of no more honest and straightforward man than the gentleman who gave this testimony. It seems to me that Mr. Jones gave his evidence in the most straightforward manner. I repeat that labellers—that is, girls engaged upon piecework—receive an average wage of from 25s. to 30s. per week all the year round, whereas the Victorian rate is only 14s. per week.

Mr. MAUGER.—When the honorable member refers to the Victorian rate, he means the minimum rate, not the Victorian average. There is a very great difference between the two.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am speaking of the rate that is paid under the determination of the Wages Board.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is the minimum rate.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Who gets more than the minimum?

Mr. TUDOR.—I can take the honorable member into a factory in which every man employed receives more than the minimum wage.

Mr. LONSDALE.—How much more?

Mr. TUDOR.—About 7s. 6d. per week more.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Case-makers who are employed upon piece-work average from 35s. to 50s. all the year round. The total wages paid by Messrs. Jones and Co. amount to from £15,000 to £18,000 per annum. Even in a large city like Melbourne or Sydney an industry which paid that sum in wages annually would be regarded as a considerable one, and one which was worthy of every consideration at the hands of honorable members.

Mr. MAUGER.—Did the same gentleman reveal the profits which he made from his business?

Mr. STORRER.—Why should he do so?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—If a manufacturer, at his own risk, establishes an industry, asking for neither bonus nor Tariff, and pays a fair wage to his employes, as Mr. Jones does—

Mr. MAUGER.—But 25s. a week is not a fair wage to pay to men.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I do not think that the wages paid by him are so low as the honorable member suggests.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member stated that the average was 25s. per week.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That is the average paid to all his employes, and these include a very considerable number of children. The honorable member must know that in the fruit season a large quantity of juvenile labour is employed in cleaning the fruit, and in performing other little odd jobs. It seems to me that, in giving evidence before the Tariff Commission, it is not necessary for a manufacturer to disclose the profits which he makes from his business so long as he makes it clear that he extends reasonable treatment to his employes. I do not propose to detain the Committee by discussing the general matters which were referred to in the Budget; but I do ask the Treasurer to bear in mind one statement made by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. I wish publicly to thank that gentleman for his action, whilst holding the portfolio of Minister of Defence, in coming to Tasmania at very considerable personal inconvenience, and settling a very serious difficulty there. The Hobart Artillery Corps. it will be remembered, had been treated with very scant consideration indeed by Major-General Hutton. I have never contended that its members did not commit an error of judgment, but I claim that for the late Commandant of the Military Forces to sweep out of existence, with one stroke of the pen, a corps whose record had been of the most exemplary character, and some of whose members were due for their long-service medals—men who had served for years without receiving one copper from the State, and who had been compelled to purchase their own ammunition—was a great mistake. The Treasurer is aware that I took a very considerable interest in that trouble, and endeavoured to get it settled. The present Postmaster-General, when Minister of Defence in the previous Deakin Administration, said that if an opportunity offered during the recess he would visit Tasmania in order to discuss the matter. His Government, however, went out of office before Parliament was prorogued, and he was unable to carry out his proposal. His successor, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, visited Hobart, and, as Minister of Defence, received a deputation from the non-commissioned officers and men. The honorable and learned member spent nearly two hours in discussing the matter with them, and as the result of the interview a basis of agreement was arrived at, upon which the whole of the men consented to go back as a complete corps. The Minister promised that if that were done arrangements would be made as soon as the House met for the reinstatement of the corps. I believe from the statements made yesterday by the Treasurer and the honorable and learned member for Corinella that a small reduction is being made in the defence vote for Tasmania by postponing the proposed increases until the 1st January next. For the last five years we have suffered delay after delay in this way, and this has given rise to all the trouble that has taken place in connexion with the Defence Forces in Tasmania. I appeal to the Government to carry out the promise made by the late Minister of Defence when he visited Hobart. It is true that he is unable to give effect to the pledge which he gave, but there is such a thing as inherited responsibility, and, in view of these promises, I hope that action will immediately be taken. I actually took to the men a promise in writing from the present Postmaster-General when he was Minister of Defence, and I urge the Government not to upset the arrangements that have been made.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The arrangements will not be upset. If the promise was made it will be honoured.

Mr. McWilliams.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I at once accept the statement made by the honorable gentleman, and by the outgoing mail to-night shall convey what I know will be pleasing intelligence to the men, who take a great interest in this question.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Does the honorable member believe in increased military extravagance?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I do not. I listened with great pleasure to the speech delivered yesterday by the honorable and learned member for Corinella—a speech which, in my judgment, is one of the ablest on the subject that I have ever heard. I am one of those who have always held that our defence system is on a wrong basis. The whole of the revenue of Australia is insufficient to give us an adequate military force on the lines now being followed. I strongly advocate a system under which every child attending our State and private schools would be compelled to learn the rudiments of drill, and taught also how to handle a rifle. I would compel every young man to undergo a certain number of military drills, and to go into camp from time to time for that purpose.

Mr. MAUGER.—Then the honorable member believes in conscription?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I do; but I should treat rich and poor alike. No distinction whatever should be made. It is only in this way that we shall be able to secure a defence force capable of defending Australia when the pinch comes. The mere handful of men that we can maintain on the present terms would be insufficient to enable us to hold our own against even a third-rate power, if we lost the protection of the British Navy. I have always thought that in the matter of defence we have sponged on the mother country. Great Britain pays about £35,000,000 per annum for the maintenance of her Navy, and towards that expenditure Australia contributes only £200,000 per annum. I would prefer to see portion of the sum which we are now expending on militarism devoted to an increased subsidy to the Imperial Navy—which is, after all, our chief protection—and would spend the balance of the Defence vote on a purely citizen force. We should then be able to devote the rest of the money that we now expend on our defences to the work of developing Australia on truly progressive lines—to the settlement of the people on the land, rather than to the training of them in military encampments. I thank the House for the consideration which it has extended to me, and must apologize for having spoken at such length. I can assure honorable members that it has been from no desire to unduly prolong the debate that I have occupied their attention so long, but because I believe that our present fiscal system is striking a serious blow at what must be for many years to come one of the most important industries of the Commonwealth—the fruit-growing industry of Victoria and Tasmania.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—In delivering his Budget statement the Treasurer, instead of giving us a fair outline of the position of the Commonwealth, seems to have simply put before us a set of undigested figures. Various returns had apparently been placed in his hands by heads of Departments, but the right honorable gentleman did not appear to understand them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is good, coming from the honorable member.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I have read the right honorable gentleman's speech, and have endeavoured to understand it, but it is difficult to know what he was really driving at. From his introductory remarks one might have imagined that he was going to give the House something very much better than we usually get in the shape of a Budget statement. In alluding to the fact that we do not secure many immigrants, the right honorable gentleman said—

When an immigrant comes to this country he feels that he "holds his head to other stars," and that he has left behind him those that shone upon him in his old home—he feels that he has left his native shores, if not for ever, at any rate for a very long time.

In these poetic words he told us of the coming of emigrants from the old country; but when he dropped poetry and came to the prosaic we find that for some reason or other he did not appear to understand the figures that had been placed in his hands, and from first to last was incapable of answering any question put to him. For example, when the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne asked him—

Was the reduction in Customs revenue owing to the sugar bounties?—

his answer was—

I shall deal with that when I come to speak of the Customs and Excise revenue.

Various other questions were put to him, but instead of giving direct and positive answers, the right honorable gentleman offered nothing but evasive replies. When the honorable member for Wentworth asked the Treasurer—

Can the right honorable gentleman give us any particulars as to what the arms and armament are?—

his reply was—

The honorable member will find full information in the Estimates.

Then the honorable and learned member for Werriwa interjected—

As I read the figures, the total expenditure on defence comes to over £1,000,000; is that so?—

The Treasurer's reply was—

I shall deal with other particulars a little further on.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He was always going to deal with them "further on," but he never got there.

Mr. LONSDALE.—That is so. His questioners never obtained the information they desired to elicit. The honorable member for Wentworth also interjected—

The right honorable gentleman significantly omits to mention the garrison forces. Is the personnel of those forces to be made up?—

but the only answer he could obtain was—

The honorable member had better ask the Minister of Defence about the garrison forces.

When the honorable and learned member for Werriwa interjected later on, "These figures represent £1,250,000 per year," the Treasurer replied—

The honorable and learned member may count them up in that way if he pleases.

He never attempted to give information to those who sought it. In his hearty, blunt way, he bluffed his interrogators, and refused to supply information that would have cleared up many matters. Coming to questions of policy, we find that from beginning to end the right honorable gentleman did no more than touch the fringe of them. As a matter of fact, the Treasurer should lead the House on matters of policy, but the right honorable gentleman did not attempt to do anything of the kind. It is true that when dealing with the Defence Estimates, he gave us some indication of the Government policy in this regard, but he did not appear to be sure whether he was on safe ground. He did not seem to be quite satisfied that the tail or the head of the party—whichever it may have been—would agree with him. In speaking of the Defence vote, he said—

At the present time the people of Australia, who are a self-reliant and progressive people—as I shall be able to show before I sit down—pay only one-fifteenth per head of the amount paid by the people of the mother country for their naval defence. That being so, the matter only requires to be put before them in a way that is acceptable to them, when I feel sure that it will have the attention that it deserves.

He did not attempt to say, however, that the Government would put the matter before the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What was the next statement that I made?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I was coming to that. The right honorable gentleman continued—

I am authorized to state that the Government will give the most serious attention to this subject. They are fully alive to the urgency of providing for our harbor defence—

That had nothing to do with the question of the naval subsidy, to which he had just been referring—of placing our forts in an efficient condition, and of doing our very best to protect our coasts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Were they not safe proposals?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Extremely safe.

Mr. JOHNSON.—They were non-committal.

Mr. LONSDALE. — The right honorable gentleman was determined not to commit the Government to anything. He should have obtained permission to say what he wanted to say. There is no indication that the Government propose to increase the naval subsidy, and, though the Treasurer seems to suggest that we are not paying as large a subsidy as we ought to pay, he does not commit the Government to any action in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I call attention to the state of the Committee. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. LONSDALE.—The Treasurer gave us certain figures relating to the revenue and expenditure of New Guinea, and when the honorable member for Franklin asked how much was spent in maintaining officials, replied that the information was to be found in the Budget papers. The right honorable gentleman continued—

The honorable member will find that information in the Budget papers. This must be a fine Territory to be able to support 375,000 coloured people with the primitive means of production which they adopt. I see no reason why it should not be a self-supporting and flourishing Possession. The labour of the native population would surely be available if called upon; but capital and enterprise are required for the opening up of the country. It requires to be opened up and made available for the investment of capital by the laying out of roads, by encouraging the occupation of the land, and in many other ways.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Where would the producers of New Guinea send their produce if it were opened up?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—To Australia, if this country would take it, or to the world's markets, about which the honorable member is always speaking.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Would it not be in opposition to our White Australia policy to allow the produce of the natives of New Guinea to compete with the products of our own people?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have taken over the Territory, and have a responsibility in regard to it; and if we leave it idle we shall show ourselves unequal to the task we have taken upon ourselves.

Will any one say what is the policy of the Government in respect to the products of New Guinea? I would allow them to come into Australia free. We spend £20,000 a year on the Territory, and yet we treat those who go there from Australia as foreigners.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did not the honorable member fix up a policy?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I have never had an opportunity. If I ever had the chance I would declare a clear and definite policy, with no humbug about it, so that every one would know what I meant. The Ministry, no doubt, are acting in accordance with their lights; but the Treasurer, instead of telling us what their intentions are, says, when asked for any information, "Refer to the Budget papers," or he tells us that the Minister of Defence, or someone else, knows all about the subject. From end to end of his speech he gave us no definite information. The Treasurer pointed out that where the State gains through the operation of the Federal Tariff, the people of that State have to pay, and that where the State loses they save; but the immediate effect of the Tariff has been to a large extent to crush out of existence the manufacturers of States like Tasmania and Queensland to the gain of the manufacturers of New South Wales and Victoria, and especially of the latter. The people of the States, however, have not benefited, because the duties have increased prices, and the increase has gone into the pockets of the manufacturers. The Treasurer has indicated that the Government intend to get rid of the sugar bounties in about another five years, but he has not said when a measure will be brought in to provide for their extension.

He ought to have communicated to the House the method by which he proposed to deal with the sugar bounty; and whether he proposed to extend it for five years longer, or gradually to allow it to be extinguished.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is all on page 1219 of Hansard.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am against the sugar bounty, and all other bounties. New South Wales has done better out of the sugar bounty than Queensland has done, simply because the money has been a pure gift to the sugar growers of the former State. There were very few coloured people engaged in the New South Wales industry. But, although my State obtained an advantage, if I had my way I would remove the bounty altogether. Our production of sugar will probably equal our consumption at the end of the year. When we reach that stage we shall begin to export. In the ordinary course of things, the effect of that should be to reduce our price to the level of that of the world's market. But because we have a large sugar monopoly in the Commonwealth, that cannot happen. The price will still be kept at a high level, and we shall still be paying money out of the Treasury to make our own sugar dear. I do not complain of dumping when people dump on us; but I do complain of dumping if we are to dump on other countries. I can quite understand honorable members opposite smiling at that remark, because they do not understand the question. To put our hands in our pockets and make our sugar £6 a ton dearer, in order to sell it at a cheaper rate outside, is, to my mind, a silly thing to do. That is the sort of dumping that I object to. The dumping that Mr Chamberlain, Mr. Balfour, and other men, who are playing a game in Great Britain, object to is the system whereby America and Germany send steel and other products into Great Britain and sell them at lower prices than they charge to their own people. I do not object to men dumping in that way. If people choose to increase the price of goods to themselves in order to make them cheaper to us, I am prepared to take all they will give me on those terms. But I object to make the price of our sugar dearer, and to handicap our industries for the purpose of making it cheap to outside buyers. Why does the sugar monopoly exist? Because of the duty. Those who protest most about monopolies are the very men who create them. Take off duties, and let the competition of the world have free play, and these monopolies will gradually cease to exist. We have heard something about the increase in the price of sugar during the last year or two. Mr. Chamberlain was instrumental in bringing about that increase. Mr. Chamberlain induced the British Parliament to enter into an arrangement with various sugar-producing countries that the bounties which those countries gave should cease to exist. What was the effect? Formerly England obtained her sugar cheaper than any other country in the world, and that gave her the command of the market in many industries that depend upon sugar. But immediately the bounties ceased to be paid in other countries, the price of England's sugar went up. Mr. Chamberlain was foolish enough to bring about that state of things. Honorable members jeer at the idea of that policy being the cause of the increase, but, as a matter of fact, it is quite correct. When the sugar bounties were first originated amongst European nations, the effect was to give cheap sugar to England, whilst increasing the price in the countries which gave the bounties. When the price of sugar commenced to go down in England, employment decreased in the sugar refineries; and the Committee, which was appointed to inquire into the matter, reported against any interference with the bounties and against the imposition of any countervailing duty, on the ground that the lower price had been of great benefit to the poor and to consumers of sugar generally. The confectionery, fruit-preserving, and other industries, the main raw material of which is sugar, advanced enormously, but, though employment was increased in this connexion, it, as I say, fell off in the sugar refineries. When the price of the raw material of an industry is increased, great injury is done, and no corresponding benefit is conferred. Sugar was grown in New South Wales with a small duty, and in Queensland practically without duty, because in the case of the latter State, the export stage had been reached. Even then the price of sugar to manufacturers was not reduced; because the Colonial Sugar Refining Company did what it is likely to do in the future, namely, exported the sugar and sold abroad at the world's price, whilst charging the world's price, plus the duty within the borders of the State. The Treasurer has made it clear that we are losing the duty, and that all the revenue from sugar is obtained in the way of excise, out of which the bonus has to be paid. To-day 185,000 tons of sugar costs the people of Australia £1,122,000 because of the duty. About £514,000 is received in excise, and about £93,000 from the duty, a total of £600,000 odd. There is a net return of £461,000, on an expenditure of £1,122,000, representing a loss of some £700,000 to the people at large. If the duty, the excise, and the bonus were abolished, some revenue would be lost, but the people would be £1,122,000 better off. It seems absurd that, in order to get £461,000, we should present to the private producer a sum equal to £700,000. We pay a bonus of £3 or £4 per acre on the production of some of the richest lands in the Commonwealth; and I ask why should the wheat-growers, who toil from one end of the year to the other, not be placed in a similar advantageous position? On what moral ground can we give the bonus in one case and not in the other? Of course, I know that the idea is to get rid of coloured labour; but, let the figures be manipulated as they may, the fact remains that the sugar grown by black labour is increasing as fast as that grown by white labour.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Nothing of the sort.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Both classes of sugar have increased in production by about the same number of tons.

Mr. WILSON.—Why not speak of "alien" labour instead of "black" labour?

Mr. LONSDALE.—At any rate, it is all coloured labour. If it could be shown that the sugar produced by alien labour was decreasing, while that grown by white labour was increasing, there would be some indication that the policy was going to succeed. The honorable member for Maranoa, who has lived in Queensland for years, has said that he and others have been able to work in the climate.

Mr. WILSON.—On the tablelands, where there is a climate different from that of the sugar districts.

Mr. LONSDALE.—If white men can do the work, why should any bonus be paid for employing them? When sugar was produced in New South Wales with white labour, I thought it could similarly be produced in Queensland; but when I visited the latter State two or three years ago, I was able to see what the conditions really were. I may be told that I know nothing whatever about the business, but I obtained permission to go through some plantations, and took steps to obtain the best information available. I went to the chairman of one of the sugar mills, and asked him to put me in the way of obtaining information with regard to his side of the question. I also called on Senator Givens, a recognised champion of a White Australia, and asked him to offer me similar facilities. Therefore, I acted with absolute fairness. Senator Givens furnished me with a typewritten document, setting forth his side of the case, and I proceeded to make inquiries. After I had completed my investigation I came to the conclusion that it was very difficult for white men to work in the cane-fields of Northern Queensland. The intense heat in the cane-fields is most distressing to the men working there, more so than when they are engaged out in the open in railway work or upon gold-fields.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—What was the temperature?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know. I visited the cane-fields in May, which is not a hot month; but I obtained my information regarding the heat from those who had experienced it. I do not deny that some men can work in the cane-fields; but even to the best of men the work must be most exhausting. At the time I was there a contract had been let by the Mulgrave mills to a number of white men to load and unload wood. That would not be very hard work, even in a very hot climate, and yet the white men failed to carry out their contract, and black men had to be engaged to do the work. I went to Northern Queensland with an impression that the work in the cane-fields could, as in New South Wales, be carried on with white labour; but it was represented to me that the conditions were very different. One planter said to me—"Here we have a vertical sun for six weeks, whereas from Rockhampton southwards you always look to the north for the sun. In these regions the vertical sun beams down into the cane-fields, and makes it very oppressive for those who are working there." That, of course, is a matter of which I had not known anything previously.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Or anybody else.

Mr. LONSDALE.—But it is true. The nearer one goes to the tropics the longer the period for which he has to stand the heat of a vertical sun. In Ceylon, for instance, the sun shines vertically for a comparatively long period, and as one approaches the Equator that period is extended. With regard to the vexed question of trashing—

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Trashing is not necessary.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It has been stated that trashing is necessary, and the contrary assertion has been made. Strange as it may seem, both statements are true. In some districts trashing is not necessary, whereas in others it is essential. In the Burdekin district the planters say that they do not need to trash, because that operation injures rather than benefits the cane. It was explained to me, however, that the heavy rainfall in the Cairns district renders trashing necessary, because otherwise the moisture is retained by the trash, and injury is done to the cane. In the Burdekin district, where sugar-growing is carried on by means of irrigation, and the rainfall is comparatively light, trashing is not favoured. I found that the general opinion was that white men could not stand the work in the cane-fields. That opinion was shared by many persons who were in favour of a White Australia. I found that the view was strongly held that the sugar industry could not be successfully carried on in Northern Queensland by means of white labour. At about the time that the greatest amount of work has to be performed in the cane-fields, the pastoral and other industries are in full swing, and white men will not cut or trash cane if they can secure other employment. Therefore, there is no possible chance of obtaining the necessary number of men. Last session a planter came down to me, with a letter of introduction from a son I have in Townsville. He came to get my views as to whether the sugar bounties would be continued. I told him that if I had control of the matter they would not; but that it appeared to me that the Parliament would be willing to continue them. In the course of a conversation, I asked him if he believed that sugar could be grown with white labour in North Queensland. He said "yes." I then said, "Have you registered your plantation as one on which sugar is to be grown with white labour?" and he said he had.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I call attention to the state of the Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I ask the honorable member to withdraw the call.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I withdraw it.

Mr. LONSDALE.—As I understand the Government are now willing that progress should be reported, I shall be prepared to conclude my speech to-morrow.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

I asked just now that the call for a quorum should be withdrawn, not because I had any doubt that there was a quorum present, but because I felt that as we have to meet to-morrow morning at 10.30 a.m., and it is now almost a quarter past 11 o'clock, out of consideration for the honorable member for New England, who had indicated to me the probable length of his speech, I should be prepared to agree to adjourn at this hour.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 11.14 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 1 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m. and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. R. EDWARDS presented a petition from the Master Bakers' Association of Queensland, protesting against the inclusion of the union label clauses in the Trade Marks Bill.

Petition received.

ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—It is stated in one of to-day's newspapers that progress was reported from Committee of Supply on the Budget last night because there was not a quorum in attendance, but, as I distinctly informed the House, when moving the adjournment, there was a quorum of Ministerial supporters, apart from the members of the Opposition.

DECIMAL COINAGE.

Motion (by Mr. G. B. EDWARDS) agreed to—

That a copy of all correspondence between the Government and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or any other persons, subsequent to 30th November last, on the subjects of the coinage of silver or the adoption of a decimal system of currency by the Commonwealth, be laid upon the table of the House.

BUDGET.

In Committee of Supply: (Consideration resumed from 31st August; vide page 1821), on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST—

That the item, "President, £1,100," be agreed to.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—Before progress was reported last night, I was dealing with the assertion of representatives of the State of Queensland that white men can work in the cane-fields there as well as black men, and I stated that, if that be so, there is no need for the expenditure of public money to provide bounties for the encouragement of white labour. I added, however, that the experience which I had gained by a visit to Queensland some time ago, and in other ways, had led me to believe that climatic conditions there are entirely against the employment of white men, because of the exhausting heat caused by the vertical rays of the sun during many weeks of the season. My statement was challenged; but this heat is a physical fact which cannot be denied. With regard to the trashing of cane, it is said by some that it is necessary, and by others that it is not, but the truth seems to be that everything depends on the district. In the Burdekin district, for instance, it would injure the cane to trash it, but in districts where the rainfall is more copious, the cane must be trashed, or the moisture will reduce its sugar contents. Last session a planter from Queensland waited upon me here to know if the bounty would be extended. I told him that I was opposed to this extension, but that I thought it would be agreed to. I then asked him if white men could cultivate cane in Queensland, and he replied "Yes." I asked him if he had registered his plantation as one on which only white labour would be employed, and he again said "Yes"; but when I questioned him on his success he said, "I have succeeded with white labour up to the cutting of the cane, though I have had to get black labour to cut it." I asked this gentleman how it was that he had not continued to employ white labour and he replied that he could not get the men. I then suggested that that proved that white men could not perform the work, but he said that if the planters could get the right class of men, white labour would meet the case. He then explained that he meant sober, steady, industrious men, who were not afraid of a day's work. I asked him whether he thought that men of that class would go into the cane-fields to cut cane, when other work, such as shearing, was available to them.

Mr. PAGE.—Where is the shearing in that part of Queensland? You might as well ask for a shearing job in Melbourne.

Mr. LONSDALE.—In parts of Queensland there is shearing to be done at about that time of the year. We know that shearers start from the Queensland stations and work their way right down through New South Wales, as far south as Victoria.

Mr. PAGE.—It would take shearers six months to travel from the sugar plantations to the shearing sheds.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order. It will be utterly impossible for the honorable member to continue his speech if continuous interruptions take place. I would ask the honorable member for New England not to address particular members or sections of the Committee, and not to so constantly turn his back upon the Chair.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am not turning my back upon the Chair with any intention to be disrespectful, but I am endeavouring to make myself clear to honorable members, and I have been told even by the reporters that sometimes I cannot be properly heard.

Mr. KELLY.—On a point of order, do I understand that a speaker must necessarily face the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN.—Even the canons of ordinary courtesy require that a speaker should face the person whom he is addressing.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not wish to offend against the canons of courtesy, or the rules of debate, but my sole desire is that every honorable member may hear my remarks. As I was proceeding to say, at about the time that men are required for cane cutting, there is plenty of other work available in parts of Queensland.

Mr. PAGE.—To what time of the year does the honorable member refer?

Mr. LONSDALE.—To the summer time, when the cane is being cut. The other classes of work to which I refer absorb the better class of men, and it is really the worst class which drifts into the cane-fields. My informant admitted that that was a difficulty. I asked him if he thought it was possible to obtain a sufficient number of men of the proper class to cut the cane, at that particular season of the year. He could not give me a satisfactory reply. I then asked him whether he knew anything about Hood's gang, and he stated that he knew them well, as they had been working in his district. These men were reported to have done their work well right through the season. They had earned a large amount of money, and had satisfied both the growers and the mill managers. The gentleman to whom I have referred said that they were the right class of men. They were the sons of farmers, strong, sturdy, temperate men, and were prepared to do a good day's work, and as a consequence did well. I asked this gentleman whether he could tell me how many of the men who started with the gang remained with it at the end of the season, and he replied that about one-third had stuck to the work. That seemed to me to afford absolute proof that white men could not successfully carry on the work in the cane-fields. Here were men, admitted to be of the right class, who were both willing and able to perform the work for a certain time, and yet two-thirds of them dropped out, because they were not able to continue it.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Did the honorable member's informant say that those men were not capable of continuing the work?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am drawing my own conclusions. My informant did not say that two-thirds of the men fell out because they were not able to do the work; but I contend that, in view of the fact that they had been able to earn a large amount of money, they would have continued the work if they had not found it too much for them. I do not see how any stronger proof could be adduced of the fact that there is something which prevents this work from being carried on by white labour.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Has the honorable member any objection to give the name of his informant?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not remember the name, but I will wire to my son at Townsville, and obtain it, if required. The gentleman to whom I have referred was a sugar planter, and I think his name was Crawford. I have had interviews with sugar planters, who declared that they had been prepared to employ white labour exclusively. One employer said, "I started operations with the definite idea that I would not employ a coloured man upon my plantation. The first week the men engaged were all white, the second they were of a piebald character, and the third they were all black." In other words, the first week the employes consisted wholly of white men, the second they comprised white and coloured men, and the third week they were all coloured. I met with innumerable instances of that kind. I do not make any charge against the white man. I say that the sugar industry is one in which he cannot work successfully. The very conditions of the country are against him. When we offer a bonus of £2 per ton to encourage the production of sugar by white labour, we are endeavouring to fight against natural conditions, and those conditions will always defeat us. I say that if we can assist to continue that industry in Queensland it will be a splendid thing. But this House has decided that the kanakas employed there shall be deported to their homes at the end of their engagements. From my stand-point, that was not a wise decision. I say at once that it would have been much better if we had resolved that no further kanakas should be recruited, but that those who were already in Queensland should be allowed to remain there and to die out. Even if white labour can be successfully employed in the cane-fields, we must allow time to effect a transition from black to white labour conditions. In order to carry out that change upon humane lines, the Government should not enforce the deportation conditions, and, if necessary, those conditions should be altered. We are accustomed to say that we are superior to the black race. But let us prove our superiority. Why, in all our actions, we are practically proclaiming to the world that we are not equal to the coloured races. In my district I have repeatedly declared that I am equal to any six black men. I make that statement deliberately, and I am prepared to meet them in open competition in any occupation in which the natural conditions are suited to white men like myself. I contend that we should exhibit our superiority. As we are strong, let us be merciful. Possessing the power that we do over these men, let us show our humanity to them by tempering justice with mercy. In the interests of Queensland, in the interests of a White Australia, and of our own race, it is a mistake to adopt the high-handed course which we have adopted in connexion with these unfortunate men, who, in many instances, were brought here in opposition to their own will.

Let us prove that we belong to a race which is possessed of some chivalry and honour, and let us treat these men—black though their skins may be—as they should be treated.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Is not the honorable member aware that the kanakas themselves wish to return to their homes?

Mr. LONSDALE.—If that be so, I have no objection to their deportation to the islands from which they came.

Mr. PAGE.—They were recruited upon the understanding that at the end of their engagements they would be sent back to those islands.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Will the honorable member allow me to put my case in my own way? He declares that the kanakas were recruited upon the understanding that they should be returned to their homes at the end of their agreements. But I would point out that some of them may not desire to go back to their islands. I claim that if any of them wish to remain we should not insist upon their deportation; if, on the contrary, they desire to be returned to their homes their wish should be respected. Personally, I should not allow them to be recruited in the future. I do not believe in this semi-slavery business. Therefore, in the interests of the black races themselves, I should forbid recruiting. I have dealt somewhat fully with this question, because I regard it as a very important one, and I do not think that we should take any steps which would be calculated to injure the sugar industry. On the contrary, we should do what we can to encourage its growth. Honorable members are aware that as we proceed north black labour becomes more efficient than white labour, but as we come south the reverse is the case.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—In the north less wages are paid.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I think that the wages paid are about the same in all the cane-fields.

Mr. WILKINSON.—What would the honorable member do when the kanakas, who are at present in Queensland, have died out?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I say that by the time they had died out we should have been afforded an opportunity to accommodate ourselves to the new conditions.

Mr. WILKINSON.—But the natural conditions do not change.

Mr. LONSDALE.—When a certain number of men are adapted to the conditions which obtain in Queensland, it is far better to allow them to remain than to effect a sudden change of policy.

Mr. GROOM.—Would the honorable member continue the bonus during the period of transition?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I would not. I claim that sugar can be grown successfully without the aid of any bonus.

Mr. GROOM.—Would the honorable member protect the sugar industry?

Mr. LONSDALE.—If I had my way I would abolish the protective duty upon sugar. The moment we obtained command of our market and commenced to export, I would reduce the import duty. I would do that because otherwise a great advantage would be conferred upon the Colonial Sugar Refining Company. When I made that statement last night some honorable members laughed at me. They do not understand this question. I stated that I objected to paying a tax in order to make commodities dearer for myself and cheaper for the "other fellow." I will not be a party to taxing the whole of the people of the Commonwealth in order to make sugar dear to them and cheap to the man outside. That would be the action of an idiot. Once our production is sufficient to satisfy local consumption, and we are becoming exporters, we should begin to take off the duties. Coming to the question of the Braddon blot, I wish to say that I am against the extension of that provision. I fully realize that the States require to be protected as well as the Commonwealth, but the system under which we are now acting is such that the financial arrangements of the Commonwealth are very seriously trammelled. It seems to me that the Commonwealth is to-day little more than a great revenue-producing machine for the States. When the Commonwealth Constitution Bill was before the people, I—perhaps in my foolishness, as some will say—opposed it, and did all I could to induce the people of New South Wales to vote against its adoption. One of the strong points that I then made against it was that it contained the Braddon blot, which, I urged, would limit the power of the Commonwealth in every direction. That statement has been fully justified by our experience. I have often advocated that it would be better to have some such system as that for which provision is made in the Constitution of the Dominion of Canada—a system under which the finances of the States would be protected to the extent of the revenue they are at present receiving, while the Commonwealth would be entirely free in respect of the disposition of the balance. If the States required any additional revenue, they would then have to raise it for themselves, instead of coming to the Commonwealth to obtain it. Under the provisions of the Braddon blot, we can do absolutely nothing towards extending the functions of the Commonwealth in matters involving expenditure, unless we impose direct taxation. I am a believer in a certain form of direct taxation, but hold that it should be imposed by the States themselves. We have the control of the Customs and Excise revenue, and all the revenue that we require should be secured by means, not of a protectionist, but of a revenue Tariff. The States should be allowed to secure their own revenue in their own way. Under the Constitution as it stands, if we attempt any extension of the functions of the Commonwealth requiring increased revenue, it is necessary for us to raise four times as much as we actually require for that purpose. By means of an income tax and a land tax, we should be able to at once raise what we required for ourselves, and there would be no necessity to return any proportion of the revenue so obtained to the several States. I do not think the Commonwealth should be restricted in its financial operations, as it is at the present time. It should be free, in this respect, to take any course it pleases, and should not be controlled in any way by the States. There are some honorable members who seem to imagine that we are here to represent the separate States. As a matter of fact, however, we are here to represent, not any one State in particular, but the Commonwealth as a whole, and we should not allow a consideration of State divisions to in any way control our decisions. It should be our desire to do that which is best calculated to promote the interests of the whole Commonwealth. I should prefer to see a fixed amount given to the States. That is the course adopted by the Dominion of Canada. Under its Constitution the Dominion took over, with the exception of a small amount, the debts of the provinces, subject to the condition that if the debts taken over from any one province exceeded the amount mentioned in the Constitution, that province should pay to the Dominion the interest on the difference. In addition to this, the Dominion gave the provinces a fixed endowment, as well as an endowment of 80 cents. per head of the population, as fixed by the census of 1861. It was further provided that, so far as the smaller States, such as Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, were concerned, they should also receive an endowment of 80 cents. per head of their population until that population reached 400,000, after which they would receive no further increase. Whatever may have been said by the eminent men who framed our Constitution as to the practicability or otherwise of applying this scheme to the Australian Federation, I am still under the impression that we could have arranged some such system, and that it would have obviated the difficulties that have arisen. In connexion with the consideration of the Braddon blot, the question of the taking over of the debts of the States naturally arises. I should favour the taking over of the whole of the debts, but if we cannot do that, we should take over from each a proportion, the interest on which would be met by the revenue returnable to that State. If that course were adopted, we should be entirely free from the States for all time, so far as our finances were concerned. A good deal has been said in reference to this question. I favour the suggestion which has been made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne that instead of taking over the railway revenues of the States, as advocated by the right honorable member for Balaclava, if the whole of the debts are taken over, the Constitution should be so altered as to provide that special Acts shall be passed by the States permanently appropriating the proportion of their revenue necessary to meet the interest payable on the debts taken over. These would be special appropriations, and with such a provision in the Constitution it would not be necessary for the States to vote the money every year. If the payment of interest were secured in that way, nothing further would be required. I hold that for the present at all events the Commonwealth should not interfere in any way with the railway systems of the States. The question of what control should be exercised over States borrowings is one of great difficulty upon which the States themselves are disposed to be very touchy. The honorable member for Kooyong advocates the establishment of a Board of Advice, consisting probably of the Treasurer of each State and the Treasurer of the Commonwealth, which would deal with all loan proposals on the part of the Commonwealth or the States. We should seek to so guide the States that they will not borrow as largely as they have done; but if they desire to do so, we should not restrict their powers in this respect. There are certain matters in connexion with this subject that demand very close attention. It has been said that we should effect considerable saving by the conversion of the States debts; but many of the statements that have been made on this subject will not bear investigation. It would be impossible to bring about any large conversion except as the loans fell due. If it were known that we had a sinking fund, out of which we could buy up our stocks as they came into the market, the result would naturally be to keep up the price. We should not reap any benefit from such a system, unless in consequence of great financial depression the price of our stocks went down. We might then be able to enter the market and buy them up; but I feel that the knowledge that we should be purchasers in ordinary circumstances would keep them from going down. I have read a good deal by different gentlemen on the question of conversion. I do not profess to be a very great financial expert; but I have tried to familiarize myself with the question, and I am quite satisfied that there can be no extensive system of conversion and that the conversion from State to Commonwealth stock would have to be made as the loans fall due. Any saving of interest which might be effected by the conversion should go to the credit of the State whose stock was converted. It is said that Commonwealth stock would command a higher value than State stock. But that, I think, is imaginary; the belief has no foundation. The idea is, I know, indorsed by big names. My name is, I suppose, only a little one in the financial world, but I am satisfied that if these things are examined carefully, it will be realized that there are innumerable causes which affect the value of stock. One of these causes is the question as to whether the affairs of the State are being conducted economically by its Government. Then, when a depression comes about—we know not why, sometimes—it affects the price of stock. So that we must come to the conclusion that, whether he is dealing in Commonwealth or State stock, the investor is governed simply by the way in which the affairs of the Commonwealth or State are being conducted, and by no other consideration. The Commonwealth could not give investors greater security for Federal stock than they have to-day for State stock. During the contest on the acceptance of the Constitution Bill, it was continually urged that the Commonwealth would make a great profit out of the conversion of the States' debts. I looked up the matter, and obtained some particulars which I shall quote, to show how little dependence is to be placed upon such statements. The figures relate to stocks of the same class, though there is a difference in the rate of interest, and the currency of the stock. In June, 1892, New South Wales  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cents., with thirty-two years to run, stood at £96 19s., while Canadian three per cents., with forty-six years to run, stood at £93 17s. The fact that Canadian stock had fourteen years more to run than New South Wales stock gave it a higher value, and the fact that it paid one half per cent. interest less gave it a lower value, but still it stood at about £3 less than did the other. Victorian stock stood at about 16s. less than did New South Wales stock, although it bore the same rate of interest, and had the same currency. In 1893 the value of New South Wales stock had fallen from £96 to £92, while that of Canadian stock had risen from £93 to £94. At that time Canada was federated, but Australia was not. Why did the value of New South Wales stock fall by £4 in that year, and that of Canadian stock rise by £1? The reason was, because it was a year of depression in our State. Canada did not feel that depression as we did, and therefore its stock continued to rise in value. In 1894 the value of New South Wales stock had risen from £92 to £98. In the interval we were forced to have very economical government; no loans were floated, and because we kept off the loan market, the value of our stock rose. In the same year the value of Canadian stock rose by only £1, while the value of New South Wales stock was £3 higher. Although Canada was a federation, still the stock of New South Wales stood £3 higher than it did the year before, when it was £2 lower than the other. Will any one explain to me how Commonwealth stock could have a greater value in the market than State stock? The fact that New South Wales was forced off the money market, and was practising economies, sent up the value of its stock. But when we come to 1898, what do we find? In that year the value of New South Wales stock had risen from £98 to £108. In a period of four years the value of our stock had risen by £10, but the value of Canadian stock had risen by only £6. So that our stock stood £7 higher than did that of Canada, although the latter country was much closer to the market. It must be remembered that during those years in New South Wales we had in power the right honorable member for East Sydney. Comments are made about his financial ability, but no man ever lifted that State higher than he did. He administered the revenue and loan funds so economically during those years that the value of our stock rose, I think, to the highest point it had ever reached. We cannot read these figures without realizing how it is that the administration of the affairs of a country, whether it be a State or a Commonwealth, raises or depresses the value of its stock. If the affairs of a Commonwealth or a State are administered recklessly, the value of its stock will fall. If, on the other hand, the affairs of a Commonwealth or a State are administered economically, the value of its stock will rise. The statement that the creation of Commonwealth stock would be an advantage to us is simply a matter of imagination, and not a matter of fact. How does the stock of New South Wales stand to-day? It stands higher to-day than it did two years ago.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is owing to Federation.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No; the honorable member does not know his book yet, and I have yet to learn that he knows very much. The value of New South Wales stock fell from £108 until it was less than the value of the stock of any State in the Commonwealth. Why did that occur? It was because those who believe in the policy advocated by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports got control of New South Wales. As they always have done, they recklessly administered public affairs. They borrowed money largely, and wasted it in every direction, with the result that the stock of the State fell from its high position at the top of the market down to the lowest position. When I mentioned that the value of New South Wales stock had risen again, the honorable member for Melbourne Ports thought he had scored a point, but he would have had to rise earlier this morning than he did to do so. The value of New South Wales stock went down when the reckless protectionist party was in power. Now it has gone up again. Why? Because we belong to the Commonwealth? No. Simply because the administration of the Government is economical, because we are borrowing less, and because we are living within our means. The history of recent years establishes this fact—that it does not matter to the Stock Exchange whether we are living as a Commonwealth or as a State. What they want to know is how you are carrying on your affairs, whether you are administering your departments economically, whether you are reckless in the expenditure of your loan money, or whether it is being wisely spent. If the answers to these questions are satisfactory, your stock will be sought after; if the answers be otherwise, your stocks will not be desired. It all depends upon administration.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—They have faith in the Labour Party.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable member for Darwin asserts that there has been an improvement because the Stock Exchange has faith in the Labour Party. I shall not say a word against the Labour Party. Its members act up to their lights. I give them credit for pure motives, but in my opinion they lack knowledge. The Labour Party was behind the reckless Ministry that lowered our credit in New South Wales. It supported wanton expenditure. Time after time we tried to prevent it, but these men stood as a solid body, fighting for the expenditure of money in all sorts of foolish directions—to give employment, as they called it. Instead of employment being provided, the result has been that, although we have had one or two splendid seasons, we have had great distress. I do not charge the Labour Party with trying to bring that about. But while their motives may be pure, they lack knowledge, and until they set themselves to understand such affairs all their legislation, whether Commonwealth or State, will be to the injury of the people. I have now put before the Committee my views about various things affecting the welfare of this country. If Australia is to rise to any eminence amongst the nations of the world, it must be by the development of the individual courage, energy, and push of our manhood. The policy which the Commonwealth has entered upon is calculated to have exactly the reverse effect. We are seeking to improve the position of men by legislation—to make them happier and more prosperous by Act of Parliament. In no State has that policy been carried to such an extent as has been the case in Victoria. Here in every direction legislators have been seeking to coddle their people. The British race has grown to its present noble position, not through coddling by Parliaments, but by the inherent power and strength of individual men. If we are to rise as a nation by no other means can we do so. We must not take all the self-reliance out of our people, or we shall fail. Demands are made in every direction not to throw our people on to their own resources, so that they may be developed by their own strength, but to coddle them, to keep them swathed in bandages and flannels, and to shield them from the competition of the world. By this policy we are simply weakening the fibre of the race. We stand to-day a race of weaklings. Yet we presume to look down upon the coloured people with contempt. We affect to despise that little brown race which has just come victorious out of its great fight with what was thought to be the Colossus of the world. Let us compare ourselves with them—with their resource, their industry, their self-reliance and their strength. If we look at the matter in a right light, instead of our having any reason to elevate ourselves in our own opinion, and to think that we are superior to them, the little brown men, as it appears to me, stand superior to us; and until we develop in the same way as they have done, standing out as men prepared to fight our battles with any race—

Mr. MAUGER.—At 2d. a day.

Mr. LONSDALE.—There need be no 2d. a day about it. The people of Victoria have had protection for thirty or forty years. Yet Victoria to-day is the one State that is bending its knees and crying out for greater help and more coddling. No other State in the union howls as Victoria does for assistance from the Government. After so many years of protection, if there is any wisdom in the system, Victoria ought to stand in the forefront. But she stands behind to-day in everything that makes for true liberalism, and which conduces towards the development of a higher and nobler nature.

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I regret that the Prime Minister has not seen his way to comply with the request which I made to him yesterday, and to which I understood that he had agreed that he would this morning move by leave that I be relieved from serving any longer on the Standing Orders Committee. Instead of that, the honorable gentleman gave an indefinite notice of motion, which will go out to the public without even a day being fixed for its consideration, and without any explanation of the reasons for it. Under the circumstances I feel constrained, in justice to myself, to make a short explanation of the reasons that induced me to ask the Prime Minister to move for leave to relieve me from serving any longer on the committee. When I went into the committee room yesterday morning, a notice of motion for a new standing order was placed in my hands in the following terms:—

If the Speaker considers at any time that his attention is being called unnecessarily to the absence of a quorum, and he is satisfied that there is a quorum within the precincts of the House, he may decline to count the House.

That means that, if the Speaker's attention is called to the absence of a quorum at any time when, probably, there may not be ten members present — as was the case a few minutes ago — and he is satisfied there are enough honorable members in the billiard-room or the refreshment-room to make a quorum, he need not count the House. Having regard to the gravity and importance of this standing order, and seeing that it was sprung on us without any notice whatever, in the absence of three prominent members of the Standing Orders Committee, the proceeding seemed to me, rightly or wrongly, so unfair that the only course that occurred to me by which I could express my emphatic protest, was to ask the Prime Minister that I might be relieved from serving any longer on the Committee.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Hear, hear; that was the only honorable course to take.

Mr. McLEAN.—For obvious reasons, I do not think I need make any further comment; but I deemed it necessary to make a short explanation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member did not suggest that there should be a postponement or point to the absence of members of the Committee, or take any of these points at the meeting of the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. McLEAN.—The motion was introduced so suddenly, that, until it had been put and carried with the assistance of the Prime Minister, I could not conceive that such a proposal would have been adopted. I could not imagine that it would be declared by responsible members of this House, that the business of the country was sufficiently attended to by honorable members being in the billiard-room or the refreshment-room. I was taken entirely by surprise, because I really did not think it possible such a motion would be carried. However, I have said enough at the present time, but I wish the Prime Minister had given me the opportunity which yesterday I understood him to promise.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I asked the honorable member to take twenty-four hours to reconsider certain arguments I submitted, and I understood, although he said he would not change his mind, that he agreed to that course.

Mr. McLEAN.—I understood the Prime Minister to say that if he did not hear from me by this morning, he would comply with my request.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did so; I gave notice.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In a whisper!

Mr. McLEAN.—I should now like to deal with the financial statement. I do not intend to go into details of the Budget; in fact, I had not intended to speak at all, and it was only yesterday evening that I thought I had, perhaps, better say a few words since my silence might be misconstrued. I might add that in speaking to-day I am acting against the express orders of my doctor, who has told me not to take any part for the present in parliamentary business. Like most honorable members who have preceded me, I listened to the financial statement of the Treasurer with feelings of profound disappointment. I had thought that the right honorable gentleman would, at any rate, afford some indication of an intention on the part of the Government to deal with the large and important financial problems that confront this Parliament. In my opinion, there is no more important question than that of the States debts, and I did think that the Treasurer would have announced the intention of the Government to deal with that matter in a practical way.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did the Government, of which the honorable member was a member, not deal with the matter in the Budget statement last year?

Mr. McLEAN.—The Government of which I was a member advanced the matter very considerably at the Conference which was held with the Premiers of the various States at Hobart; but the present Treasurer has not announced any intention on the part of his Government to take advantage of what was then done; on the contrary, the right honorable gentleman treats the question in a most perfunctory manner, as if it were not of the slightest importance. I should have thought that a Government with which the Prime Minister was in any way connected, and much more so a Government of which he is the head, would make some attempt to carry out a part of the extravagant promises that were made by himself and many others, when urging the people of Australia to consent to the Federal union. There was no point on which greater stress was laid, and I am certain there was nothing that weighed with the people of Australia more, than the promise of the large annual saving in interest, which it was thought would be brought about owing to the credit of the Commonwealth standing much higher than the credit of the individual States. At that time I certainly did not take the view presented by the present Prime Minister. I felt that any assets that would contribute to the credit of the Commonwealth would have to be extracted from the States; that there would be no new asset. I admit that at the present time the credit of the Commonwealth should stand very much higher than that of any individual State, for the obvious reason that the revenues of the States have been largely diminished and impoverished, owing to the fact that the whole of the Customs and Excise revenue has been handed over to the Commonwealth. The States have nothing but direct taxation on which to depend, and it is reasonable to assume that their credit must stand much lower than that of the Commonwealth at the present time, provided, of course, that the affairs of the Commonwealth are managed in a proper, business-like manner. Yet no serious attempt whatever is being made, or, at any rate, no attempt is foreshadowed by the Treasurer in his Budget statement—and that was the proper time—of any intention on the part of the Government to deal with this all-important matter in a practical business-like way. While we have no announcement from the Treasurer of any constructive financial policy, there is very clear indication of a destructive policy. Financial authorities agree, I think, that the weakest point in the Commonwealth Constitution is found in the defective provisions made in regard to finance—in the extraordinary, and, in my opinion, unfair allocation of assets and liabilities, as between the Commonwealth and the States. The Commonwealth is endowed with the whole of the Customs and Excise revenue, and also with unlimited powers of direct taxation, with no responsibility whatever in regard to liabilities or interest charges. On the other hand, the States, whose only recourse is such direct taxation as the people can bear in addition to any direct taxation which the Commonwealth may impose, are left with the responsibility of providing for the redemption of loans and the annual interest charges. It is true that the Convention did make temporary provision by means of the Braddon section to provide for the return to the States of three-fourths of the Customs revenue, the expenditure of the Commonwealth being limited to one-fourth. I have no doubt whatever that the members of the Convention, when doing so, thought that a business arrangement would be entered into between the Commonwealth and the States for the taking over of the States debts before the period fixed for the operation of the Braddon section had expired.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No doubt that is so.

Mr. McLEAN.—But my right honorable friend will see that he is making no move whatever towards taking over the States debts.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What time had I to make any move, when I had to deal with the matter in a few weeks?

Mr. McLEAN.—But the right honorable gentleman has clearly expressed his opinion that there is no necessity to renew the operation of the Braddon section.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say that.

Mr. McLEAN.—I refer the right honorable gentleman to the Hansard report of his Budget speech.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that I did not see that much good would result to the States.

Mr. McLEAN.—That means, if it means anything, that the funds at the command of the Commonwealth Treasurer will be quadrupled without any provision whatever being made in regard to States debts or interest charges.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I suggested the return of a fixed sum to the States.

Mr. McLEAN.—I venture to say that that fixed sum, being that which my right honorable friend could not find any use for, would be very small.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is grossly unfair.

Mr. McLEAN.—With our honorable friends in the Labour corner driving the right honorable gentleman, we know perfectly well that that fixed sum would be infinitesimal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not intend it to be so.

Mr. McLEAN.—This is a very serious matter, and I refer to it, not by way of reproaching my right honorable friend, but in the hope that the Government will give some serious and business-like consideration to the subject.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The States will never suffer at my hands.

Mr. McLEAN.—Another very important matter is involved in the proposals in regard to the sugar bounties. As a protectionist I have been in favour of the payment of these bounties. I am always in favour of the State providing a reasonable sum to encourage any new industry, in order to tide it over its initial difficulties, provided that I am satisfied that when that has been done the industry will become self-supporting and valuable to the country. In this particular case, the bounties were not given for this purpose, but in order to compensate cane-growers for the loss of kanaka labour. That seemed to be a legitimate policy to adopt, and I supported it. I quite agree that something further should be done in that direction, but I do not think that the burden should be a perpetual one on the taxpayers. I do not think it should continue for all time, and certainly the Government proposal is the first step towards making it perpetual. When the Government renew these bounties for five years, without any reduction whatever in the amount, we know perfectly well that the next Government, in the face of the clamour of those interested, and the pressure that will be brought to bear on them, will do the same, and so the bounties will go on for all time.

Mr. GROOM.—Will the honorable gentleman tell us what was the policy of the late Government in respect to this matter?

Mr. McLEAN.—I will tell the honorable gentleman what my views were. I had not announced them to the late Government, and I did not intend to do so until just on the eve of the opening of Parliament. The only member of the late Government to whom I mentioned the proposals I intended to make was the late Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balacava. I intended to ask my colleagues to agree to the renewal of the bounties at the present rate for two years, in order that reasonable notice of a reduction might be given, and that at the end of the two years the bounties should be reduced by  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. each year, so that at the end of another eight years they would have entirely disappeared. That is to say, that ten years from the commencement of the new arrangement these bounties would have disappeared automatically.

Mr. GROOM.—Would the protective duty have remained?

Mr. McLEAN.—I certainly intended to propose a renewal of the Excise duty at the present rate.

Mr. GROOM.—That is to say, the honorable gentleman proposed to reduce the protection on sugar to £3 per ton?

Mr. McLEAN.—At the end of ten years, yes; and that in my opinion is a very reasonable protection.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It would be about 25 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN.—In my opinion it would be a reasonable percentage of protection, and I think the time allowed for the reduction of the bounty would have been ample. I made very close inquiries, went carefully into the matter, and secured all the information I possibly could, and it appeared to me that the proposal I was going to submit to my colleagues was fair, if not generous, to the cane-growers, whilst it afforded a guarantee to the taxpayers of the Commonwealth that there would be an end to the payment of these bounties.

Mr. GROOM.—Did the honorable gentleman propose to reduce the beet-sugar duty? How did he propose to deal with that?

Mr. McLEAN.—In precisely the same way as with the cane-sugar duties.

Mr. GROOM.—I mean as regards the protective duty?

Mr. McLEAN.—The protective duty on beet sugar at the present time is prohibitive, as we know.

Mr. GROOM.—How did the honorable gentleman propose to deal with that?

Mr. McLEAN.—I would not care a rush whether that remained at £10 or at £6 per ton. I do not see that it would make any material difference.

Mr. GROOM.—It would as regards importations.

Mr. McLEAN.—I never did see that there was any substantial reason for making such a marked difference between the duties imposed on importations of beet and cane-sugar.

Mr. GROOM.—The production of beet-sugar elsewhere is subsidized.

Mr. McLEAN.—Honorable members may take my assurance that if the Government carry out their proposal to renew the sugar bounties for another five years without any reduction, that will be the first step towards making them permanent. If the payment of these bounties is to be made permanent the people of the Commonwealth should know it, and unless the Government take some steps in the direction I have indicated, that is, diminishing the bounties by a sliding scale they will remain permanent. If they think that the payment of the bounties for another five years is sufficient, I would advise that they should deal with the matter in another way. They might reduce the amount by 10 per cent. each year from the present time, which would be equivalent to a total payment for five years at the present rate. My proposal would be equivalent to a six years payment at the present rate; but it would take ten years under my proposal to extinguish the payment of all bounties.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is it the bounty, the excise, or the duty the honorable gentleman proposes to reduce?

Mr. McLEAN.—The bounty paid to growers of sugar-cane by white labour.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What about the excise?

Mr. McLEAN.—I propose to renew that at the present rate of £3 per ton.

Mr. GROOM.—Would the honorable gentleman make that perpetual?

Mr. McLEAN.—Yes, as a legitimate source of revenue, so long, of course, as the customs duty remains in operation. If the customs duty should become inoperative it would not do to continue the excise duty, and it might become inoperative by the production in the Commonwealth of all the sugar we require for ourselves. In connexion with this matter, I might tell the Treasurer that, so far as I was enabled to investigate the subject, and I went into it very closely, I am of opinion that the cane-growers, although the bounty is paid directly to them, do not get the full benefit of it. Because the price that is paid to them by the Colonial Sugar Refining Company is, in my opinion, very much lower than it should be, having regard to the fact that the company has free access to all the Australian markets, and is protected against importations from abroad. Apparently much of the bounty that should go to the growers goes to the company. But, turning away from that subject, I am very pleased to be able to congratulate my right honorable friend on the cheerful and optimistic tone of his speech. That he should adopt that tone was not unexpected by me, because when in office he is always optimistic. But what a different story he had to tell when the Watson Government were in power last session, and he was sitting on this side of the Chamber!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What did I say?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable gentleman said that he was clutched by an octopus.

Mr. McLEAN.—The right honorable gentleman used then to deplore the unconstitutional position into which Federal politics had drifted. He told us that it was highly unconstitutional for the honorable member for Bland to occupy the Treasury benches, with the support of a party of only twenty-eight, and to depend for the retention of office on the votes of other sections of the House. Indeed, if I remember aright, he went so far as to say that the honorable member for Bland must have misled the Governor-General, and that he should return his commission.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was the expression of my opinion upon a constitutional point.

Mr. McLEAN.—Yes; but my right honorable friend is now in a Cabinet which has the support of a party of, not twenty-eight, but eighteen, which depends for the retention of office on the votes of the very men whom he then denounced. The right honorable gentleman, in preparing his Budget, seems to have devoted far more pains to finding arguments in support of the present position, and to disarm in advance criticism of measures which the Government may feel constrained, under pressure of the corner party, hereafter to submit, than to making a clear statement as to our finances. If he had confined his denunciation of the detractors of the Commonwealth to those who misrepresent the acts of its public men, I would have been entirely with him. But he went rather further than that, and denounced those who criticised sections of Acts with which they did not agree. That was the first time in my experience of parliamentary government, in which I heard people directed not to criticise the acts of public men, for fear of injuring the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that those who do not like the provisions of certain Acts should try to repeal them.

Mr. McLEAN.—If my right honorable friend will take his mind back a few weeks, or a few months, he will remember that he used to criticise some of the provisions in our Acts pretty freely. When I was in office he sent me voluminous extracts from Western Australian newspapers, containing reports of his speeches. Very good speeches they were, because in them he expressed his honest convictions, and did not mince matters in the terms which he employed, so that they were very unlike his Financial Statement. So voluminous were they, however, that I am not sure that I had not occasionally to pay something for deficient postage. But after the honorable and learned member for Ballarat had made his pilgrimage to Western Australia, and had had that historic interview with my right honorable friend, these speeches in denunciation of Socialism suddenly stopped, and I had no more deficient postage to pay. Honorable members will recollect a character in one of Dickens' books, no less a personage than the public hangman, who was in the habit of visiting the cells of condemned criminals on the night before their execution, to harangue them through the bars as to how they should comport themselves on the following morning. He used to tell them that they should put on a cheerful expression, that they should walk to the scaffold with an elastic buoyant step, that they should look at the crowd, and that if they felt equal to making a pleasant speech, it would greatly add to the enjoyment of the occasion. "But," he added, "if you cannot make a speech, or look cheerful, at any rate put on a dignified air, and, for Heaven's sake, don't snivel, because snivelling spoils the effect of the whole thing." So my right honorable friend told us, in substance, that whatever we might think of the socialistic measures which were being forced upon this Government, we were to be cheerful, and above all, not to snivel.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I am sure that I voice the feelings of the Committee in expressing the deepest possible pain at the cutting short of the brilliant speech which was in process of delivery by the honorable member for Gippsland. I hope that after a little rest he may be able to resume, and in the meantime I desire at the earliest moment to refer to a matter of the greatest importance to this House and the country—a matter arising out of an explanation made by the honorable member for Gippsland, concerning the reasons which prompted him to take the grave step of resigning his position upon the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. MAUGER.—I rise to a point of order. The matter to which the honorable member is referring already forms the subject of a notice of motion, and I wish to know whether it is in order to anticipate discussion upon that motion.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I submit that the point of order raised by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports cannot be upheld. I would point out that the deputy leader of the Opposition was not proceeding to discuss the motion of which notice has been given by the Prime Minister. He merely made incidental reference to the fact that owing to the action of the Standing Orders Committee the honorable member for Gippsland had resigned his seat upon that body. The honorable member for Parramatta was discussing the proceedings which led up to the action taken by the honorable member for Gippsland, and I contend, therefore, that his remarks were perfectly in order.

The CHAIRMAN.—I think the Committee are quite aware that it is out of order to anticipate discussion upon any matter which has to be dealt with upon a future day. I understand that the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland from the Standing Orders Committee will be debated upon a future occasion, and under those circumstances, the resignation itself cannot now be discussed. Concerning the explanation made by the honorable member for Gippsland, I would point out that personal explanations cannot be the subject of debate. That is specially provided for in our Standing Orders. I would ask the honorable member for Parramatta to recollect these two points, and as far as possible to confine his remarks to the scope permitted by the Standing Orders.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is a rather sudden development. It is very sudden indeed, and is apparently so perfect as to suggest long cogitation and careful preparation. I do not propose to contest the matter further, but I shall place myself in order by moving—

That the Chairman do now leave the chair.

I take this course in order that I may refer to a most extraordinary matter—a matter of such grave importance as to involve the resignation from the Standing Orders Committee of one of the most reputable members of this House, one who has always shown himself to be a keen student of proper parliamentary procedure, and, above all other things, a watchful guardian of the rights of the people of this country. I say that when that honorable member feels himself under the grave compulsion of resigning from a Committee of such an important and honorable nature—

Mr. McDONALD.—I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the honorable member is in order in discussing a question which appears upon the notice-paper for discussion on a future day?

Mr. WILKS.—The deputy leader of the Opposition has moved that “the Chairman do now leave the chair.”

The CHAIRMAN.—In answer to the interjection of the honorable member for Dalley, I would point out that we have not suspended the Standing Orders. I have already ruled that the honorable member for Parramatta will not be in order in discussing the question referred to.

Mr. McCAY.—I wish to ask a question in connexion with the point of order that has been raised. I desire to know whether your ruling is that, upon the motion “That the Chairman do now leave the chair,” an honorable member is not in order in giving his reasons why you should leave the chair, irrespective of whether or not those reasons refer to the business before the House.

The CHAIRMAN.—My ruling is that the Standing Orders are not suspended merely by the moving of a motion, “That the Chairman do now leave the chair.” That being so, notwithstanding that such a motion has been submitted, honorable members must observe the ordinary rules of debate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to refer to a proposed standing order which was read by a previous speaker, and on which he was allowed to make a statement to the Committee. The matter has been freely criticised outside the Chamber, and I submit that I shall be perfectly in order in debating a question that is being discussed at every street corner, and is one of great public urgency. It is a well-known parliamentary procedure to move that the Chairman do leave the chair, in order to secure an opportunity to refer to an extraordinary matter in an extraordinary way.

Mr. CONROY.—I suppose we shall have next to proceed to personal violence.

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask honorable members to preserve order.

Mr. CONROY.—Honorable members will do exactly what they think is right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I take the ground that the Ministry are directly responsible for the proceeding to which I refer, and which has led to the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland as a member of the Standing Orders Committee. We are asked to grant supply, but I, for one, decline to do so until I have ventilated a matter which, I think, profoundly affects future parliamentary control in the Commonwealth. If your ruling, Mr. Chairman, is that I cannot do that, it seems to me that we have arrived at a very serious state of affairs. One of my complaints is that the decision of the Standing Orders Committee has been effected by the Ministry.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Ministry had nothing to do with it. I do not believe that a colleague of mine, even if he knew that the Standing Orders Committee was to meet yesterday, was aware that the matter was to be considered.

Mr. McCAY.—Nor did the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister, I should like to ask him whether the announcement made in the newspapers this morning is correct.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not responsible for a newspaper statement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are told in the newspapers that the Prime Minister and Mr. Speaker supported the proposed standing order.

The CHAIRMAN.—I desire to draw the attention of the honorable member to standing order No. 344. That standing order relates to Select Committees—which includes standing committees—and is as follows:—

The evidence taken by any Select Committee of the House, and documents presented to such Committee, which have not been reported to the House, shall not be disclosed or published by any member of such Committee, or by any other person.

Does the honorable member consider that the Committee would be in order in doing that which would not be permissible on the part of a person outside? In other words, should we not honour, within the precincts of the House, a standing order which we believe to have been disregarded by others.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is part of my complaint. I am calling attention to a violation of the Standing Orders.

The CHAIRMAN.—I think that the honorable member has missed his opportunity to do that. A violation of the Standing Orders of the House can scarcely be brought under notice in Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I shall leave that point. I desire to call attention to the insidious way in which our parliamentary proceedings are being undermined by the present Government. We have reason to believe that certain proceedings have lately taken place in a committee appointed by the House, which were of such a character as to involve the resignation of one of the most respected members of that committee. Such a course could have been adopted by the honorable member for no light reason. If we may believe, not merely reports, but definite and decisive statements by leaders in the House, and particularly on the part of the honorable member for Bland, who the other night heartily denounced the proceedings of the Parliament as processes of obstruction—

Mr. WATSON.—The proceedings, not of the Parliament, but of the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member denounced our proceedings as being wilful obstruction and "stone-walling."

Mr. WATSON.—The proceedings of the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope that the honorable member will not interrupt me. He ran away with the House the other night, but I shall take good care that he does not do the same thing to-day. We listened to the honorable member the other night making charges that lies were being buried about the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON.—That is just about as correct as some other statements that have been made by the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member charged an honorable member with having repeated lies in the Chamber. I shall take good care that he does not run off with the House to-day, as he did the other evening.

Mr. WATSON.—I simply had a chance to reply to the honorable member; that was all.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And I shall have a chance to reply to the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall not accuse the honorable member of hurling lies around the Chamber—an accusation which he made against an honorable member on the evening to which I refer.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member more than once characterized statements from this side of the Committee as a repetition of lies.

Mr. WATSON.—I said that they were on a par with the lies against the Commonwealth that were circulated by the “stinking fish party.”

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member went on to describe as obstruction and a deliberate stoppage of business, a series of addresses that had been delivered on matters of supreme moment to the Commonwealth. It was a matter of very keen regret to me to hear Mr. Speaker rule that such expressions were in order. We know now, however, what expressions are permissible. I should not mind what occurs in the House if it were not that apparently other insidious processes are at work, which not only stifle parliamentary procedure, but have a tendency to bring our whole system of parliamentary government into contempt. I am one of those who believe that, with all its drawbacks and defects, there has not yet been evolved anything to take its place in a way which would be at all adequate to the free expression of the thoughts of a free people. And believing as I do, that it is the best form of government yet evolved, I intend to protest on every occasion when I see insidious influences at work tending to undermine it, and bring it into contempt. We are told in the newspapers to-day that it is in contemplation to take action to curtail the undoubted liberties of this House. We are told, for instance, that the honorable member for Kennedy has it in contemplation, and has already taken decisive action elsewhere, to bring about this condition of things.

Mr. WATSON.—I hope so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is a pity that the honorable member for Bland has only awakened so lately to the importance of getting on with public business.

Mr. WATSON.—I have always held that the majority should rule.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—During last session the honorable member sat here night after night aiding and abetting a series of obstructive and stone-walling tactics, which certainly have had no parallel in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a ridiculous statement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We had one honorable member after another talking for four or five hours at a stretch. By-the-bye, sir, I think it is well for the Prime Minister to leave the Chamber. He seems to have no control over the House, to have surrendered it entirely to his ally, the honorable member for Bland. I have never seen anything more appallingly degrading than the way in which he surrendered his functions as leader of the House the other night, and completely gave the control of it into the charge of the honorable member for Bland. We had the latter gasconading over the floor, lecturing the House, and saying what ought to be done, with the Prime Minister sitting here, I was going to say, like a boiled owl, afraid to speak.

Mr. WATSON.—After the honorable member had been lecturing the House for twenty minutes. He should be the last to talk about lecturing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nothing could have been more degrading than that spectacle the other night when the Prime Minister completely abdicated his functions as leader of the House, and entirely gave over the control of business to the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. WATSON.—That consisted in making a few remarks in reply to the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It may be it was right that the Prime Minister should do so, seeing that the honorable member for Bland is in charge of more members in the House than is the former. All this kind of thing comes from the degrading spectacle which we are witnessing, day by day of having in office a Government without power to control, and therefore without real executive authority, only serving by their actions day by day to bring the proceedings of the House into further contempt. Yet we are told that the remedy for this state of things is that the Government should lead and control the House. The persons who are constantly giving the Prime Minister wholesale advice from outside ought to provide him with the ways and means. They ought to tell him how it is possible for a Government with twenty followers to control a House numbering seventy-five members. That is the primary problem which the purveyors of advice from outside ought to solve for the Prime Minister, and then he might be able to do what they wish him to do—to control the House as the leader of a strong majority ought to do. But, in the meantime, matters in the House must go from bad to worse, and our institutions must be degraded more and more in the eyes of right-thinking people outside. We are told that we are to have our privileges further curtailed, and that this is to be done on the initiation of the honorable member for Kennedy. He above all others is laying down the dictum that the chief concern of honorable members should be about the billiard-room and the chess-table—that honorable members may be anywhere than where they ought to be—in this deliberative Chamber—attending to the serious business of the country. That is a strange doctrine of political ethics to be laid down by a labour member. The honorable member for Kennedy, above all others, is telling the country that all a member of Parliament need to do is to come here, get his name put down, and then scoot for the billiard-room or enjoy himself in luxurious ease; that Parliament, under our democratic conditions, and with all power and authority exercised within its walls by the Labour Party, may be a mere social club where the business of the country may be transacted quite incidentally.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member would not surely call this a social club. It is just the opposite.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. It may be unsocial, but I am now speaking of the ideal of the honorable member for Kennedy. He is proposing a reform. He is proposing to turn Parliament into a social club, where amusement may predominate, and the serious business of the country should be done in the intervals. That is his proposal, I understand from the newspapers to-day.

Mr. McDONALD.—I shall accept all the criticism quite cheerfully.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am sure it will be delightful reading for the strenuous individuals outside who support the honorable member, and who every day have before them an ideal which we may admire even if we do not agree with its details, by reason of its purity and genuineness. But their ideal is not that Parliament should be turned into a mere club for the convenience of those whom they send here, instead of being a Chamber where honest, serious business is done.

Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear! Is honest, serious business being done now?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There can be nothing more serious than an attempt to preserve the liberties of the people, and not to curtail them. That is the first business which we owe to ourselves and to the country.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Will not the best time to do that be when the matter comes before the House? No discussion can have any effect until a proposal is made.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has my old Rip Van Winkle friend just woke up? He has been engaged for a long time in evolving that observation. I think he had better take Carlyle's advice and go to bed for three days, and think, if that is all he has to say on a matter of this great importance. Parliament is not an idle pastime. Are we to lay down the doctrine that it is?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is being kept idle.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If it is being kept idle, the fault must lie with the Prime Minister. He has no power to govern it—no mandate from the people to govern it—no constitutional power of any kind. Having no mandate, he has no power, and cannot have any. Therefore, he can exercise no effective control over Parliament. If Parliament is idle, let us dissolve.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The fault lies with the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then let us dissolve. I say that the Prime Minister should not, to cover up his own ineptitude and weakness—arising, not from any personal deficiencies, but from sheer lack of support—try to bring parliamentary institutions into contempt. Parliament is not to blame.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; the honorable member is.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Only the people can effectively redress these matters, and the sooner we refer to their arbitrament the better. In the meantime, we have the delightful doctrine laid down by a Labour member that Parliament may be turned into a social club, and members attending to their own pleasure, and seeking their own luxuriousness and enjoyment, are to be considered as engaged in serious parliamentary business!

Mr. PAGE.—That is a deliberate lie, and you know it!

The CHAIRMAN.—Order!

Mr. PAGE.—He is lying; that is what he is doing!

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member must withdraw that remark.

Mr. PAGE.—I will do nothing of the kind. He is lying, and he knows it!

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member is not in order. He must withdraw.

Mr. PAGE.—I will do nothing of the sort. I say that he is lying, and he knows it!

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member must recollect that the Standing Orders do not permit such expressions to be used. The Standing Orders are framed for the express purpose of protecting honorable members.

Mr. PAGE.—I will withdraw the statement; but is the honorable member for Parramatta in order in getting up here and deliberately stating an untruth—that Labour members want to turn this Parliament into a social club?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is most offensive.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member for Maranoa has withdrawn the statement, but he knows that he must withdraw it without any qualification. In regard to the statements made by the honorable member for Parramatta, I have followed them very closely, and took it that he based them entirely on some newspaper paragraph. They were not his personal opinions.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The offensive statement has not been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN.—It is withdrawn.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member repeated it.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member for Maranoa has not withdrawn the statement unconditionally.

Mr. PAGE.—Out of respect for the Chair, I withdraw the statement wholly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I care nothing for the honorable member's personal respect; nothing whatever.

Mr. PAGE.—Don't you—you cad!

Mr. KELLY.—I rise to order. The honorable member for Maranoa distinctly called the honorable member for Parramatta a "cad." I ask that that shall be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask honorable members who desire that order shall be maintained to assist me in maintaining it. The honorable member for Maranoa must withdraw the remark that he has made.

Mr. PAGE.—I will withdraw it, but the honorable member cannot stop me from thinking it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Now I will proceed. I much regret that the honorable member for Maranoa should be disconcerted with what I am saying. I am addressing my remarks principally to one member of the Labour Party.

Mr. McDONALD.—Then refer to me by name.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Kennedy, I mean.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I quite identify the honorable member, and I am glad that he does not deny it.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable member said the "Labour Party"; I am not the party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I include, of course, the honorable member's leader.

The CHAIRMAN.—I have had to call for order more than half-a-dozen times within the last minute. Honorable members on both sides are continually exchanging remarks across the floor. I ask them to refrain from so doing, and to allow the honorable member for Parramatta to proceed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I refer to the honorable member for Kennedy, principally because, of all members of this House, I did not expect to see him adopting such sentiments as those which I have been condemning. I thought that if there was one honorable member who would have been the last to agree to any such course as is proposed, it would have been he, who in the Queensland Parliament assumed an entirely different attitude. There was in the Queensland Parliament a Labour member named McDonald; and when such a course as is suggested here was taken by the Speaker of that Parliament, he was the very first to protest against anything of the kind being done. There were allegations there that the minority were not getting fair play from the Speaker. There were allegations there that a huge majority was rough-riding the House, and obliterating all the rights and privileges of the minority. A number of members—all, I think, belonging to the Labour Party—got up to protest against anything of the kind being done by the Speaker.

Mr. WILKS.—They ought to do it now.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order; order!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—On that occasion it was the honorable member for Kennedy who moved to dissent from the Speaker's ruling, because he had ignored those who had called attention to the want of a quorum, and dared to say that he had satisfied himself that there was a quorum present in the Chamber.

Mr. McDONALD.—Hear, hear. Quite right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This honorable member was the first to dissent from Mr. Speaker's ruling on that very matter. But now we find, according to report, that he is proposing to take a course which will enable Mr. Speaker to do the same—nay, much more than was done by the Speaker of the Queensland Parliament. I hope it is not the same McDonald who emphatically protested on that occasion?

Mr. McDONALD.—It is the same.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The guardians of the rights of the House upon that occasion were the Labour members of Queensland. Now, it seems that one of them, at any rate, is going to try to stab the members of this House in a way which I venture to say is not in accord with any British precedent. I find that the whole of the members who voted with the honorable member for Kennedy in the Queensland Parliament against the Speaker were Labour members of that State. In spite of what has been said by the leader of the Labour Party on the present occasion, and in spite of the course contemplated by the honorable member for Kennedy, I hope that enough members of the Labour Party will be found to say a word for the privileges of this Chamber. The honorable member for Maranoa did me a wrong in being so offensive to me just now, on the understanding that I had in my mind anything against him. I am identifying the people here to whom I refer.

Mr. PAGE.—Why did not the honorable member mention their names? He said, "the members of the Labour Party."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My own opinion has always been, and is still—and I will not believe anything to the contrary until I am forced to do so—that the honorable member will be one of those who will never agree to depriving the members of this House of their rights.

Mr. PAGE.—Hear, hear!

Mr. TUDOR.—The subject is not up for discussion yet.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am referring to a newspaper report, and to some remarks which had been made previously in this debate. I ask myself the question—what is the purpose of Parliament? Honorable members opposite seem to suppose that the purpose of Parliament is to turn out legislation like sausages. May I remind them that that was not the original purpose for which Parliament was instituted? The main object of Parliament is to ventilate the grievances of people outside. That remains our great supreme object, and when its achievement is crippled by Standing Orders or other rules of procedure, a definite and decisive blow is struck at the very purpose of parliamentary government. Apropos of the charges of the leader of the Labour Party as to "stone-walling," and as to the burking of the real business of the country, I point out that one of the great purposes of parliamentary discussion is to form and lead public opinion outside. We are not here merely as a registering machine, but exist as a deliberative Chamber; and it is our supreme obligation to inform and shape public opinion outside, as well as within these walls. When we submit to caucus rules, we largely abrogate this first and most fundamental of our parliamentary obligations. It would be appropriate for honorable members who believe in caucus rule, and regard Parliament as a mere registering House—

Mr. WATSON.—When the honorable member used to abide by the decision of the majority in caucus, how often was that decision unfairly applied?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Bland is prating, like a parrot, something that has been repeated in this House a score of times, but which has no point.

Mr. WATSON.—I merely state a fact.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What the honorable member states is not correct.

Mr. WATSON.—It is; the honorable member was one who signed the agreement to abide by the decision of the majority in the caucus.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—To what is the honorable member referring?

Mr. WATSON.—I am referring to the caucus of the first Parliamentary Labour Party in New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Mr. Salmon, I believe I did sign that agreement.

Mr. WATSON.—Was it unfairly exercised?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — That caucus lasted for three months.

Mr. WATSON.—That does not matter—the principle is the same.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I learned enough in that caucus to keep me out of caucuses for the future.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member was in the caucus for several years after that three months—he was in the caucus for two and a half years afterwards.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is an absolutely incorrect statement, for which there is not a tittle of foundation.

Mr. WATSON.—I say that it is absolutely correct.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is absolutely incorrect in his statement.

Mr. WATSON.—Until the honorable member joined the Ministry he was in the caucus all the time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is an absolutely incorrect statement.

Mr. WATSON.—I maintain that the statement is absolutely correct.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No one knows better than the honorable member for Bland that the statement is incorrect.

Mr. WATSON.—Mr. Chairman, I must draw your attention to a remark which I think is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN.—The statement made by the honorable member for Parramatta must be withdrawn.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I withdraw; but I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to protect me from interruptions, which have never ceased since I rose.

The CHAIRMAN.—I must ask that the interruptions shall cease, and I also ask the honorable member for Parramatta not to invite interruptions by remarks which he may make.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not care whether I invite interruptions or not; I wish to express my opinion in a parliamentary way; and it does not trouble me whether or not those opinions excite interjections. I hope I have a right to express my opinion without interruption, no matter what the character of my remarks may be, so long as they are parliamentary.

Mr. WILKS.—We shall have to fight our way with a bowie knife if the caucus members have their way.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It would be very appropriate for a caucus to propose those retrograde methods of parliamentary procedure. But the caucus, in its very constitution, is out of accord with all that relates to Parliamentary Government. If caucus rule is to proceed, ramifying as we see it every day, and leading to the crippling of the privileges of the House, Parliamentary Government will soon be a by-word and a disgrace in this country. It is because I feel that there are constant inroads being made on the system of Parliamentary Government, as that system has been known for hundreds of years, that I am raising my protest against the latest attempt on the part of an honorable member who, above all others, should be the guardian of the rights and liberties of the people of this country. We have been charged with obstruction. This House has been sitting for six weeks, and I venture to say that in that time we have done as much business as any deliberative assembly ever did in a similar period. First of all, the policy of the Government was declared and debated—a matter which always involves discussion for a fortnight or three weeks, and never less in any Parliamentary Chamber in the world. We have concluded the consideration of the classification scheme for the Public Service—a scheme which, I venture to say, no one outside ever dreamt could ever be dealt with in four days. The Commerce Bill is through its second reading, and the Trade Marks Bill has been taken into Committee. The Evidence Bill, the Jury Bill, and the Life Assurance Bill have been passed, and on the enactment of the latter measure I congratulate the Minister of Home Affairs.

Mr. MAUGER.—Then it would appear that the Prime Minister is leading the House?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Two Supply Bills have been passed, and now we are in the first week of the debate on the Budget.

Mr. WILKS.—There is also the second reading debate of the Manufactures Encouragement Bill.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Budget debate was concluded last year within a week.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And why? Because immediately preceding the introduction of the Budget, there had been a motion of want of confidence, which caused a debate of three or four weeks, thanks chiefly to honorable members in the corner. Under the circumstances, there was no need for any further ventilation of grievances, that having been accomplished under cover of the motion of want of confidence.

Mr. TUDOR.—The half-Prime Minister last year asked that the Budget debate should be concluded in one day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no intention of occupying time at any length. All I desire to do is to protest against both the tone and temper of this Chamber in regard to the conduct of public business, and, above all, in regard to a deliberate attempt which has been made to curtail the privileges of this House. That is my object in rising, and I shall make the protest when permitted to do so by the noisy members in the corner. And what has been the result of discussion in this Chamber? Only yesterday the Minister of Trade and Customs promised to submit substantial amendments in the Commerce Bill; and that promise, I venture to say, is the result of the elucidation of the question on this side.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There has been no elucidation on that side of the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is a delightful statement from an honorable member, who, only the other night, promised the Opposition that he would submit amendments.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not promise the Opposition anything of the kind.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — The way in which the Minister of Trade and Customs will eat his own words in twenty-four hours is remarkable. The result of the discussions which have taken place in this House up to date has been of the most beneficial character, having regard to the interests of the people at large. The Minister of Trade and Customs may sneer as he likes, but he never debated a subject in his life—he never could rise to the necessary intellectual plane. All he can do is to sit and sneer and jeer at honorable members who do debate the questions before us; but the Minister may keep his jeers to himself, for I shall not tolerate them. I propose to conclude my remarks in a very few minutes. I regret that, owing to many interruptions, they have occupied very nearly an hour. I did not purpose, when rising, to claim the attention of the Committee for more than a sufficient time to enable me to make a protest against the on-coming of what I believe to be a violation of our parliamentary privileges. Having made that protest, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Committee any further. I shall be very glad indeed if my remarks constitute the whole of the observations on the subject from this side of the Chamber at this stage. My point, to put it briefly, is that if these newspaper reports be true, and I believe there is every reason to assume that they are accurate in almost every particular, we are faced with a very serious state of affairs. The proposal is one to still further centralize the government of the country, and I say that the present Government, of all Governments, has no mandate to make any attack upon our parliamentary privileges. It is only a strong Government, possessing the complete confidence of the country, and consisting of a homogeneous party, that may begin to assail the privileges of Parliament; certainly not a Government which comprises a party of less than one-third of the members of the House. In a condition of affairs like the present, we require more, and not fewer, parliamentary checks on the operations of a Government which represents only a minority of the House. The primary purpose of the institution of these checks is to preserve the privileges of minorities, but certainly not to provide a minority with instruments of oppression and coercion when they may happen to be in power. I say that the present Government has no authority from the country, and no constitutional authority of any kind, to whittle away the powers of Parliament. Their continuance in office at all is a violation of every constitutional principle. The majority supporting the present Government is made up of shreds and patches. It can only live by shifts and expedients of the most dangerous kind.

Mr. MAHON.—Like the last Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I can find no better warranty for the course I am taking than the attitude of the honorable member for Coolgardie during the last session of Parliament. We can refer to Hansard to show that day after day the honorable member, with the persistence and rancour of the sleuth-hound, pursued the previous Government in their efforts to transact business. Whatever might be said of the last Government, it at least had the support of a majority of the members of this House.

Mr. TUDOR.—A majority of one.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Even that cannot be said of the present Government. It represents the smallest party in the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The late Government had not a majority in the members of its own party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does my right honorable friend suggest that he was not in the coalition after all—that he was not a supporter of the coalition? Is that what the right honorable gentleman wishes us to infer? I take it that the right honorable gentleman, and the present Prime Minister also, were just as much supporters of the previous Government as we were. If not, then the coalition must not have been what it purported to be. I hope that my right honorable friend does not suggest that whilst he was in the coalition he was not of it. I say that the late Government had a majority, though a small majority, and they did not attempt to curtail the privileges of this House in the manner in which, if we are to judge by newspaper reports, it is the intention of the present Prime Minister to do. I say that the previous Government made no attempt to assault the privileges of the House in that way.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—What were the new Standing Orders to be?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know, and, as they were never discussed, it is impossible for any one to say. If it is desired to put an end to the privilege of discussion in this House, that is a fair subject for consideration in the constitution of the Standing Orders. But this proposal is but a piece of political hypocrisy. It is a proposal, according to the reports appearing in the newspapers, to make it appear that honorable members are in this Chamber when in reality they are attending to anything but the business of Parliament. It is quite sufficient for this Government to retain their offices, without their attempting to make an inroad like this upon our parliamentary privileges. If they like to take the odium attaching to minority rule, if they like to hold office and its emoluments without the power requisite to give force to their wishes, and if they are ready to violate every rule of constitutional procedure, that is their own affair. But, at the same time, the obligation is laid upon the Opposition to seek by every means to avoid the dangers of such conduct. Retention of office by this Government under present circumstances, having regard to the composition of the Ministerial party, amounts to nothing more nor less than political obsession. If they like to retain their positions under present conditions, they have, of course, the right to do so; but my complaint is that, without having authority of a substantial kind, the Government are seeking to make an insidious inroad upon every principle on which this Parliament rests.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The power which the Government possess seems to worry the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say frankly that it is not the power which the Government possess, but the supplementary power furnished to them by the honorable member and his colleagues, that to-day makes me raise my voice in protest. I should have thought that the very last party to violate the privileges of Parliament, to do anything to stifle free speech and the thorough discussion of the measures submitted to Parliament, would be the Labour Party.

Mr. WILKS.—They are Thugs.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Is the honorable member for Dalley in order in saying that the members of the Labour Party are Thugs?

Mr. WILKS.—I used the term in its classic sense.

The CHAIRMAN. — That is its very worst sense. I did not hear the remark, but I now ask the honorable member to withdraw it.

Mr. WILKS.—I have much pleasure in withdrawing it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—These changes of Government are bad for the people. No one will gainsay that. The great need of Australia at the present moment is stable government. I make that admission freely and frankly. But we shall not get stable government by these shifts and devices. There is only one authority which can redress the balance of parliamentary parties, and that is the people of the constituencies. Parliamentary government is on its trial as it has never been before in this arena. There are forces insidiously at work outside and within this Chamber, seeking to bring about the overthrow of our present system of parliamentary government, which has been our inheritance for many hundreds of years, but which unless we exercise patience, tolerance, and forbearance in our methods, must always and everywhere fail.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What is threatening parliamentary government at the present time is the honorable member's tolerance and forbearance!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is threatening it now is the intolerance of Ministerial supporters, and the charges of obstruction which are levelled at the Opposition day after day by honorable members opposite.

Mr. ROBINSON.—And the neglect of Ministers to attend in their places.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have already quoted facts to show that six weeks' good work has been done in this Chamber, and are we to be paid for it by being deprived of our parliamentary privileges? So far as I am concerned, I shall resist to the utmost of my power any proposal by this Government to curtail the rights of this Chamber, or the privileges which honorable members enjoy.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—It is not for me to determine the purpose or profit of the speech to which the Committee has just listened. The pretext put forward most frequently for its deliverance was the promotion of the serious business of Parliament. I ask in truth what serious business could be assisted by it? So far as it related to anything, it discussed two proposals which the honorable member for Parramatta believes will be made to the House, one involving the resignation of an honorable member of the Standing Orders Committee, and the other the possible submission of a new standing order to the House. Neither proposal can be advanced or retarded until submitted to the House for decision, so that in any case nothing will have been gained by the present debate. On the contrary, time has been absolutely lost by the speech to which we have just listened. Parliament, as the honorable member suggested, is a great and complex machine. But it was framed long ago, and works to-day under conditions which render every legislative body in the world incapable of transacting its business unless it takes measures to provide against abuse of the powers of individual members. With us a member physically strong enough could occupy with his speeches the greater part of every sitting throughout an entire session, to the curtailment of the rights and opportunities of all his fellow-members, and the deprivation of all the constituencies other than his own of their due representation. The rights of the House are sacrificed to and by one member, whenever a speech is made, not bonâ fide for the advancement of the business of the country, but to discredit Ministers, the Parliament, or a party, or to serve some personal end. Such conduct is always unpatriotic, disloyal to Parliament, and harmful to parliamentary institutions. The parliamentary machine, like many other magnificent pieces of machinery, if injured in a slight and apparently insignificant part, may temporarily, at all events, be paralyzed. Honorable members have only to discuss to-day what cannot be done until to-morrow, or what ought to have been done yesterday, and year after year may go by without the enactment of a single piece of legislation. They have but to insist always on considering that matter of most importance which is not regularly before the House, and cannot then be dealt with, or dealt with only in an unsatisfactory and incomplete fashion, to absolutely destroy its usefulness.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Is it wise to give this advice?

Mr. WILKS. — It only provokes discussion.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly. We sit silent, and are told that it is a conspiracy of silence; if we speak, that we provoke discussion. Hit high or hit low, our blows are delivered always at the wrong place and at the wrong time. I am not going to discuss to-day what I shall probably have to discuss next week, or at all events very soon, because to do so would be to pursue the course which I am condemning. The speech of the honorable member for Parramatta was merely the ebullition of his personal feeling, profitless to those who listened to it, and without a tittle of advantage to the business before us. He cannot pretend that anything he said during more than an hour will advance in the slightest degree either of the proposals with which he dealt. He spoke of the seriousness of parliamentary business, but must have had his tongue in his cheek while he did so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has my honorable and learned friend ever known a course like this to be taken before on a matter of this kind?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Never.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No course has been taken which is not in consonance with the ordinary procedure of Parliament, so far as Ministers are concerned. We put business before the House every day, but have to listen day after day to the discussion of the impractical, the impossible, and the unsuitable. Honorable members debate some questions which are of public interest, but only when they cannot be dealt with, and thus cause an absolute stoppage of the transaction of business.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable and learned gentleman say why he did not propose this motion to-day, as is usual?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not know that course is usual. I expressly asked the honorable member for Gippsland to take twenty-four hours to reconsider his action, and waited until the last moment this morning to give him every chance to intimate to me that he had changed his intention. As he did not, I then gave notice of motion in the ordinary way. I do not propose to detain the Committee any further. I have exposed the true character of this debate, which has intruded upon another debate in itself sufficiently extensive in its scope to permit honorable members to discuss matters at large if they so desire. Whether they continue to do so or not will rest with themselves; but to speak of the seriousness of parliamentary business, and at the same time to turn the whole of its proceedings into a jest—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether the Prime Minister is in order in describing the proceedings of the Committee as a jest.

The CHAIRMAN.—I did not hear the remark of the Prime Minister, because I was engaged with the Clerk. Do I understand that the Prime Minister said that the proceedings of the Committee were a jest?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I said that the proceedings were turned into a jest by the speech of the honorable member; and that was what I meant.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister did not say that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Then I say it now. The honorable member for Parramatta, who is acting as the leader of one of the parties in the House, has purposely intervened in the serious business of the country in a frivolous and resultless way, for the purpose of airing personal opinions upon subjects which can only be dealt with when they are properly brought before the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—To what personal opinions does the honorable member refer?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Those having reference to the two motions which are likely to be brought forward, one relating to the resignation of an honorable member from the Standing Orders Committee, and another relating to the adoption of a new standing order. These matters must be brought forward, and must be dealt with. The honorable member's duty will possibly demand that he shall discuss them, and then he can only do so by repeating once more what he has said to-day. His remarks on this occasion have been absolutely resultless. They involved a waste of the time of a Parliament with a congested business-paper, which can only be cleared by the assistance of the majority of honorable members, including those opposite. It is not possible for any Ministry to force business upon an unwilling Chamber, but there should be nothing to prevent its being thoughtfully, deliberately, and carefully considered. As the result, however, of proceedings such as those for which the honorable member for Parramatta is responsible, our business will probably be compressed into a short space at the close of the session, when it will have to be dealt with hastily, and under circumstances much less favorable to its proper consideration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister is seeking to crush out the strength of the House in order to do what he wants.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No proposal of that kind has been made, and it is absolutely ridiculous to suggest that we are doing that or invading the privileges of Parliament, or using coercion. Even if it were proposed to make a permanent rule as to a quorum, instead of a rule optional under certain circumstances, the new standing order could not prevent any honorable member of this Chamber from addressing Parliament from January 1 to December 31 without stopping, if he were physically capable of doing so. The only object is to conserve the liberty of members, when they believe that time is being wantonly and wickedly wasted, so that they may devote themselves to some better occupation than listening to meaningless speeches in the Chamber.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I desire to know whether the Prime Minister is in order in accusing the Opposition of a wanton and wicked waste of time?

The CHAIRMAN.—The words used by the Prime Minister did not, in my opinion, apply to any particular body in this Chamber.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the Prime Minister say that an honorable member's presence at the bar or in the billiard-room, constitutes attendance in this Chamber?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member has never seen me at the bar. I do not need to exculpate other honorable members, but say in reply to the imputation conveyed by the honorable and learned member that a more temperate and sober body of men never existed in any Parliament. It is perfectly well known that an interjection such as that made by the honorable and learned member will be taken up, distorted and misrepresented, as the opinion of one speaking with knowledge. The honorable and learned member should know that his references made to billiard-rooms are misleading.

Mr. CONROY.—And card-rooms.

Mr. DEAKIN.—And card-rooms, if there are any. I do not know of any, and I have been in this Parliament from the beginning. All these references, so far as my knowledge goes, convey an impression which is absolutely incorrect. To my knowledge no honorable members are ever found in the refreshment-rooms, except at meal times. If they were as much patronized as the honorable and learned member's interjection suggests, there would be no necessity for the provision made upon the Estimates for that institution. I have said as much as is necessary at this stage, and hope that the Committee will, after this futile and purposeless waste of time, return to the business of the country.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I wish to make a personal explanation, which seems to me to have been rendered necessary by the remarks of the Prime Minister. I have not uttered one word against either the billiard-room or the chess-table. I agree with the Prime Minister that there is no more sober body of men in the world than the members of this Parliament. I have repeatedly stated that outside, and I deeply regret that anything should have been said calculated to convey any other impression. I am not one of those who believe that billiard-rooms and chess-tables are improper things. I believe that they afford forms of recreation which are very necessary in connexion with a Parliament of this kind. The whole point of my reference to them was that I objected to our providing in the rules of procedure of this House that attendance at such places was to be accounted as attendance upon the serious business of legislation in a deliberative Chamber.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I do not intend to discuss this matter at present. I merely desire to direct attention to a remark made by the honorable member for Parramatta, which I think he will have the manliness to withdraw. He stated that I had taken a certain course, with the express object of turning this Parliament into a social club, where there is nothing to be done but play billiards or chess.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What I did say was that the honorable member had taken a course which seemed to indicate that attendance at a social club was equivalent to attendance on the serious business of Parliament.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa). — In reply to the Prime Minister's remarks, I wish to say that if I happen to visit the refreshment-room in order to obtain a drink, I will not have it recorded that whilst I am there I am present in this House attending to the serious business of legislation. Similarly, if I am engaged in a game of billiards or of chess, I decline to permit it to go forth to the public that I am present in this Chamber discharging my legislative functions. It is most unjust to bring forward a proposal which would have that effect. I will not take my pleasure and be a hypocrite over it.

Motion negatived.

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I wish to thank the Committee very much for their kind indulgence to myself. When I discontinued my remarks I was attempting to illustrate the present attitude of the Treasurer by a reference to one of Dickens' characters. That particular functionary endeavoured to impress upon his victims that they ought not to snivel at the prospect of their execution. The Treasurer does not wish us to snivel even when we consider that the best interests of the Commonwealth are in danger. I would also remind the readers of Dickens that when that functionary himself was to be executed, he suffered even a greater collapse than did the Treasurer when he had to leave office. When he was taunted by a fellow criminal with inconsistency, and was reminded that he had been accustomed to declare that it was rather a jolly thing to be executed, he replied—"I ain't inconsistent. I was the hangman then. If I were the hangman now, I would say the same thing again." Similarly, if the right honorable member for Swan were in opposition, he would say of our friends in the Labour corner what he said of them last year when he was in opposition. But coming to a more serious aspect of the matter, even at the risk of being accused of snivelling, I have no hesitation in saying that the present position of affairs in this Parliament is one of the most grave that I can possibly conceive. I have not the slightest objection to any of my honorable friends upon the Treasury bench. If they had a sufficient number of honorable members behind them, holding the same views as themselves, they would have my support. Even if my honorable friends in the Labour corner occupied the Treasury bench, I should not consider that the position was so serious, because they would then be saddled with responsibility in proportion to their power. But what I consider threatens the best interests of the country, is the fact that the honorable members who occupy the corner benches—towards every one of whom I entertain nothing but the most friendly feelings—possess supreme power without any responsibility whatever. I venture to say that if they were in office they would not attempt—and even if they did, they would not succeed—to pass some of the legislation which has been taken up by the present Government at their dictation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—To what legislation does the honorable member refer?

Mr. McLEAN.—If the right honorable gentleman will restrain his youthful impetuosity I will tell him. I have already pointed out the serious consequences which will ensue if we allow the Braddon section of our Constitution to lapse before any provision is made for taking over the States debts, and thus hypothecating the large revenue of the Commonwealth. In my opinion that matter in itself is sufficient to endanger the financial position of the Commonwealth. I consider that the clause relating to the union label which has been inserted in the Trade Marks Bill at the dictation of the Labour Party—

Mr. WATSON.—I can assure the honorable member that there was no dictation on our part.

Mr. McLEAN. — My honorable friend knows that that provision was inserted in deference to his views.

Mr. WATSON.—It was quite a voluntary act on the part of the Ministry.

Mr. McLEAN.—If that clause be carried it will create a condition of things in Australia bordering upon civil war, and will stop very little short of that if it stops short at all. Again, in the Manufactures Encouragement Bill members of the Labour Party are not content with a measure which was framed in the interests of the whole people, and more particularly in the interests of the workers. They are not satisfied with the Bill, which was brought down by the right honorable member for Adelaide, who is one of the best friends of labour that Australia possesses. Instead, they have compelled the Government to insert in that measure a special clause conferring special privileges upon the class which they represent. These are important provisions which have been inserted at the dictation of my honorable friends in the Labour corner, and which are probably indicative of many others to come. The present position of the Government reminds me very forcibly of a mine which is being worked upon tribute. Honorable members know that when mine-owners are unable to work a mine or are unwilling to risk their capital in it, they frequently let it upon tribute. That is to say, the persons who work it give them a proportion of the gold which they derive from it. My honorable friends who occupy the corner benches are not now in power. To their credit, be it said, they place the interests of those who sent them here, before their own personal interests. They are content to allow the Government the prestige and emoluments of office provided that the latter do their work for them. In other words, the Ministry are carrying on the government of the Commonwealth upon a system of tribute. In effect they say to members of the Labour Party, "If you will keep us in office we will do your work. We will insert a special clause in any Bill in the interests of the particular class which you represent." I consider that such a condition of affairs is a very serious one.

Mr. WATSON.—It would be serious, if it existed.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Treasurer endeavoured to prove by statistics that any apprehension on our part was absolutely groundless. But his attempt to do so was rather a clumsy one. I felt particularly edified and amused when he was quoting Coghlan with a view to proving that there were no grounds whatever for any of the slanders which have been levelled against the public acts of public men, and that everything was prosperous. It was really refreshing to watch my honorable friends in the Ministerial corner as the right honorable gentleman spoke. I was looking at them all the time. They were drinking in every sentence that he uttered in reference to this point, and, as if their ears were not sufficient to catch every word that he said, they had their mouths wide open, like a row of letter-boxes. "I thought that Australia was being ruined by Socialism." "I was under the impression that this state of prosperity was not possible in the present condition of politics." Such interjections as these were frequent. My right honorable friend was very astute. In quoting his statistics, he divided them into two parts, and dovetailed a few remarks on the Budget between the first and the second set. If he had submitted the two sets together, I do not think we should have seen so much jubilation as we did in the Ministerial corner, because no one could have furnished more destructive proof of his contention than was supplied by his own statistics. What did he prove? He proved by quotations from Coghlan that which we all know — that Australia has marvellous resources, and, given good seasons, has immense recuperative powers. Speaking from memory, and, therefore, subject to correction, I believe he said that one individual in the Commonwealth could produce as much wealth as could three in Great Britain, Germany, or Austria, two in France, or one and a half in the United States. This statement was cheered to the echo by honorable members in the Ministerial corner.

Mr. WATSON.—The worker could always earn that amount of wealth, but we do not say that he always gets it.

Mr. McLEAN.—What did the other set of statistics quoted by the Treasurer show? They showed that, in spite of our unparalleled advantages, and of the immense possibilities of wealth production in Australia, we have failed not only to attract population to our shores, but to keep that which we have had here. The right honorable member went on to show that there is more idle money in our banks to-day than at any other period in our history. He proved that, notwithstanding Australia's marvellous resources of natural wealth, and the splendid opportunities for investment in industrial enterprises, the owners of all this money continue to allow it to remain idle; and that those who should have been employed by its investment in our industrial enterprises, are leaving our shores in search of work. That is all that his statistics proved. They reminded me of the lines from Lalla Rookh, wherein the Veiled Prophet, drawing back his silver veil, and for the first time revealing his hideous countenance to the maid whom he has been tormenting, calls upon her to look and see—

... if hell, with all its power to damn,
Can add one curse to the foul thing I am.

The most bitter detractors of our honorable friends in the Ministerial corner could not have offered us more destructive proof of the effect of their influence on the Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What was the honorable member doing all the time he was in office?

Mr. McLEAN.—I was doing the work of the country, instead of strutting about in gold lace and brass buttons. My right honorable friend referred to the intention of the Government to seek to attract population to our shores.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have not had a chance. When I spoke we had been in office only six weeks.

Mr. McLEAN.—I did not hear the Treasurer say that the Government intended to pull down the slip-rails to let immigrants in.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did not the Government of which the honorable member was a member pull them down?

Mr. McLEAN.—If we had been given an opportunity we should have submitted to the country a proposal to do so.

Mr. WATSON.—After a six months' recess the honorable member's Government simply came down to the House with a proposal to amend the Standing Orders.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Treasurer should have told us how the immigrants to be attracted to our shores could land in Australia. He knows that a former Government of which he was a member accepted a clause in the Immigration Restriction Bill which prevents unskilled labour from coming into Australia under contract. There was another clause in the same Bill which prevented any person coming in who might be a charge upon the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member was in favour of that.

Mr. McLEAN.—I was, because it was not an unusual provision; but I was bitterly opposed to the first-named clause. I was prepared to concede that which the honorable member for Bland first said he desired to get. If he desired only to prevent men being brought into the country to take the place of others on strike, I should go with him so far as was necessary to guard against such a contingency; or if he said that the desire of his party was merely to prevent men coming into the country to accept lower rates of wages than those prevailing in Australia, or to remove any other disability, I should also be with him.

Mr. WATSON.—Then we may be able to meet the honorable member.

Mr. McLEAN.—But, subject to these conditions, I say that to prevent a man coming into the Commonwealth under contract is really to prevent immigration. If a man who was without means, and had only his labour to offer, sought to land in Australia, he might be challenged on the ground that he might become a charge upon the people. On the other hand, if such a man took the precaution to guard against becoming a charge on the people by bespeaking employment—and that is the best class of immigration we can have—he would, under the contract section of the Immigration Restriction Act, be prevented from landing.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Did the honorable member oppose that provision?

Mr. McLEAN.—I went to the Minister in charge of the Bill as soon as the clause was submitted, and asked him what it meant. He replied that it was merely designed to prevent men being brought into the Commonwealth to take the place of others on strike; but when I had considered the provision, and discovered its real meaning, I denounced it as strongly as I could, in the House, and also in the country.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is a pity that the honorable member's Government did not seek to repeal it if he was opposed to it.

Mr. McLEAN.—Had we remained in office we should have referred it to the country. We could not hope to repeal it in a House that was largely committed to the principle. I have no further observations to offer, but commend these few points to the Treasurer, in the hope that he will profit by their consideration.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—The Budget which has been submitted by the Treasurer appears to be so satisfactory to Ministers that not one of them has thought it necessary to speak to the question. So far, criticism of it has come solely from this side of the Chamber. The matter is one of such moment that it should be thoroughly and carefully considered. There are a few matters on which I should have liked the Treasurer to give us a little more light. For instance, on the first page we find agricultural products coupled with groceries. I should have preferred the right honorable gentleman to separate the items, and let us know exactly what revenue he expects to receive from the duties on agricultural produce. When agricultural produce is coupled with groceries in the Budget, we cannot form an idea as to what quantity of the former is coming into the Commonwealth. We know that from New Zealand we receive oats and other articles. I should like to know what trade in agricultural produce it is doing with Australia. I notice that the great bulk of the criticism from this side has been directed against the sugar bounty. This is one matter in respect to which the Ministry has defined its attitude. It intends to extend the sugar bounty for a period of five years. I sympathize with the interjection of the honorable member for Maranoa, that the kanakas came here under contract. The most trying time in the history of the sugar industry will be at the end of 1906, when the kanakas will be deported. In my opinion the Government is justified in extending the bounty for a period of five years.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—How many kanakas are employed in New South Wales?

Mr. LEE.—Very few. I am pleased to say that in New South Wales the farmers are able to grow sugar with white labour, although I understand that some 2,000 acres are being cultivated with black labour. When the leader of the Opposition was in the Clarence River district, he was informed by a farmer that he preferred to grow sugar under black labour conditions, rather than to receive a bounty. The claim that the Commonwealth is placing a great sum in the hands of the farmers who use white labour is moonshine. If we believe in the policy of a White Australia, we have a perfect right to show our loyalty by giving this bounty to the farmers, so long as a black man is employed in the sugar industry at wages lower than those paid to white men.

Mr. TUDOR.—Then the honorable member would perpetuate the bounty as long as a black man was employed?

Mr. LEE.—I would not, because during the period of five years there will be an over-production of sugar, both the bounty and the Excise duty will become things of the past, and the industry will have to compete with the sugar grown by black labour elsewhere. That is a point which we ought to remember. The revenue from the import duty on sugar is about £90,000 a year. A representative of Victoria was crying out the other day that it is receiving £100,000 a year less from sugar duties than it did under its old Tariff. That is one of the results of Federation. Victoria has not cried out about the way in which she is flooding the markets of other States, such as Queensland and Tasmania, with the products of its factories built up by means of protective duties. The estimated revenue from the Customs duty on sugar this year is £90,000. As the years roll on the revenue from this source gets smaller and smaller, and the time is very near when the import duty of £6 a ton will be inoperative. When that time arrives, there will be no necessity for granting a bounty, and the Excise duty will have to go, because it would be unfair to ask for Excise duty when the import duty was inoperative. Our sugar-growers will then have to face the markets of the world. When the honorable member for New England was speaking with much warmth about the employment of coloured labour, he forgot to mention that the Treasurer will receive £514,500 from the Excise duty on sugar. If we deduct the bounty of £146,000 we shall get a balance of £368,500. Despite the Treasurer's brilliant account of the resources of this country, which we know are very great, the revenue is growing smaller and smaller every year. I notice that the estimated revenue for this year is £357,920 less than the actual revenue for the previous year. If the bounty be abolished the Excise duty will have to be repealed, and that represents a sum of £368,500 more than what the bounty cost. In that case, the Commonwealth will return to the States £726,420 less than it did in the previous year. We should consider very seriously how the revenue will be affected. I agree with the remarks of the honorable member for Gippsland on this subject. I can see that his idea regarding the bounty is a very good one, because it is only a matter of time when both the bounty and the Excise duty will vanish, and, owing to the large production, sugar-growers will have to compete in the markets of the world. I am sorry to see that the Treasurer is asking for such a small sum for the purposes of defence. When we come to consider how extensive and wealthy Australia is, and what it has done for its people, I think we should be prepared to vote money for defending its shores. The sum placed on the Estimates is not adequate for that purpose. The Treasurer had no warrant for saying that he could not get more money voted, because we shall return to the States £400,000 more than we are obliged to. He would have been quite justified in asking for a larger vote for the military service. I take a very deep interest in the rifle clubs. The members of rifle clubs are not paid for their services, but they have sufficient patriotism to take up arms and devote a great deal of leisure to training. When the Government find a class of men willing to bear arms in this way, the very least it should do is to give them a little encouragement. The paltry sum of £600, which is set down for rifle clubs in New South Wales, is altogether inadequate. That sum will be required to put some of the ranges in proper order. All that the military authorities—whom I propose to discuss when the military estimates are submitted—think they have to do is to put down a range, no matter how it is constituted, and give the men a target. They seem to think that that is good enough for the people in the country. In Kempsey, where there is a splendid rifle club, a range has been formed. I was there a few months ago. There are logs across the range, and it is impossible to lie upon the mounds for firing purposes. Furthermore, a rifleman has to wait two and a half hours for a shot. That is how the military spirit is being encouraged in this country. Instead of £600, the Government would be justified in giving the rifle clubs £6,000. It is not necessary to go to New South Wales to see how they are being neglected. One has only to run down to the Williamstown range and look at it. Its condition is simply disgraceful. The Victorian Rifle Association has to find all the money to keep that range in order, without receiving one fraction from the Commonwealth. It is time these matters were looked into. The military vote for New South Wales is £169,736. The amount for the permanent forces is £70,766. There are 505 officers and men to be paid, leaving for other military purposes £98,960. No efforts seem to be made to encourage people who are willing to take a part in the defence of the country to do so. Some time ago efforts were made to establish an artillery battery on the Clarence River. We have no means of defence between Newcastle and Brisbane. Men were willing to give their services, but they were refused because it was said we could not afford the expense. Yet the Treasurer proposes to give back to the States £400,000 more than the three-fourths which we are obliged to pay back to them. I consider that the Government ought to be more liberal in dealing with the defence of the country. No doubt the higher paid officers are properly treated; but I am speaking in the interests of the rank and file—the men to whom we shall have to look if ever the time comes when we shall have to defend our shores.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Hear, hear.

MR. LEE.—I hear the voice of the Postmaster-General, and I compliment him on the satisfactory state of his Department. But he also might be a little more liberal in his treatment of settlers in the back-blocks who are asking for a postal service, with a delivery once a week. I trust that when these facilities are asked for, the answer will not be that the Government have not funds available for extending the advantages of civilization to people who enjoy so few of them. I am of opinion that the Budget was ably placed before us by the Treasurer. The Estimates have been criticised from many stand-points, and the criticism has been fair. I trust that when they are discussed in detail, those honorable members who have remained so silent at this stage will have something to say in the interests of the various States. It is said that we have tried to "stone-wall," and have prevented business from being expedited. I venture to say that the time which has been spent in this debate has been well employed. In the States Parliaments, Budget debates are protracted to a much greater extent than ours has been. In New South Wales, Budgets have been discussed for three weeks. In all the States, such debates are lengthy. We have to consider the affairs of six States. I think that the time has been well spent, and that the Government have no cause of complaint. In criticising these matters we, who are members of the Opposition, think that we have only done our duty, and we intend to continue to do it fearlessly. We are determined to criticise wherever we think criticism is necessary, and in so doing we believe that we shall be acting in the best interests of our States and of the Commonwealth.

MR. SKENE (Grampians).—The right honorable the Treasurer has come in for a good deal of criticism in regard to his first Budget. It was not, I think, to be expected that, coming into office suddenly, as he did, he would be able to follow in the footsteps of the ex-Treasurer in displaying the facility for handling the figures of the Commonwealth that the right honorable member for Balaclava has always shown. I have heard that it takes three generations to make a Lombardy olive-pruner; and I should say that it would require several attempts for any one to excel, as the late Treasurer did, in bringing forward his account of the financial affairs of the Commonwealth. We have had a great mass of figures put before us. It appears to me that the details are too numerous. To establish at once a close connexion between the speech of the Minister delivering the Budget and the mass of figures presented in the papers, must involve a great deal of work. In fact, the right honorable gentleman, in the position which he occupies, reminds me of a story of Mark Twain, related in his Innocents at Home. Mark Twain after giving an account of his experiences in the crater of a volcano somewhere in the Sandwich Islands, where he said the smell of brimstone was very strong, but not unpleasant to a sinner, went on to relate how in the course of his journey he arrived at an island where he found the natives engaged in an amusement somewhat resembling water tobogganning. They went through the breakers into the sea, holding in their hands pieces of board, somewhat of the shape of the copies of the Estimates which have been placed before us, we may suppose. A native enjoying this amusement would put his board on the top of an incoming wave, and by that method glide in with much pleasure to himself. But when Mark Twain tried the same experiment, he got out all right up to the point when he had his bit of board on to the top of a wave, but he missed the connexion, with rather disastrous results, and was only brought to shore by means of the assistance of friendly natives. I think the Treasurer may regard the honorable members who have been criticising his Budget as "friendly natives," who have been trying to assist him.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—They were trying to drown him.

Mr. SKENE.—Oh, no; I am sure they were trying to help him. Their desire is to see him clothed and in his right mind again." Within this labyrinth of figures, there is one matter which strikes me more forcibly than anything else, and that is that the Treasurer seems to be of opinion that if we go on as we are doing, we shall soon have to make some financial rearrangement. In fact, he seems to think that, so far as the Commonwealth is concerned, we are on the high road to bankruptcy. He has told us that last year the States received back from the Commonwealth £734,277 over their three-fourths. The estimate for the present year is that they will receive only £499,170 over their three-fourths. That is rather a serious matter. In one way it indicates that the results which were expected from our Tariff have not been so disappointing to the Protectionist Party as is sometimes represented, because that decreasing revenue must show that industries within the country are prospering.

Mr. MAUGER.—That does not follow.

Mr. SKENE. — In what way does it not?

Mr. MAUGER.—Very often a high Tariff will bring in more revenue, and at the same time be more effective in a protectionist sense, than a low Tariff.

Mr. SKENE.—That may be; but certainly the figures show that the Tariff has not had the effect of diminishing our industries, or of dwarfing them. The view which I take of economics may be different from that taken by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. I refer to this, merely in order to show that when the anomalies in the Tariff—and I grant that there are anomalies—are rectified, as I hope they will be, the result will not be to increase the revenue, but rather the contrary. The position which has been placed before us by the Treasurer will be accentuated. The revenue will be still further decreased, and the States will have to look elsewhere for funds.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The whole falling off in the revenue has been on fodder and sugar.

Mr. SKENE.—The Treasurer put forward a suggestion, though I think only incidentally, that it might be wise not to re-enact the Braddon section. If that course were adopted, we might begin a method of financing which was characterized some years ago in Victoria as dipping into the public purse in a "free, easy, and accessible manner." This would make the position very difficult, because the States have been deprived of the power of indirect taxation, which is the least objectionable system from the people's point of view, simply because the effect cannot at once be seen.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Government have not suggested that the Braddon section shall not be re-enacted.

Mr. SKENE.—As I have said, I believe that that was only an incidental suggestion on the part of the Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not make that suggestion; what I said was that another plan might be found of dealing fairly with the States.

Mr. SKENE.—At the present time the States have a firm hand on the Commonwealth, and I understand that the Treasurer's suggestion is that the finances should be placed practically within the control of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Mr. MAUGER.—Cannot the honorable member for Grampians trust himself as a representative?

Mr. SKENE.—There are a great many men whom I would trust individually, but who, acting in a body, might proceed in a slipshod sort of way, of which I could not approve.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is nothing in my speech that is adverse to the States.

Mr. SKENE.—What was suggested would, it appears to me, be adverse to the States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What I said was that I did not see that much good could result to the States by extending the duration of the Braddon section, and that I thought we might help them better in another way.

Mr. SKENE.—When the Treasurer proposes that other way, no doubt he will be able to get the States to agree; but he will have to show that it is also the better way.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Exactly.

Mr. SKENE.—As to the question of defence, I am sure that honorable members, on whichever side of the House they may sit, must have been pleased with the masterly speech of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Some people seem to think that that gentleman introduced more matter than was necessary, having regard to his former position as Minister of Defence; but it is not always that we have the advantage of hearing a gentleman who can speak, not only as an ex-Minister, but also to a limited extent—I do not wish to flatter him by saying more—as an expert. I agree with the honorable and learned member as to the expenditure that is necessary, because I think that up to the present we have been rather playing with the question. There is no doubt that we shall have to tackle the matter in the way indicated by the honorable and learned member for Corinella; and we might even go further, and borrow £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 if that step should be shown to be necessary to place the defences on a proper footing.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Rather wipe out the whole business first!

Mr. MAUGER.—When once a Government starts borrowing, it does not know when to stop.

Mr. PAGE.—The States have borrowed enough already.

Mr. SKENE.—At the same time, if we are to have coastal defences, flotillas of torpedo boats, and so forth, as indicated by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, something will have to be done to provide the £800,000 or so which is estimated to be necessary.

Mr. WATSON.—We are spending £200,000 a year already on the naval subsidy.

Mr. SKENE.—But if we do no more, some Power may come in and render it unnecessary for us to make even that contribution.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—It will take Japan and Russia fifty years to recuperate.

Mr. SKENE.—At the same time, we shall have to make a beginning with an adequate defence expenditure. Unlike other British Possessions, and other countries of the world, we are in the happy position of never having had to engage in a war, not even a native war. We have been specially favoured in that respect; and any money we provide now will be for new expenditure incurred in anticipation of difficulties, rather than to meet indebtedness contracted in the past. We can, therefore, I think, afford to be fairly liberal, and I have a suggestion to make which, if acted upon, would be the means of meeting the interest on any money borrowed for the purposes of defence. A great deal has been said about the Swiss system, which is referred to by nearly every one who addresses himself to the question of a civilian army. One feature of the Swiss system, however, has, I think, not yet been considered. We have become somewhat familiarized with the idea that all citizens should serve in the defence of the country; but Switzerland goes a step further, and makes the men who do not serve pay a certain amount yearly towards the expense of the army.

Mr. WATSON.—If a man in Switzerland is rejected from any cause, he has to pay an exemption tax.

Mr. PAGE.—Even if he be medically unfit?

Mr. SKENE.—I should not go so far as to say that, but if a man is not called upon to serve, he has to pay an exemption tax. Of course, it may be reasonable to say that such a system would press rather hardly on the poor man.

Mr. PAGE.—It would be a God-send to some poor men, because, at any rate, they would get good square meals when serving.

Mr. SKENE.—All the members of a civilian army ought to be on the same footing, and a slight tax, such as I have mentioned, would affect all equally. If it be contended that the wealthier classes should contribute in proportion to their possessions, they might be called upon to contribute to the general system of taxation by means of some other tax. On the sum of £1,000,000, borrowed for the purpose of putting our defences on a proper footing, the interest, at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., would amount to only £35,000; and, if each of the 900,000 male voters in the Commonwealth contributed one shilling yearly, the result would be £45,000, or £10,000 more than as required for the interest. A small tax of that kind would amount to no more than the price of a voter's right.

Mr. PAGE.—If I went to my electors and advocated borrowing £800,000 for military purposes, they would shove me into a lunatic asylum.

Mr. SKENE.—Does the honorable member think that the suggested contribution of one shilling each man is unreasonable?

Mr. PAGE.—I do not think so, but my electors would think so, in view of the taxation they already bear.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—This money would be for unproductive work.

Mr. SKENE.—I would point out to the honorable member that such a fund must be regarded in the light of insurance. There is another matter to which I should like to refer, and that is the settlement of people on the land. I am sure the Treasurer will not think that I am "stone-walling" in ventilating such views as occur to me on the subjects dealt with in his Budget speech. I am rather inclined to think that assisted immigration is not quite the best way to begin with. There is one way of encouraging people to come here which I should like to see tried before any attempt is made to introduce immigrants, who would have only their own work to depend on. The Treasurer and other honorable members have referred to the Canadian grants of land. These are all very well if you have good land to grant; but when the best lands have passed out of the hands of the Government, the poorer lands left are not such as would attract people from distant countries. I think that the proposal put forward in Victoria under the Closer Settlement Act for financing people on small blocks of land is likely to bear good fruit. I believe that it is likely also to be adopted shortly in New South Wales, because I see that the Minister of Lands in that State has made a similar suggestion, without being aware that the proposal had already been adopted in Victoria. I have always endeavoured to show my friends of the State House of Parliament in Victoria that the system of buying large estates and cutting them up for small settlers is not the most advantageous method of securing settlement. Under the plan now adopted, the whole of the lands of the State are practically thrown open for selection, and arrangement is made for a bargain between the man who has some capital and desires a piece of land, and the man who has the land, with the State Government as umpire to see that the buyer does not pay too much for the land. Under section 6 of the new Victorian Act an agreement can be entered into between buyer and seller with respect to land in any part of the country, and if the Government confirm the agreement, they will make an advance on the land in the same way as they would in the case of a settler taking up a portion of a re-purchased estate. If it were generally known that it is possible to get land in Australia in that way it might attract men possessing some small capital, and a desire to better themselves by coming to what is not now the uncivilized country that Australia was when my parents came here sixty-five years ago. If it were made known to intending emigrants that all that would be required of them would be that they should have a certain amount of capital necessary to purchase a working plant and make a start, and that they would require to pay only  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. interest on the valuation of the land, with  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. towards a sinking fund, I believe that many would be induced to emigrate to Australia to take advantage of such conditions.

Mr. SKENE.—About £300.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Where could he get the land?

Mr. SKENE.—Under the scheme to which I referred he could get it anywhere.

Mr. PAGE.—There are more people in the old country without £300 who wish to emigrate than there are of intending emigrants who possess that sum.

Mr. SKENE.—I see some disadvantages in inducing people to come out here who have not sufficient capital to make a start on the land. I believe that the scheme to which I refer would do good in providing employment for people who are here already. The principal objection raised to the scheme is not, in my opinion, a strong objection. It is contended that it might lead to owners of land putting too high a value on their land, but I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think that would follow.

Mr. CONROY.—I understand that the State must be satisfied that the land is of the value set upon it.

Mr. SKENE.—That is so. The condition of affairs with respect to large landed estates has altered very much within the last ten or fifteen years. Fifteen years ago, men in Melbourne engaged in business, and making a little money, were nearly all under the impression that they must have a landed estate somewhere. Their competition for land had then to be taken into account, but it has since entirely disappeared, and a cash purchaser for a large landed estate is hardly to be found in Victoria at the present time. The State Government is now practically the only cash purchaser for these properties. One great advantage which has followed the many discussions of the subject is that the State Government, instead of asking land-owners to take Government debentures for their land, now offer hard cash for it, and in this way they are in a position to buy land cheaper than any one else. If the people in the old country were made to realize what can be done in this way, I believe we should have many of them coming here. I am glad to see that a movement in this direction has already been made by Mr. Taverner, the Agent-General for Victoria. He has written to the State Government, suggesting the placing at his disposal of some areas of land to assist him in inducing families in the old country to take advantage of the new scheme.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—At any rate, it would help to keep those we have here.

Mr. SKENE.—It would assist in keeping those we have here. I do not say that it would follow that labourers could not be introduced from the old country under this scheme, but I am afraid that the Immigration Restriction Act would not be found to work well in conjunction with the scheme. But for the operation of that Act, I believe that under such a scheme farmers coming to Australia from the old country with a little capital would be able to introduce a number of labourers who would be glad to come out, if they knew that when here they could find work on the farms of men with whom they were acquainted in the old country.

Mr. CONROY.—Is there a limitation as to the value of land under the Victorian scheme?

Mr. SKENE.—Yes; at present, the limitation is £1,500 in value; but I am under the impression that the members of the Land Purchase Board are satisfied that in some parts of the country that is not a sufficiently high amount, and I should not be surprised to see it increased to £2,000. However, that is a matter of detail, and I have referred to the general principle. I do not propose to touch on the question of the transfer of States debts. Many schemes on the subject have been put before us, and while I have not any of my own to suggest, I say that the question is one which should be tackled as early as possible. The longer its settlement is delayed the greater will be the difficulty, and some reasonable scheme should be brought into operation as soon as possible. A matter that has not, so far, been touched upon is that of the control of the railways. I think it is probable that this will be found to be even a more troublesome question than that of the transfer of States debts. Speaking for Victoria, I am able to say that there is a strong disposition in this State to believe that it would be practically impossible for the Federal Government to manage the railways. I am of opinion that the railways of Australia cannot be properly managed from one centre. Referring again to Switzerland, it has occurred to me, without going further than the outer edge of the subject, that the adoption of another of their methods might probably assist us. While the legislative powers of the Swiss Federal Government are very large, its administrative powers are not so great, being left to the Cantons. The feeling in Victoria is very strongly against the taking over of the railways by the Commonwealth, but I do not think we shall have full and effective Federation until we have taken over, not only the debts of the States, but the railways; and possibly we might adopt to our mutual advantage a system under which the financing of the railways would be left to the Commonwealth, and their administration to the States as at present. I shall not anticipate the report of the Old-Age Pensions Commission, but, no doubt, the subject into which it is inquiring is one which we shall have to consider very closely from several points of view. I think that something might be done by the encouragement of thrift in the community to make the public burden less than it would otherwise be. I have referred to the English Royal Commission of 1892, and Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion that individual contributions to benefit or insurance societies might be supplemented by Government grants of equal amount on the individual attaining the age of sixty, or sixty-five years. While I was in Sydney the other day, I met a Mr. Luard-Pattison, who was secretary to Lord Dufferin, when Governor-General of Canada, and is now manager for Lord Iveagh, who has done so much for the better housing of the poor in England, from whom I obtained some very interesting information on this subject. Unfortunately, he was on the point of leaving Australia, so that I could not get him to give evidence before the Royal Commission; but he told me that in 1896, or in 1897, he wrote a letter to the Times, headed "A Voluntary Old-age System," in which he suggested a certain method for assisting people to provide for their old age. I have looked through Palmer's Guide to the Times, and have been helped by the Parliamentary Librarian, but I have not been able to find the letter. Speaking from memory, the system as described to me by Mr. Pattison was that, when any person had been in the employment of another for a period of a year, and had contributed to a sick pay insurance fund for the same period, the employer should buy for him, by a contribution of an equal amount to an insurance or benefit society, or in some similar way, a portion of an annuity, to mature at a certain age. If the workman went to a second employer, that employer at the end of the year would have to do the same. These payments were not to be made to the workman himself, but to go to his credit, until, at the age of sixty or sixty-five, or whatever might be the time fixed upon, the annuity would mature, and become payable. If we can encourage men to do something for themselves in their younger years, it will be of great assistance to the Commonwealth in decreasing the amount that would be required from the Government for old-age pensions and charitable assistance. I do not propose to discuss now any of the other questions arising out of the Budget, because I make it a rule to, as far as possible, confine my remarks to subjects which are not touched on by other honorable members. I hope, however, that when the debate is finished we shall settle down to business; and I shall perhaps have a little to say hereafter as the Estimates of the various Departments come before us.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

In view of the time that has been occupied by the debate on the Treasurer's financial statement, and the necessary consideration that was due to honorable members this afternoon, I feel justified in asking for their assistance in bringing to a close the debate on the first item of the Estimates on Tuesday evening next. I understand that only a few more honorable members desire to address the House, and hope that we shall be able next week to make substantial progress with the business which lies before us.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I do not think that we can carry on business at all in the absence of the honorable member for Parramatta, who has been away from his place for some time. I should like to know in what business he is now engaged—whether he is in the billiard-room or the chess-room?

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 3.43 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 5 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition from the Victorian Chamber of Manufactures, protesting against the inclusion of the union label clause in the Trade Marks Bill.

Petition received.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if it is a fact, as stated in the newspapers, that the Government have been considering the Immigration Restriction Act? If it be a fact, will he state to the House whether the Government have decided to repeal or to modify the Act?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Government have been considering the Act, and a number of other matters in connexion with proposals to attract population which we hope to submit, but until those proposals are submitted as a whole I cannot announce them.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAYS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister (1) If the Government are of opinion that the early continuation of the railway from Oodnadatta to or towards Port Darwin is of national and Federal importance? (2) Will the Government be prepared to recommend Parliament to assist the State of South Australia, if asked by its Government, to proceed at an early date with the survey for and subsequent construction of such continuation? (3) Will the Government state what, in their opinion, will be the best method of giving assistance and support to the work referred to?

Mr. DEAKIN.—These are very important questions, deserving the consideration of the people of the Commonwealth. They were placed in my hands by the honorable member in sufficient time to enable me to announce what is and always has been the attitude of the Government on the main principle involved. We consider the construction of this transcontinental line to be a matter of national and Federal importance, because of its commercial usefulness and serviceableness for Defence purposes. The railway would also open up a large area in the interior, which, according to recent reports, offers much more opportunity for profitable development than has hitherto been supposed. Questions 2 and 3 may be answered together. It has lately been suggested that the dividing line between the Northern Territory and South Australia proper might be altered with advantage, and I understand that the extension of the South Australian railway from Oodnadatta to the McDonnell Ranges is in contemplation. This line would reach to a point beyond the present boundary, but not beyond the proposed boundary; and, although of interest to the whole Commonwealth, the extension would be of particular interest only to South Australia. But the further extension through the Northern Territory to Port Darwin would be of national importance, seeing that it would provide an outlet to Torres Straits and the northern seas, and give an advantageous connexion with the whole of the northern coast and countries most easily reached from there. I should, therefore, be inclined to favour any reasonable proposal for assisting the survey of that railway through the Northern Territory with a view to the determination by this Parliament on full information of the wisdom of constructing such a line. At present the Northern Territory is under the control of South Australia. At the very commencement of Federation an offer was made from South Australia to transfer the Northern Territory to the Commonwealth, but after the negotiations had proceeded some few steps that offer was suspended, and has not since been revived. If in connexion with a new proposal for the acquisition of the Northern Territory by the Commonwealth a project for the construction of a railway were submitted by the South Australian Government, it would have the most careful attention of the Government and Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN.—With the alteration of the boundary as suggested? That was one of the points which stopped negotiations.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not know that it stopped negotiations on our side, because to move the border between South Australia and the Northern Territory north to the McDonnell Ranges is in our view a proper alteration.

Mr. MAHON.—In view of the answer just given by the Prime Minister, do the Government propose to consider the proposal to construct a transcontinental railway to Port Darwin until the State of South Australia has carried out the solemn guarantee entered into by it prior to Federation that it would, by an Act of Parliament, authorize the construction of a railway from Port Augusta to the border of Western Australia? Will the Government consider this matter before the Parliament of South Australia has enacted a measure to which two of its Premiers and all of its leading politicians had pledged the State prior to Western Australia entering the Federation?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have been endeavouring to deal with this question solely from a Commonwealth point of view. In my opinion it is of great importance to Australia that there should be railway connexions with the West at Perth, and with the North at Port Darwin, and I hope that the consideration of both projects together will facilitate matters.

Mr. FISHER.—A railway to Port Darwin need not necessarily go through South Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It could go by another route.

INTRODUCTION OF ALIENS.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — Has the Prime Minister read a report by the Governor of South Australia on the necessity of importing the dear coloured brother to develop the resources of the Northern Territory? Does the Prime Minister acquiesce in the Governor's declaration as to his coloured brother? If so, will he recommend that His Excellency be sent to New Guinea so that he may enjoy the society of the coloured brother in the coloured brother's country?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I cannot criticise the relations between a State Governor and Parliament; but the honorable member will do well to recollect that what he has seen is a very condensed and possibly incomplete newspaper account of His Excellency's views.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Will the Prime Minister endeavour to obtain copies of the full report for the information of honorable members?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Will the Prime Minister specially consider the report in relation to the right of State Governors to criticise in detail matters that come within the domain of the Federal authorities?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will obtain the full report, but until I see it shall be unable to admit that it calls for any consideration at our hands.

COMMONWEALTH STATISTICAL BUREAU.

Mr. KELLY.—Last week the Minister of Home Affairs promised to look through the correspondence between the Governments of the States and the Commonwealth Government in regard to the creation of a Commonwealth Statistical Bureau, to see if there was any objection to laying a copy of it on the table. Has the Prime Minister any objection to a copy being laid on the Library table?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I understand that the papers have been looked through, but am not aware whether the Minister has made a selection of them. My honorable colleague will probably be able to give the desired information to the honorable member during the present sitting.

NORTHERN TERRITORY.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I desire to know whether the Prime Minister has received any communication from the South Australian Government since I asked him a question a few days ago with reference to the taking over of Northern Territory by the Commonwealth?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. WILKINSON (for Mr. CROUCH) asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. Can he make a statement as to the present position of the question of Australian silver coinage?

2. Is it not a fact that as long as the settlement of this question is delayed, the Imperial Government is receiving financial advantage which should come to the Commonwealth?

3. Are not the Australian Mints largely paying the expenses of the gold coinage of the Empire, on which there is a loss; whilst the profitable silver coinage is reserved by the Imperial Government at present?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In reply to the honorable member, I beg to state:—

1. The Imperial Government on 10th March last was asked to co-operate with the Commonwealth Government in regard to the withdrawal of the present silver coinage from circulation in Australia, and it was urged upon it that £200,000 per annum of the existing silver circulation should be withdrawn and placed in circulation elsewhere than in Australia, instead of £100,000, as previously stipulated by the Imperial Government. It was also asked to agree to cease the supply now forwarded from the Imperial Mint to other parts of the Empire so as to allow the silver withdrawn in Australia to be transferred there.

2. The Imperial Government does make a considerable profit on the coinage of silver. For the Commonwealth to avail itself of such profit, the gradual withdrawal of present currency from circulation would be necessary.

3. A considerable amount of gold coin is annually exported to Great Britain. During 1903-4 there was a net profit made by New South Wales and Western Australia, in connexion with the Sydney Mint of £7,274 2s. 6d., and Perth Mint of £17,545 3s. There was, however, a net loss sustained by Victoria in connexion with the Melbourne Mint of £335 18s. 9d. At present the Imperial Government replaces all worn gold and silver coin without charge in London.

COMMONWEALTH LABORATORY.

Mr. WILKINSON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Whether, in view of the serious losses that are being suffered by the Commonwealth by the introduction and spreading of animal, insect, and other pests, the Government has taken into consideration the advisability of establishing a bacteriological and entomological laboratory under Federal authority; if not, will the Government take the matter into early consideration?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

The establishment of such a laboratory will be considered when the encouragement of rural industries has been undertaken by the Commonwealth.

MORRIS RIFLE RANGE.

Mr. TUDOR (for Mr. CROUCH) asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. At what expense could a country corps establish a small Morris tube range, the land being given?
2. What subsidy would the Department give towards such a range?
3. Do the Departmental rifle shooting experts consider that these ranges serve good purposes in training rifle shots?

Mr. DEAKIN.—On behalf of the Minister of Defence, I have to state—

1. From £10 upwards, according to local arrangements. The cost would depend on the available facilities for protection from weather, and safety to public.
2. As the Commonwealth would have to be treated as a whole, the question of subsidy would probably mean a large expenditure. The Government has this question under consideration.
3. Yes, as an aid to more advanced practice and training in musketry.

EXCISE ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. LEE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact that the officers in the Postal Department are required to act as Excise officers in the country districts?
2. Is it a part of their duties to visit hotels and witness the running off of stale beer?
3. If so, will he give instructions to stop this practice?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — In reply to the honorable member—

1. Yes, in some cases by an arrangement made between the Department of the Postmaster-General and the Department of Trade and Customs.
2. When acting as Excise Officers, it is their duty under the provisions of the Beer Excise Act, Section 41, to do so when directed by the Collector, if the beer has become unfit for human use as a beverage.
3. Officers of the Postmaster-General's Department, while acting as Excise Officers, do so under instructions issued by the Department of Trade and Customs, for which they are acting.

REFUND OF BEER EXCISE.

Mr. LEE asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Is a refund of excise allowed to brewers for beer which may go sour in hotels?
2. Will he also allow the same privilege to importers whose goods upon which duty has been paid become unfit for consumption?

Mr. DEAKIN.—On behalf of the Minister of Trade and Customs I have to state—

1. Refund on beer which has become unfit for human use is allowed under the provisions of Section 41 of the Beer Excise Act, which is as follows:—

Whenever beer upon which the duty has been paid becomes unfit for human use as a beverage before more than one-eighth of its quantity has been withdrawn from the vessel in which it is contained, a refund of the duty shall be made in the manner prescribed, if it is returned in the original vessel to the brewery within ninety days after removal, or if it is destroyed by permission of the Collector. The refund may be made by the issue of stamps.

2. There is no power under the Customs Act to make refunds under the conditions referred to.

BUDGET.

In Committee of Supply: (Consideration resumed from 1st September, vide page 1854), on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST—

That the item, "President, £1,100," be agreed to.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—Of all the opportunities that are afforded to honorable members, I think that that presented by the discussion upon the Treasurer's financial policy is the most fitting to select, for doing justice to the various questions of public policy to which it is considered necessary to direct the attention of the Government. I have very carefully perused the Treasurer's financial statement, as reported in Hansard, and I think that if it is read, as I hope it will be, throughout the British Possessions, it will create a distinctly favorable impression. The Treasurer was perfectly justified in taking an optimistic view of our financial conditions. An investigation of the Treasurer's figures will, however, demonstrate how little the results which are shown in the statistics supplied by the right honorable gentleman with such liberality throughout his Budget are due to legislation by this Parliament, and how much they are dependent upon the action of a beneficent Providence in giving us excellent seasons during the past two years. It is from that cause that we have benefited more than from any other, and I think it is a reflection upon us that the financial statement contains no proposal which seems calculated to improve the conditions which now obtain owing to the bountiful seasons which we have experienced. There are one or two matters to which I desire specially to direct the attention of the Treasurer. I regret to say that an effort is being made by a certain section of the House—and in this connexion I wish particularly to emphasize the views of the commercial community, which have been placed immediately before us—to set up a standard of righteousness and exclusiveness which, though it may be theoretically sound, will certainly react upon the honest trader, without hindering the dishonest trader, because of the facilities which exist for evading such legislation. I would further point out that the legislation in question cannot be enforced without employing a small army of inspectors and examiners. I repeat, therefore, that in imposing various legislative restrictions upon commerce and trade—many of them admittedly desirable so far as they secure to our people improved conditions, and a better knowledge of the goods which they may be purchasing or selling—we are subjecting the commercial community to still another disability so far as their relations with other countries are concerned. I admit that the public are unquestionably in favour of honest dealing. They desire that the honest trader shall be protected, and that the dishonest individual shall be punished. At the same time, the continuance of these pin-pricking laws is not conducive to an increased measure of morality. I have already said that the Treasurer is amply justified in taking an optimistic view of our position, and in expecting that the figures which he has so liberally distributed throughout his Budget will be productive of a useful influence abroad. I find that between 1903 and 1904 the trade of the Commonwealth increased by £8,519,000. That result, I think, is chiefly due to the magnificent seasons which we have experienced. For instance, in 1903, the export of wheat was valued at only £181,355, whereas in 1904 it had increased to £5,240,590, and the wool crop, which in 1903 was worth £13,997,000, had increased the following year to a value of £17,115,000. It will be seen that these two items in themselves practically account for the difference between the trade of the Commonwealth during the two years I have mentioned, and thus enabled the Treasurer to take the optimistic view which he did. During the course of this debate reference has been made to the increase which has taken place in our bank deposits. In one of the Budget Papers the right honorable gentleman has given the House valuable information as to our position in this respect. But I do not think that we can regard the increase of deposits in our banks as a very healthy sign. To me it seems rather to suggest that there is an absence of enterprise abroad, and I am perfectly certain that the Treasurer and the Government must realize that it is their duty to ascertain as far as they possibly can, what are the real causes underlying this condition of affairs. During the coming season we shall probably have a still further accumulation of profits consequent upon the larger wool and wheat yields, which are now practically assured.

Mr. FISHER.—Is it not a fact that the advances made by the banks are proportionately quite as large as they were previously?

Mr. KNOX.—I think I am justified in saying that last year the amount of profits in the banks were quite as high—with the exception of one year—as they have ever been in the history of Australia, whereas the advances showed a decrease. Taking the first quarter of the present year, the advances were equivalent to £81,717,000, whereas in 1904 they amounted to £84,000,000, a decrease practically of £2,280,000. One of the most important tasks to which the Treasurer can usefully address himself is to discover the reasons which exist for this condition of things. I am sure he will recognise that in London the men who handle large financial concerns consider that a moderately tight money market is the most healthy sign of trade generally. In Australia we have an increasing amount upon deposit at the banks, and a decreasing bank rate. On the other hand, men who are accustomed to handle large undertakings here do not exhibit the same desire to engage in enterprise. I make that statement deliberately, although I have no desire to take a pessimistic view of the situation. Indeed, I hold that the optimistic view entertained by the Treasurer is justified by the conditions which obtain all over the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, the right honorable gentleman might, with profit, investigate the reasons which are operating against the production of those conditions which in other parts of the world are regarded as indications of a healthy and prosperous state of trade. I have no desire to labour this subject, but before leaving it I should like to put before the House a return prepared by me in connexion with another institution with which I am associated. The return, which is based on the statistics for 1903—the latest that I could secure—shows that during that year Great Britain imported £260,000,000 worth of grain, cotton, wool, wine, butter, cheese, leather goods, coffee, tobacco, fruits, currants, raisins, and so forth, all of which can be, or are being, produced within the Commonwealth. Yet, as the House is aware, Australia has but a very small proportion of this great trade. My earnest hope is that the Government will submit proposals by which we, as a great producing community, will be enabled to secure a larger share of it. Whether it be described as "preferential trade" or by any other name, we ought to introduce a system which will so assist our primary industries as to enable us to secure a much larger share of the enormous volume of trade to which I have referred. We should endeavour to give the primary producers of the Commonwealth a larger measure of assistance than we are doing.

Mr. BAMFORD.—These are mere generalities. We should like to know what suggestion the honorable member has to make.

Mr. KNOX.—It is the duty of the Treasurer to deal with this question in detail, and the Government should submit proposals to the House that will enable Australia to supply a larger share of Great Britain's imports.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Does the honorable member think that a Federal land tax would help us?

Mr. KNOX.—I do not; and I trust that it will never be necessary for the Commonwealth to resort to direct taxation.

Mr. MAUGER.—What does the honorable member think will help us in this respect?

Mr. KNOX.—If we repealed some of the restrictive legislation which my honorable friend has supported, we should remove to a certain extent many of the difficulties that at present face us. I find again that the population of Australia in 1904 was 3,984,337, consisting almost equally of males and females, and that the Victorian Government Statist remarks that—

The immigration from outside Australia to Australian States ceased about the year 1891, and since then we have had to depend solely upon the excess of births over deaths for any increase that has taken place in the population.

Mr. BAMFORD.—So that the cessation of immigration dates from the great bank smash.

Mr. KNOX.—I have no desire to reflect in any way upon my honorable friends in the Ministerial corner, because I think their earnestness of purpose is undoubted, but the honorable member for Herbert must not forget that the cessation of immigration in 1891 was really concurrent with the passing of coercive and restrictive legislation.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Federal Parliament was not created until ten years after the period to which the honorable member refers, and we did not have even a Factories Act in Victoria until six years later.

Mr. KNOX.—I am simply referring to the historical fact that shortly after the financial crisis of 1891—which was one of the strong factors responsible for the cessation of immigration—we saw the passing of legislation intended to restrict the freedom of trade and commerce, and the direction in which they might be carried on. Much of this legislation was undoubtedly serviceable, but I would remind honorable members, without making any deductions from this fact, that the cessation of immigration was really concurrent with the passing of restrictive legislation by the Parliaments of the several States. It was about that time that the party favouring class legislation obtained control of the Parliamentary machine.

Mr. MAUGER.—The cessation of immigration was the result of the collapse of the land boom, and of commercial corruption.

Mr. KNOX.—I hold that the commercial morality of Australia is equal to that of any other civilized community, and that when we speak of its absence from Australia, we are fouling our own nest in a most unjustifiable way. It is most regrettable that the greatest detractors of Australia should be found among our own people. As one having a knowledge of the political, commercial, and financial life of Australia, I say that we can hold our heads high among the nations of the earth. There is an entire absence of corruption, but unfortunately a number of honorable members, whose honesty of intention cannot be questioned, have been carried away by theories which have not been put to the test, and have supported legislation which has done much to hamper the development of the Commonwealth. It is with regret I find that the Treasurer, who, times without number, both here and on the public platform, has urged the necessity for introducing population to remedy many of the existing evils, has not been able yet to come down with a specific proposal for that purpose. What do I see in the Estimates? We are asked to vote a sum of £200 "for advertising the resources of the Commonwealth."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is to carry out an agreement made with some one by the last Government.

Mr. KNOX.—I am speaking merely of the fact, and not of the occupant of the office.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not a fresh item, so far as this Government is concerned.

Mr. KNOX.—And I am not concerned with the question as to who compiled the Estimates of expenditure. I can only deal with the figures which are presented to the Committee. To promote a great undertaking, we are asked to vote the sum of £200.

Mr. CHANTER.—Does it not represent the salary of Mr. John Plummer?

Mr. KNOX. — It may represent the salary of some gentleman. If we had been asked to vote £2,000, or indeed, £20,000, I think it would have been money exceedingly well spent if properly applied. I am asked to make a practical suggestion as to what should be done. I recognise the limited area of influence allotted to this Parliament. I admit that it can do nothing practical without the assistance of the States. I know that the Prime Minister has made this a live question, but we wish to get away from eloquent speeches. They are certainly valuable texts for us to refer to; but we wish to be afforded an opportunity to consider a substantial scheme which would tend to bring the States and the Commonwealth into practical co-operation for the purpose of inducing a large influx of population. Surely no responsible Government could have before its eyes a greater question than that of ascertaining why people are avoiding Australia and flocking to Canada and the United States and Argentina?

Mr. STORRER.—Because they can get work in those countries.

Mr. KNOX.—There is plenty of work to be done here if proper facilities are given. There is no country in which work can be conducted under better conditions for the worker and with better results than ours.

Mr. MAUGER.—To-day there are hundreds of men out of work who want employment badly.

Mr. KNOX.—There is something wrong, I admit, when that condition of things exists, and it is the duty of the Government to ascertain the causes of it. If we refer to the statistics concerning private property and individual wealth we shall find a record which is not equalled by that of any other country. I ask honorable members to earnestly consider these facts, and to note the deposits in the savings banks. Of course, it is a regrettable circumstance that there are isolated cases of want of employment, but let any person who has travelled round the world mark the generality of our people, and he will find that they are better clothed, better fed, and better housed than are the people of other countries.

Mr. MAHON.—With more money for gambling, too.

Mr. KNOX.—I regret that failing. But even that fact is an evidence of prosperity. At Show time, and later on, at Cup time, if the season has been good, my honorable friend will see the metropolis of Victoria crowded with persons who have come from the country because of the prosperity in which they have shared. Certainly the question of want of population is one which ought to be faced with firmness and energy by every honorable member until we arrive at a solution of the problem.

Mr. CHANTER.—There is only one way in which the Federal Parliament can deal with the question, and that is to provide work by opening avenues of employment.

Mr. KNOX.—If that is the only way in which population can be attracted here then let the Government come forward with a proposal for our consideration. Do not let us stand idle, but let us take a definite step. Month after month, I might almost say, that Parliament after Parliament has passed by, and we have not yet got away from the stage of machinery Bills. We are still in the stage which ought to have been passed in the first session of this Parliament by putting all the Departments of State in order. We are still engaged upon machinery Bills instead of dealing with measures which would be calculated to increase the prosperity of the community. I appeal to Ministers, in the interests of the whole community, to address themselves to this urgent question with a view to discovering the causes of the lack of population and proposing a remedy. I am sure that if the Government were to submit a rational scheme, in which the States could join, it would be supported by a majority of those honorable members who sit in the Labour corner. I feel perfectly sure that the unanimous desire of the members of the Opposition is to get rid of the present abnormal state of things by attracting people to our shores.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member knows that they are all welcome.

Mr. KNOX.—Then where is the necessity for an amendment of the section which has done us harm to the extent of millions of pounds?

Mr. FISHER.—Misrepresentations have done us harm.

Mr. KNOX.—I quite admit that there may have been misrepresentations, but we have to realise how our legislation affects the public sentiment of the great community upon which we are dependent for large financial assistance, and for our population. I speak with knowledge when I say that that section has cost us millions of pounds. My right honorable friend the Treasurer has said that it is not true that money has been withdrawn from the country. Probably he is justified from the figures before him in making that statement. But he forgets what our position would have been if the conditions had been different. We should not have been in a stationary position in relation to our banking returns; because from a national point of view we are in a stationary condition. We ought to have made more progress. We ought to have taken advantage of the impetus secured by the consummation of Federation.

Mr. FISHER.—Does not every commercial man admit that we are in a sounder and better position to-day than we were 10 years ago?

Mr. KNOX.—I admit that. I have said as much. But I also say that we ought to have attained a higher level. We ought to have been in a stronger and more flourishing position.

Mr. KENNEDY.—So we should have been except for the ruin brought about in 1890-1891.

Mr. KNOX.—So far as I have been able to ascertain—I was not in the country at the time—the figures show that practically no great change in the economic position of the country was wrought by the events to which the honorable member refers. Practically the volume of business affected was in relation to interchange between individuals. I trust that no such condition of gambling will ever be resuscitated, and that the lessons of that period will be remembered for years. That crisis, however, affected one or two States chiefly. My honorable friend, the member for Boothby, will recollect that his State had its trouble some years before, and emerged successfully.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Just as we got on our feet we were knocked back again by the failure of the banks in Victoria.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Does not the drought largely explain the present position?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; according to the honorable member, it is all due to the Labour Party!

Mr. KNOX.—To say that the Labour Party brought about all the trouble would be unworthy. I do not accuse them of anything of the kind. No one in this House makes such a charge. I am afraid that, however desirable it may be to prevent a recurrence of the events of 1890-91, the natural tendency of many people is towards such rash speculation as then occurred. I trust, however, that the lessons of that period will be remembered, and that such evils will be averted in the future. We have a great country. I do not wish to be led into any spread-eagleism, but I do hold that no one can travel abroad, visiting such countries as Canada and the United States, and find there conditions which are better than those which we have in Australia, whether for the worker or for the employer. It is expedient that we should do something which will be permanently advantageous in respect of defence. After the excellent speech of the honorable member for Corinella, I will not presume to deal with that subject in detail. But I would impress upon the Government the urgent necessity of starting from the very basis by instructing the boys in our schools in the use of the rifle, and by drilling them. I regret that the Minister of Defence in the present Government occupies a seat in another Chamber, but I trust that other members of the Ministry will use their influence, and that recommendations will be made to Parliament for improving and increasing the strength of our cadet corps. I find that the sum allotted for cadets in New South Wales is £3,500. The previous amount was very small, and it is gratifying to know that the cadet movement, which originated in Victoria, has caught on and is progressing well in New South Wales. I regret that the amount for Victoria, instead of increasing, has been cut down to £3,362. In Queensland the amount is £2,020. In South Australia £800, in Western Australia £500, and in Tasmania £500. After the representations which have been made by many honorable members on this subject, the Treasurer would have been justified in asking for larger amounts which I am persuaded Parliament would readily have voted. I am glad to find that the Rifle Club movement is progressing in New South Wales, and that the appropriation for this purpose, in the case of that State, is £13,900, as compared with £21,000 in Victoria, £4,679 in Queensland, £7,050 in South Australia, £3,954 in Western Australia, and £605 in Tasmania. I should not attempt or venture to address the Committee on such a highly technical subject as that of defence, but I think every honorable member will agree that it is necessary and desirable to assist the two great movements, namely, the cadets and the rifle clubs. Were it possible—although I know it is not possible under our parliamentary conditions—I think honorable members would be prepared to suggest that the amounts I have mentioned should be considerably increased. I do not propose to deal with other branches of the question of defence, for the reason that these have been dealt with so fully and exhaustively by the ex-Minister, the honorable and learned member for Corinella. There is, however, one inconsistency, to which I should like to refer. Honorable members will observe that there is a larger sum allotted for the rifle ranges in New South Wales than has been allotted to similar institutions in Victoria, although in the latter State there are considerably more members of such clubs.

Mr. WILKINSON.—There are three times as many members of rifle clubs in Victoria as there are in New South Wales.

Mr. KNOX.—I understand that in Victoria there are 19,800 members of rifle clubs; and I trust that, when we come to deal with the items, the Minister representing the Minister of Defence will be able to explain matters, and assure us that the clubs in Victoria are not to be placed in a worse position than are those in New South Wales. Personally, of course, I hope that New South Wales will get the amount allotted, and more, if required; but I claim that Victoria, in this connexion, is entitled to better consideration. After the exhaustive manner in which the sugar bonus has been discussed, I shall not presume to deal in detail with so complicated a question. As with most bonuses, however, those who receive this one regard it as so comforting and desirable that they crave for its continuance; and, in my opinion, we should probably not be justified, considering the financial position of Queensland, in abruptly terminating its payment. There has been a suggestion that the bonus shall be extended for another five years, but I trust that to this proposal there may be a modification, so that, while the bonus is extended for a slightly longer period, there shall be a gradual reduction, until, at last, it becomes extinct.

Mr. FISHER.—Say twenty years.

Mr. KNOX.—That, I think, would be too long. I should say that we might extend the bonus for two years beyond the present period, and, thereafter, over five years—allowing it to become gradually extinct. That, I think, is a reasonable proposal.

Mr. MAHON.—It is a very generous proposal.

Mr. KNOX.—I think it is a generous proposal. What I want to secure is that the public of the Commonwealth shall see some point at which this bonus will vanish. That, it seems to me, is most desirable; and to secure that end we shall probably have to give way by allowing a little longer time. In any case, when the matter arises for discussion, I shall advocate the gradual extinction of the bonus. We ought to remember that this bonus was granted for the ostensible purpose of, in time, removing the kanakas from Queensland—for the purpose, in short, of securing a White Australia.

Mr. MAHON.—Was the bonus not asked for also on the ground of protection to the local producer?

Mr. KNOX.—I think the ostensible reason was to secure a White Australia.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the honorable member not know that the white grower pays £3 in Excise, and receives only £2 as a bonus?

Mr. KNOX.—I know that.

Mr. MAHON.—And there is £6 protection.

Mr. GROOM.—The white grower does not get the full £6 protection.

Mr. MAHON.—The white grower gets £5 protection, anyhow.

Mr. KNOX.—I wish it to be quite understood that I am fully in accord with the desire for a White Australia. It would be a great disadvantage to the Australian community if, through any neglect, we allowed the introduction of a piebald race. I have, however, held that the kanaka may be serviceably employed in the equatorial regions, with sufficient safeguards to render groundless the fears raised by his presence in Australia. There is one point which I do not think any honorable member has yet referred to, and it is that we cannot claim that the bonus, so far as the increase in the area under cultivation is concerned, has done what it was expected to do. I have no doubt that these returns were supplied to the Treasurer, but if the right honorable gentleman will look at that dealing with the number of white and black producers and the areas under cultivation with sugar, he will find that in the table submitted this year the areas cultivated by white and black labour respectively during 1902 and 1903 are omitted. There is appended to the table the statement "Information not available." If the Treasurer will consult the papers circulated with the Budget for 1904-5, he will see that the particulars are supplied there, and the blanks in the table now supplied can be filled up.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What I have supplied is a Customs return, and the Customs Department has charge of the matter. I suppose the figures to which the honorable member refers were found not to be reliable.

Mr. KNOX.—I understand that the figures to which I refer are confirmed by the statistical registrar of Queensland.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I know I have submitted a Customs Department return.

Mr. KNOX.—Then where were the figures which appear in the 1904-5 tables obtained from? In the return supplied with those tables, the figures are given for 1902, 1903, and 1904.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In the tables I have submitted, the totals are given, but not the number of black and white growers in 1902 and 1903.

Mr. KNOX.—It is because the totals are given that I think it is significant that figures showing the distribution of white and black labour, and its relation to the acreage cultivated, are omitted from the return now supplied. If the Treasurer will examine the percentages shown in the similar statement supplied with the Treasurer's tables for 1904-5, he will see—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We give the quantities of sugar produced, and they are of just as much importance as the acreage cultivated.

Mr. KNOX.—I am dealing with one question at the present moment, and I am trying to show that the payment of these bounties has, so far, failed to increase the acreage under cultivation by white labour.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The quantity of sugar shown to have been produced must have required the cultivation of a certain acreage to produce it.

Mr. KNOX.—I am dealing with facts, so far as figures can be said to disclose facts.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is impossible to produce so many tons of sugar without the cultivation of so many acres.

Mr. KNOX.—I can inform the right honorable gentleman that, according to the table submitted by the Treasurer last year, the percentage for 1902 is given at 37·7.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member not think that the quantity of sugar produced is the most important consideration?

Mr. KNOX.—The right honorable gentleman must admit that we can look to the action of Providence in sending good seasons in the northern part of our territory for such results. An acre of land will produce a very great deal more in one season than in another, and the Treasurer must agree that, in order to show that the bounty system has been successful, it is necessary to prove that it has been the means of introducing into the Queensland sugar cultivation a large influx of white labour, and has also increased the area under sugar-cane.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Might I direct the honorable member's attention to the return showing the quantity of sugar produced?

Mr. KNOX.—That has reference only to production.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; but it shows a considerable increase.

Mr. KNOX.—I wish the right honorable gentleman to understand that I am dealing with one phase of the question, and I wish to show that, contrary to expectation, the payment of the sugar bounties has not resulted in an increase of the area under cultivation with sugar by white labour in Queensland.

Mr. GROOM.—It has been shown conclusively that white labour can do the work.

Mr. KNOX.—I am not dealing with that aspect of the question.

Mr. GROOM.—Still it is a very important aspect.

Mr. KNOX.—I have to inform my honorable friends that, according to the return presented last year, in 1902, the percentage of acres cultivated by white labour was 37·7, whilst in 1905 the percentage is only 37·8.

Mr. GROOM.—The honorable member will recollect that when the proposal was first introduced it was said that white labour could not perform the work at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The figure to which the honorable member refers is only an estimate.

Mr. KNOX.—I thought the right honorable gentleman might say that it was an estimate; but if we take the figure for 1904, the right honorable gentleman will see that the percentage was then only 37·9. There has been no increase in the area cultivated by white labour in the industry as a consequence of the payment of these bounties.

Mr. FISHER.—The ratio of increase is as 2 is to 1 in favour of white labour. That is the actual increase since the institution of the sugar bounties.

Mr. WILSON.—That is not shown by the Treasurer's tables.

Mr. KNOX.—Are we, then, to place no reliance on these tables?

Mr. FISHER.—That is stated in the returns.

Mr. KNOX.—I am quoting from the Treasurer's tables.

Mr. FISHER.—If the honorable member will examine the returns he will find that whilst black labour production has doubled, white labour production has quadrupled.

Mr. KNOX.—I was not able to obtain the assistance of the honorable member for Wide Bay in checking these figures, but I did get the assistance of one or two honorable members who represent Queensland, and they acknowledged that the figures to which I have referred are indisputable.

Mr. FISHER.—From memory, I would say that the production by white labour in 1902 was 12,500 tons. Now, the production by white labour amounts to four times that quantity, and is estimated at 50,000 tons; whilst the production by coloured labour has only been doubled in the same time.

Mr. KNOX.—My honorable friend has only partially answered my contention. I admit that there might be a greater quantity of sugar produced by white labour, but the honorable member must admit that during the last two years there have been exceptionally good seasons in Queensland.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Were not the seasons the same for white as for black labour?

Mr. KNOX.—Just so; but I contend that honorable members are not justified in quoting the production of sugar per acre. If it is desired to show that any satisfactory results have followed the application of the system of sugar bounties, it must be proved that the area under cultivation by white labour has been extended. If the results per acre are greater, honorable members opposite admit that that is due to the exceptional seasons in Queensland in the last two years.

Mr. FISHER.—Still the ratio of increase is as 2 is to 1 in favour of white labour, and, that being so, we may anticipate that within a very few years the production by white labour will overtake the production by black labour.

Mr. KNOX.—I have taken great care to check the figures supplied, and I shall be glad to hand them to the honorable member for Wide Bay, who, I hope, will reply to them. I find from the figures I have before me that the percentage cultivated by white labour in 1902 was 37·7; in 1903—a large accumulation—51·6; in 1904, 37·9; and in 1905, 37·8.

Mr. GROOM.—Those figures probably refer to the number of registered white growers.

Mr. KNOX.—That may be so.

Mr. GROOM.—Then should not the honorable member include in his return the number of white men employed by those registered growers, in order to find the number of white men engaged in cultivation?

Mr. KNOX.—If the figures are wrong, of course my argument falls to the ground.

Mr. GROOM.—I think the honorable member is referring only to the number of registered growers, and not to the number of white labourers employed in the cultivation of sugar-cane.

Mr. KNOX.—The area under cultivation by black labour was, in 1902, 62·3; in 1903, 48·4; in 1904, 62·1; and in 1905, 62·2 per cent. of the whole area under cane. The fact that the granting of bounties has not increased the acreage under white labour in proportion to the area under black labour needs explanation. I wish now to direct the attention of the Treasurer to the great question of the taking over by the Commonwealth of the debts of the States, though I do not propose to go into details, because I hope to have the privilege of asking honorable members to consider them on another occasion. I am sorry that the Treasurer has not definitely declared the intentions of the Government in regard to this matter. We have had some expressions of opinion from him as to what should be done, but he has given us no indication of the intentions of the Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does not the honorable member think that it was a little too soon to expect that?

Mr. KNOX.—The right honorable gentleman might justly have said that he had only recently taken charge of the Treasury, and had not had time to go into this question. He must, nevertheless, have evolved in his own mind some scheme for dealing with the States debts, though, as I have admitted, it would perhaps be asking too much to expect him to come forward with a cut-and-dried scheme. Two Conferences of Premiers have dealt with this subject, and proposals in regard to it have come from various sources, notably from the right honorable member for Balclava, who, because of his long term of office as Treasurer, and his knowledge of detail, could, perhaps, deal with it more conveniently than any other honorable member, and recognised the great difficulties to be overcome. He required, first, full transfer of all debts to the Commonwealth; secondly, full control by the Commonwealth; thirdly, full security for the Commonwealth; and, fourthly, that future borrowings be the business of, and confined to, the Commonwealth Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — Not Australian borrowings.

Mr. KNOX.—No; I am speaking of foreign loans, which constitute the bulk of our borrowings. If these conditions were accepted by the States, the difficulties of the task of taking over the debts would be reduced to a minimum; but they are not likely to be accepted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would be necessary to alter the Constitution.

Mr. KNOX. — Constitutional changes would be necessary, but the States would not agree to such conditions unless they felt more secure in regard to the expenditure of the Commonwealth. The constant question of State Treasurers is: "What is the Commonwealth Treasurer going to do with the large amount of revenue which he will have in his possession if the Braddon provision is not extended?"

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—If we take over the debts there will be no margin.

Mr. KNOX.—I admit that. Of course, the Commonwealth could exercise the powers given to it under the Constitution; but any forced measures will prove unsatisfactory, and the co-operation of the States seems necessary to insure success. We shall engender permanent ill-feeling unless we carry the States with us in regard to any arrangement that is made. The proposals of the States are these: First, that their finances shall not be dislocated, which is what they constantly dread; secondly, that they shall retain the management and control of the railways, which are the main security for their principal loans; thirdly, that there shall be a clear definition, within reasonable limits, of the amount which the Treasurers of the States may expect to receive, or be called upon to pay, to make up deficiencies. The States are justified in seeing that they are secured or indemnified against the possible dislocation or upheaval of their financial condition. The points of difference on fundamental principles, therefore, seem to be few. I have carefully studied the reports of the Conference recently held, and those of the previous Conference, and in my opinion there will be no difficulty in removing these points of difference if we can implant in the minds of the Premiers of the States the feeling that the Federal Parliament does not intend to interfere with or to dislocate their financial position. The States Treasurers would like to see the Braddon clause extended for a specific period of fifteen or twenty years, or, alternatively, the allocation of a specific sum out of Customs and Excise revenue for the payment of interest. Neither the Commonwealth Treasurer nor the States Treasurers seem willing to take the first plunge. Each Commonwealth Treasurer formulates some ideas, and, from time to time, the States Treasurers put forward their ideas, and express their fears with regard to the manner in which the States revenue will be affected. We also have people outside making all kinds of suggestions. What we hunger for, however, is some practical business-like proposal for handling this question. Unless some definite step is taken, we shall continue to adopt a much too deferential and unbusiness-like attitude towards the States, and the period for which the Braddon clause will operate under the Constitution will have expired before any arrangement is entered into for taking over the debts of the States, and thus imposing a check upon the Commonwealth putting to fresh uses the large amount of revenue that will be placed in its hands. This may—I merely say, “may”—offer temptations to the Federal Parliament to undertake new and entirely visionary enterprises. I believe that wise counsels would ultimately prevail to prevent any unseemly extravagance, but it is not business-like to allow matters to drift on as they are doing. The States are entitled to know that their financial position will be rendered secure by a definite appropriation of the revenue which will be placed at the command of the Commonwealth. I would urge upon the Treasurer the necessity of making some definite statement upon this matter, and of dealing with it and the question of increasing our population, as soon as this discussion is closed.

Mr. *SPENCE.—We could impose a land tax.

Mr. KNOX.—I hope that the Federal Parliament will never impose a tax of that kind, because I believe that, in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, the States alone should impose direct taxation upon the people. No Federal Treasurer—not even the late Treasurer—would be able to present to honorable members anything more than the ground-work of a scheme for the transfer of the States’ debts. The superstructure will require to be carefully built up after much thought, and in the light of the most complete information if the result is to prove financially successful and advantageous to the people of the Commonwealth, to the Federal Treasurer, and to the States Treasurers. It is idle to expect that we can lay down the lines of a complete scheme without taking into our counsels the masters of the situation, namely, our British and foreign bondholders. We have not taken them sufficiently into consideration.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member surely does not expect them to give us anything more than they can help?

Mr. KNOX.—We shall have to consult them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think so.

Mr. KNOX.—They are the masters of the situation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not when the loans expire.

Mr. KNOX.—Does my right honorable friend suppose that the large loans for which the States have become responsible can be repaid out of the revenue of the Commonwealth? The loans, when they expire, will have to be provided for by further borrowing, and if the old bond-holders are paid off, new ones will have to supply the funds. Therefore, it appears to me that it would be prudent to ascertain the views of representative men with regard to the situation. I think that the sooner the Federal Treasurer and the States Treasurers come into close and practical business contact, instead of confining themselves to talking at conferences and making various suggestions, the more likely we shall be to arrive at a solution of the difficulty. We should make ourselves acquainted with the financial methods that are followed in Great Britain, and I hold that no satisfaction can be secured unless we enter into consultation with the leading financial authorities in that country. It would be desirable for us to obtain the benefit of the advice of men of the standing of the general manager of the Bank of England, the general manager of the Joint Stock Bank, the manager of the London and Westminster Bank, and other financial authorities. The Treasurer will appreciate the importance of securing the co-operation, assistance, and advice of these gentlemen, who are accustomed to conduct great financial operations. I understand that the right honorable member for Balaclava is about to make a trip abroad to recruit his health, and if he could be induced to extend his visit to London, and ascertain the views of the financial authorities there, he could bring back to us much valuable information. I can assure the Treasurer that honorable members occupying the Opposition cross benches—and, I think, I may also speak for other honorable members on this side of the Chamber—regard this question as too important to justify the introduction of party considerations. The general community do not care what members occupy the Treasury bench so long as we have wise and honest administration. They are at present crying out for practical results from the Federal Legislature, and I would urge the Treasurer to give the question to which I have been referring, and the necessity of increasing our population, his most serious consideration. I shall deal with the details of this subject from an entirely different aspect when I bring forward my proposal for the establishment of a Council of Finance. I ask the Treasurer to give the suggestion which I am about to make his most earnest consideration. I offer it in the most friendly spirit, and I hope that it will commend itself to the wisdom of this House. I ask the right honorable gentleman to obtain authority from this Parliament—by resolution, or by statute, if necessary—for the appointment of a Commission, consisting of Federal and State representatives, who shall be instructed to frame a scheme for the transfer of the States debts, for the furnishing of the best financial guarantee in regard thereto, and to report as to the constitutional and statutory amendments which may become necessary to give effect to that scheme. I suggest that the Commonwealth representatives on the Commission should consist of the Treasurer, the leader of the Labour Party, the leader of the Opposition, and the right honorable member for Balaclava, and that four representatives should be appointed from the States—one from New South Wales, one from Victoria, and two from the other States, in order that their representation may approximate to the amount of their joint debts.

Mr. CROUCH.—New South Wales should have more representatives than Victoria, if her representation is to be proportionate to the amount of her debt.

Mr. KNOX.—Of course, we cannot secure absolute equality of representation so far as the States are concerned. New South Wales owes considerably more than does any other State. Victoria comes next from the stand-point of her indebtedness, and, consequently, I suggest that one representative should be chosen from each of those States, and two others from the remaining States. We should then have four representatives of the Commonwealth upon the Commission, and an equal number of representatives of the States. I am aware that there is some opposition to my scheme for the appointment of a permanent Council of Finance, inasmuch as it is claimed that the creation of such a body would deprive this Parliament of its direct responsibility. But the Commission which I suggest should be appointed to frame a scheme for the transfer of the States debts, would be equally representative of the States and of this Parliament, and be definite in its purpose.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Representatives of what States?

Mr. KNOX.—The honorable member may bring in all the States if he chooses, but I have endeavoured to preserve a sort of balance of financial obligation. If effect be given to my suggestion, we shall have upon that body a representative of each party in this House, and those gentlemen will have the assistance of the wisdom and experience of the late Treasurer. The Commission should be directed to formulate a scheme for the transfer of the States debts for submission to this House and to the States. I may mention that other honorable members, whom I have consulted, consider that the carrying out of my proposal would enable us to obtain some practical scheme for dealing with this great problem. The Commission should be given specific directions, and should be required to report to this House within a specified period. If that report were forthcoming early next session, the whole question might then be discussed, and a scheme arrived at which would be satisfactory to everybody concerned. There are various other matters upon which I shall defer comment until we are dealing in detail with the items which appear upon the Estimates. I had no intention of occupying the attention of the Committee for more than half-an-hour, and I am surprised to find that I have absorbed so much time. I am very grateful to honorable members for the consideration which they have extended to me.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—I propose to make my remarks as brief as possible. It was only quite recently that I decided to speak at all, and I do so now because certain statements have been made which, in my judgment, call for some reply from Queensland representatives. During the course of this discussion a great deal has been said regarding the defamation of Australia. I am entirely at one with those who condemn in the strongest possible terms the individuals who go about the world defaming the country which has made them all that they are, and which has given them all that they have. If there is one part of the Commonwealth which has been defamed more than another, it is the State from which I hail, and to which I am proud to owe my birth. We grumble a good deal about the lack of immigration to Australia, and various reasons have been assigned for the falling-off which has taken place in the influx of people from other parts of the world to our shores. I say that if anybody is to blame for the existing condition of affairs, it is those who are everlastingly writing to the newspapers—and the newspapers themselves also deserve censure for publishing their statements—declaring that a large part of the Commonwealth is unfitted for white settlement. In this connexion reference was wisely made this afternoon to a report which, according to the newspapers, has just been handed to the Government of South Australia—a report in which a high official appointed by the Imperial Government to preside over one of the States, has departed, it appears to me, from the legitimate prerogatives of his office, and has assisted to circulate slanderous statements. I refer to the Governor of South Australia. Whatever may be the outcome of his report, so far as the Government of his own State are concerned—and it has always been regarded as the duty of the Governors of the States to abstain from interference in matters of controversial politics in the States in which they represent the Crown—I say that when a State Governor not only transgresses in that way, but goes further and interferes in the legislation and the administration of the Commonwealth Government, it is time that a protest was made by this Parliament. If I were a member of the Parliament of South Australia I should be prepared to vote for a motion urging the recall of a Governor who could so far forget his position, as the Governor of that State appears to have done.

MR. CROUCH.—What about the Labour Government who permit him to do such a thing?

MR. WILKINSON.—I shall be very much surprised to learn that the present State Government are prepared to submit to such a thing. So long as we remain an integral part of the British Empire—and I hope that the connexion will continue—I suppose we must have some intermediary between the Crown and the Commonwealth. We have that intermediary in the Governor-General, but we never find him forgetting what is due to the Imperial authorities, or that which is due to the Commonwealth. I know that I do not stand alone in resenting most deeply any interference with legislation passed by this Parliament on the part of a State Governor. I dare say that if all the opinions regarding the unsuitability of the climate of northern Queensland and the Northern Territory for white labour could be brought together and scrutinized, they would be found to have emanated for the most part from those who have never done a hard day's work in either a torrid or a temperate climate—from men who have generally been supervisors of labour, rather than labourers themselves. There are members of both Houses of this Parliament who have not only lived in northern Queensland, but have done there the hardest day's work that could be carried out in any part of the world, and yet they are among the warmest advocates of the policy of a White Australia. When we go into the sugar districts, as the honorable member for New England claims to have done, we find that whilst the large planters assert that the climate is unsuitable for white labour, the holders of small sugar plantations express a contrary opinion. I must do the honorable member for New England the justice of saying that, in the course of his visit to the sugar-growing districts of Queensland, he appears to have obtained a fairly accurate knowledge of the conditions of the sugar industry. Judging by his speech in this debate, he seems to have made very careful inquiries, and to have endeavoured to secure impartial information; but I would remind him that in investigating this question much depends upon the source from which one seeks knowledge. When we go to the large planter, he will almost invariably tell us that a white man cannot work in the cane-fields, and that the industry could not afford to pay white workers' wages. He is usually prepared to make almost any statement to prove the necessity for allowing this territory to be worked by a cheap and servile class of labour. On the other hand, if we make inquiries from those who are growing sugar by means of white labour—if we ask them as I and other honorable members asked them during the recent parliamentary trip to northern Queensland—we find that they are almost as unanimously of opinion that white men can do the work as are the large plantation-holders that they cannot. Those who are actually working in the cane-fields of northern Queensland tell us that they can not only do this work, but that they prefer it to navvying on railway construction works. If I put it to those honorable members who took part in the recent parliamentary trip to northern Queensland whether they observed any degeneracy in the race, as they went north, I am sure their answer would be that the manhood, the womanhood, and the childhood of Queensland compare very favorably with those of any other part of the Continent. Prior to that visit of inspection I had not been beyond Townsville; but as we went further north on that occasion I met men and women with whom my early childhood had been spent in the southern parts of Queensland, and found that, although they had been living in the tropics for upwards of thirty years, they looked as fresh, as healthy, and as strong as did any who had spent all their lives in southern Queensland or New South Wales. The women not only looked as healthy and as strong, but the families were as large as were those to be found in the south. Some interested parties have expressed the opinion that the race is sure to degenerate by prolonged life in the tropics of Queensland, and that the natural increase in the population must fall off and eventually almost cease. It appears to me that that has not been the experience of other tropical countries. We find that the most densely populated parts of the earth to-day are those within the tropics. I shall be told, of course, that the people of those countries have coloured skins, but in the root stock I believe they are of the same race as ourselves. If it be argued, as it has been, that only a coloured man can endure tropical heat, and that nature has proved that this is so by placing nearly all the black races within the tropics, I will reply by advancing an argument used by a medical man, whom I shall quote at some length presently, and ask how it is that we find a coloured people in Greenland, one of the coldest of countries, and also in parts of Canada, where the land is covered with snow for six months out of every twelve. I shall reply by asking further how it is that the aboriginal races of Tasmania were as black as the ace of spades; that the Maori, who lives in anything but a tropical climate, is a coloured man; that the Jap is a brown man, and that the Chinaman is a yellow man, although none of these people live within the tropics? I am prepared to admit that there are ailments such as malarial fever, and certain diseases engendered by a parasitic attack, that are almost peculiar to the tropics; but medical science has learned to combat those diseases, and it is the opinion of the medical fraternity that there is no disease more susceptible to treatment than that which is due to a parasite. I would also remind honorable members that the malaria of northern Queensland was, fifty or sixty years ago, the malaria of south Queensland and the northern parts of New South Wales, and that it is not uncommon to find malarial diseases, such as fever and ague, occurring wherever new country is being opened up. The early settlers of Queensland and northern New South Wales tell us that malaria was prevalent in the early days on the rivers there just as it is prevalent to-day on the rivers of northern Queensland.

Mr. McDONALD.—The death-rate of northern Queensland is as low as is that of any other part of Australia.

Mr. WILKINSON.—The death-rate for the whole of Queensland is almost as low as is that of any other part of the Commonwealth, and I believe it is very much lower than that of Victoria. On the other hand, the birth rate of Queensland stands at the head of the list. This does not show that its climate is unhealthy; and when I say that the State stands at the head of the Commonwealth in these matters, I practically say that it stands at the head of the world, inasmuch as there are very few countries whose statistics in that respect are more favorable than are those of the Commonwealth. With regard to the varied opinions about the health of Queenslanders, I said I intended to take the liberty of quoting the views of a medical man who has lived at Geraldton, on the Johnstone River, for a number of years. I refer to Dr. T. F. Macdonald, who has lived for many years in what is considered to be the wettest part of Australia. It is said that the white man may stand the heat of a tropical climate, but not humidity combined with great heat. The quotation I am about to read is a refutation of that statement, as well as of others to which I have referred, inasmuch as the experience of Dr. Macdonald has been mostly gained on the Johnstone River, where the rainfall is as great as, if not greater than, that in any other part of Australia. He says—

The climate of North Queensland, correctly understood, and intelligently handled, is not only the best, but absolutely the very best climate in the whole round world. What has given rise, then, to opinions freely expressed at times in political quarters and in the Southern press, that here in North Queensland we, the pioneers of an Australian Empire yet to be, are doomed to toil in a tropical hell? An earthly paradise were surely nearer the mark. . . . While our brothers south of the tropics are being broiled alive, and those of the western tablelands are frizzling under the naked sun, we, in the glorious north, find the heavens heavy with clouds, the air cool with rain, and drains and back-yards flushed with floods! . . . Man himself forms no exception to the tropical rules of development. It is a matter of simple fact that people under otherwise healthy conditions develop in body and mind in the tropics. The very rapid growth of children, at first sight, appears to be a degeneration rather than an advance; but note the future development of those same tall, slim children born of white parents in hot regions. They grow mostly into young giants, and even as strength comes to the men, so does health and beauty to the women, when a reasonable observance of tropical hygiene obtains in immediate social surroundings. . . . In my experience all races of men, all shades of colour, thrive equally well in North Queensland; and all alike are subject to the one adverse element of the tropics—tropical disease. . . . In so far as tropical disease is mostly parasitic in its nature it obtains alike its virulence and vulnerability. . . . It is thought by some, perhaps many, that Chinese and Japanese are better fitted than white people to work in tropical agriculture. This contention I wish to question very seriously. It seems to me that, without any rhyme or reason, people quickly assume that a coloured skin affords protection against the rays of the sun, and that, therefore, coloured-skinned people are those fitted by nature to do tropical work. By this token then coloured skins are also best for extremely cold climates; for the Eskimo is a brown-skinned man; and again, the aboriginal inhabitants of America and Canada, countries notorious for their cold weather, are red-skinned people. The Japanese, who inhabit temperate climates, on the 40th parallel north, are, again, brown in colour. The Chinese, who barely touch the tropics are yellow; while New Zealand and Tasmania (and he might have added Patagonia and Terra del Fuego), a long way out of the tropics, to the south, were inhabited originally by very dark races. . . . I have touched this coloured question at some length, lest any white settlers be kept away from our truly gardens of Eden from fear of their descendants turning black from the light of the sun. . . . The climate of North Queensland will make women of multitudes of girls now growing into social weeds in and around our cities. However trying our cane-fields may appear, they will be as Paradise to conditions which obtain in the slums and factories of Australian towns. Pure air, hygienic conditions, and a life of hope in the cane-fields of Queensland, will do more to regenerate mankind and womankind in one day, than years of theoretical preaching in the cities! It is sunlight which has given us the mighty scrubs of to-day, as it has, in days gone by laid down the seams of coal. It is sunlight which has given us our white skins. It is sunlight which purifies a poisoned earth, and makes it wholesome and sweet, and good to look upon; and it is the sunlight of Northern Queensland which is destined to come to the rescue of the city slums and the unemployed of Australia. It will lend a hand in the development of the human race, and lay its kindly fingers upon many a poisoned social sore.

Speaking from my own personal experience of the white gangs of cane cutters on the Johnstone River, I can testify to the fact that they flourished in health while at the work. One man, indeed, who came down from the tableland a wreck from influenza, regained his health and strength while working in one of the gangs. Some of the farmers' daughters on the Johnstone River develop a taste for work in the cane-fields, and enjoy themselves as much as the girls in the harvest fields at home.

That is the kind of work which a little while ago we were told the white man could not do, and which more recently we were told he would not do. White men have proved that they can and will do the work. When some of the objectors saw girls and women working in the cane-fields, where they had said the white man could not work, they cried shame, and said it was not work fit for a woman to do. But they have had to admit that a white woman was able to do the work which they had said the white man could not do. In this, as in other cases, they endeavoured to prove too much. The whole question then is, not the ability or the willingness of the white man to do the work, but the willingness of the employer to pay him a decent wage. Amongst other questions inquired into by the Federal party during their tour in Northern Queensland was the rate of wages paid. When some planters who advocated a continuance of the use of coloured labour in the Northern cane-fields made their representations, they were asked to say what wages they paid, for one of their complaints was that they could not get a sufficient number of white men, however willing they might be to employ them. In reply to their question, the Federal party were told that ploughmen were getting from 17s. 6d. to £1 per week and rations, which were valued at from 7s. 6d. to 8s. Does it appear reasonable that while the planters offer such wages they will induce white men to go and do the work? A ploughman can earn more than that wage in Victoria, New South Wales, and in the southern part of Queensland, and he is not likely to be induced to take up the same class of work for the same pay in the northern parts of the Continent. That the industry cannot afford to pay "white" wages was partly believed in each House of this Parliament when it was legislating on this question. In order that that plea might be met we passed the Sugar Bounties Bill, to enable the planters to tide over the difficulty that we were convinced must ensue in the transition from the one condition to the other. It has been said this afternoon—and by other honorable members during the course of the debate, and at other times—that the bounty has failed in its object. I claim that it has succeeded splendidly, so far as it has been able to work. I agree with the honorable member for Franklin that it is scarcely a correct way to deal with the matter to take percentages. I am quite certain that, to deal with it as it has been dealt with by the honorable member for Kooyong, is not correct. The amount of sugar produced by white labour, when the bounty began to operate, was 12,000 tons. The estimated quantity to be produced by white labour this year is put down at 52,000 tons. There has been an increase in the quantity of sugar produced by white labour of four and a half times. On the other hand, in 1902 65,000 tons of sugar were grown by black labour. We have now reached an estimate of 107,000 tons; or an increase only of one and two-thirds the amount with which we started. If the same rate of increase is continued proportionately for the next three years, we shall have every reason to congratulate ourselves before the expiration of the period for which the Government have promised to extend the bounty upon having solved the coloured labour question, so far as concerns those planters who are willing and anxious to see the White Australia policy succeed. But some planters in Northern Queensland are so stubborn in their resistance to the White Australia policy, that they have announced themselves publicly as being willing that the whole industry should perish rather than have that policy succeed. I go to the other extreme, and say that I would rather that the whole sugar industry should perish than that the White Australia policy should fail. Because, important as the sugar industry may be, the policy of the preservation of Australia for the white race is, to my mind, of infinitely greater consequence. A publication has recently been issued by Mr. E. W. Cole, of the Book Arcade, Melbourne, entitled "Cotton Culture in Queensland," in which various quotations are made regarding the labour question in the northern parts of that State. Abridged reports of various meetings of the Royal Geographical Society are printed in the work. Amongst others, there is a quotation from a speech delivered by Captain Barclay, who has been for some thirty years or so in the Northern Territory. I was present at the meeting, as was also the Minister of Home Affairs, and the deputy leader of the Labour Party, the honorable member for Wide Bay; and I think they can bear me out in my assertion that Captain Barclay emphatically stated that, after thirty years' residence in the Northern Territory, he could fearlessly declare that there was no kind of labour that white men could not perform there. But—I mention it as another example of the suppression of the truth on this question—not one single word of that statement appears in the report of the speech in the publication to which I have referred. I also spoke strongly in favour of the white labour movement in Northern Queensland, as did the honorable member for Wide Bay. But not one word of what we said appears in Mr. Cole's statement. In this way facts and statements are suppressed and distorted to suit some end which, in my opinion, is not calculated to conserve the best interests of the Commonwealth or of Queensland. It should hardly be necessary at this time of day to refute statements about the suitability of every part of Australia for occupation by the white race. But we find contrary assertions so frequently and continuously cropping up, that it is necessary to meet them, and that can best be done by giving facts. I will quote the birth-rate and death-rate of various States of Australia, and the excess of births over deaths, as proving the suitability of Queensland for occupation by the white race. I have taken the figures for three States—New South Wales, Queensland, and Victoria—and have selected the last year for which Mr. Coghlan, in his statistical work, gives averages. I find that the death rates for 1903 were: For New South Wales, 11'59 per thousand; Queensland, 12'24; Victoria, 12'90. The birth rate for New South Wales was 28'20 per thousand; Queensland, 29'81; Victoria, only 26'39. The excess of births over deaths was, in New South Wales, 16'61; in Queensland, 17'57; and in Victoria, only 13'49; or 4 per thousand less than the figures for Queensland. In the face of such statistics—which are compiled not by a Queensland statistician, but by one who is, I suppose, one of the ablest statisticians in the world—I do not think that the mere barren assertions of those who are interested in introducing cheap and servile labour into the tropical parts of Australia ought to carry very much weight. In considering this question, and trying to be fair to those who have embarked capital in sugar cultivation, we have to remember that owing to the State assistance to the industry in the period of its initiation, a number of people were induced to go into it who expected to realize very large fortunes in a very short time, and to return with their thousands to the other side of the world, to live in luxury and ease for the remainder of their lives. They thought that to be a sugar-planter in Queensland meant to live a kind of Arcadian existence, swinging in a hammock under the palm trees, with a kanaka woman, or a coloured woman, or some other woman, fanning him to keep the flies off, whilst low-paid labour was doing the graft in the fields and making a fortune for the proprietor. Induced by such ideas, a number of people rushed into the industry, with the result that many of our large sugar plantations—like some of our Queensland squatting properties, and some in other States—became enormously over-capitalized. Many of them had three rates of interest to be derived from the crop before the profits were reaped; and after the profits were taken the little residue was divided up amongst the labourers who did the work. A very small amount, we may be sure, was left for them. That is one of the reasons why it has been claimed that the industry does not pay. But when we come to consider the yield of sugar per acre, and the price to the sugar-growers, with the cost of cultivation, it may be asserted without fear of contradiction—or, at any rate, without fear of proof to the contrary—that there is no more profitable crop in the Commonwealth than sugar. The bonus, so we understood, was given in order to tide over the change between the employment of coloured labour and the employment of white labour, the employment of coloured labour being made necessary, possibly, by the over-capitalization of the industry in its beginnings. The Queensland Government had allowed the kanaka to be brought in, and this cheap labour, with the consequent huge profits, led to over-capitalization; and when the charges are met now, the margin which is left for the payment of other than the cheapest labour, is small. It would not be just, I think, at this juncture, to make those who went into the industry on those conditions the sole sufferers.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Would the honorable member like to renew the bonus?

Mr. Wilkinson.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Yes, for a further term.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Have the growers not been given enough?

Mr. WILKINSON.—I do not think so.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—For how long would the honorable member extend the bonus?

Mr. WILKINSON.—I shall deal with that matter presently. The honorable member for Kooyong seemed to be at a loss to account for the small increase of the acreage under sugar cultivation. The explanation is largely that the white grower, who hitherto has, in the main, been a small holder, registered the whole of his farm, and not only that part under cultivation. The table which was quoted by the Treasurer, and which does not go further back than 1904, stands in need of some rectification. The acres under cultivation by white labour is there shown at 45,424 acres, the yield from which was about 39,404 tons of sugar. The acres, it will be seen, number more than the tons of sugar produced, and that is accounted for by the fact that the whole of the farm was registered as cultivated by white labour, whereas a considerable area was not under cultivation. On the other hand, we find that in the same year, 74,375 acres were cultivated by means of black labour, and 105,000 tons of sugar produced. From this it would appear that the results of the black labour were considerably greater than those of the white labour, but the explanation I have already given largely accounts for the figures. If we were to confine ourselves to the area cultivated by white labour, we should find that the yield per acre does not materially differ from that of the land cultivated by black labour. I am certainly in favour of a further extension of the bounty. I should continue the bounty so long as there is a pound of sugar grown by other than white labour in Queensland, and I should do so in order to penalize those who continue to grow by black labour.

Mr. GROOM.—The honorable member would continue the excise?

Mr. WILKINSON.—I should continue the bounty, or increase it and the excise. I do not know that there is much hope of increasing the excise, but the proper course, if we are to reap the full benefit of a bounty, would be to exact the same amount in excise that we do in the shape of duty on all cane grown by coloured labour, giving back as much as we possibly can of the excise, less the cost of administering the Act, to those who are striving honestly to cultivate their holdings by means of white labour, and to carry out the ideal of a white Australia. Failing that, I welcome the announcement by the Government that they are disposed to extend the bounty for a further term of five years. There has been talk of extending the bounty for twenty years. After any extension I should like to see the bounty wiped out on a sliding scale. Honorable members must not forget that considerable revenue is realized from the excise.

Mr. BAMFORD. — Honorable members forget that fact.

Mr. WILKINSON. — The other day honorable members were pointing out that the Commonwealth had almost reached the end of its financial tether. We are now receiving something over £400,000 in excise duties on sugar, over and above the amount paid back in bounties to the grower; and, if I am correct, we are just about within that sum from the limit of our spending power. If we cease to collect this excise, we shall have to look for revenue from some other source. I listened with great interest and pleasure to the temperate speech of the honorable member for Franklin the other day.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That speech contained a lot of information.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It did; and it was a speech at which no one could take offence.

Mr. TUDOR. — There was no "stone-walling."

Mr. WILKINSON.—No, there was no "stone-walling." No one can charge me with taking part in either a conspiracy of obstruction or a conspiracy of silence. When I have anything to say, I say it without asking the permission of any one; but I remain silent when, in my opinion, silence will further the business of the country, and I think my example might be copied by some other honorable members. The honorable member referred to the effect which the bounty had on the manufacture of jam, and showed that it paid the jam manufacturers to use imported sugar, paying a duty of £6 per ton, rather than Australian sugar, which pays an excise of only £3 per ton.

Mr. HARPER.—That, of course, refers only to jam for export.

Mr. WILKINSON. — Just so. The manufacturer, who imports sugar for the manufacture of jam for export, gets a rebate of £5, whereas the rebate on the excise amounts to only £2 10s.; and, under the circumstances, we cannot be surprised that the imported sugar should be preferred.

Mr. HARPER.—That is only in reference to jam for export.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It makes no difference. When a man is importing sugar for the purpose of manufacturing jam for export, and he orders that sugar in the bulk, he will use it for the purpose of making jam for home consumption, there being no rebate on sugar used in the manufacture of jam for home consumption.

Mr. HARPER. — Manufacturers will use both classes of sugar.

Mr. WILKINSON.—According to the evidence given by the honorable member for Franklin—

Mr. HARPER.—The honorable member was wrong.

Mr. WILKINSON.—According to the honorable member for Franklin, only one-fourteenth of the amount of sugar he mentioned was Australian-grown sugar. I should be glad if some means could be discovered by which Australian-grown sugar might be profitably used in the manufacture of Australian jam. As, however, the rebate is allowed only on imported sugar used in the manufacture of jam for export, the Australian jam, which must compete in the markets of the world, must be manufactured of sugar that does not pay duty. We should, therefore, while doing no good to our sugar industry, be injuring the jam manufacturers and fruit-growers of Australia materially, if we were to decide not to continue to grant the rebate. I do not see how we are to obviate the necessity for the use of foreign sugar in jam manufacture without injury to the jam manufacturers of Australia and the fruit-growers of the Commonwealth. I suppose there will be a good deal of opposition to the proposed extension of the time for the payment of the sugar bounties, but I ask honorable members, who feel disposed to oppose the proposal, to remember that there are very high principles at stake. From the beginning of the Commonwealth, there seems to have been an almost unanimous opinion, not only in the Federal Parliament, but throughout the Commonwealth, that one of the greatest ideals which could possess us is that of preserving the Australian race, so far as we possibly can, in its purity, as an European race. It may appear that we are paying a little dearly for our efforts to realize that ideal, but I do not think it can be said that we are paying too much.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable member said that the sugar industry is the best paying industry in Australia.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It would be if it were not handicapped, as I have said before, by being over-capitalized, owing to the inducements held out to people to put capital into the industry under improper conditions. These inducements were due very largely to State encouragement of the industry. I recommend the honorable member for Robertson to secure a copy of the work published by Miss Florence Shaw. When she visited Australia as a representative of The Times she went very minutely into this question, and also into the question of the occupation of pastoral lands. What she has said on some matters connected with Australia is not well founded, but what she has to say with regard to pastoral occupation and to the occupation of sugar lands in Queensland is well worthy of perusal and study. She proves conclusively, by tracing the money from the cane-fields back to its source, that it is borrowed and re-borrowed, and that there are heavy brokerage charges, interest charges, and so on, connected with the capitalization of the sugar industry.

Mr. HARPER.—A great deal of the money never came back. We never saw a shilling of it.

Mr. WILKINSON.—How was it swallowed up?

Mr. HARPER.—That is what Queenslanders might tell us. We do not know here. We never saw any of the money come back.

Mr. WILKINSON.—A Victorian who loses sight of his money is a rara avis. Victorians have the reputation in Australia of being almost as cute in this respect as Yankees. I admit that we in Queensland have to thank the enterprise and speculative spirit of Victorians for much. We have no desire to deny our obligations to them. We know that they have helped materially in the development of the State. On the other hand, they will doubtless admit that their trade with Queensland is of very great assistance in the development of Victorian manufactures. The advantage of the association of the people of the two States has been mutual. If Victorians have lost money in Queensland speculations, it is possible that there are some Queenslanders who have lost money in Victorian and in New South Wales speculations.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Are the debentures of the sugar companies held by Queenslanders?

Mr. WILKINSON.—A very large amount of the money invested in the industry came from the old country.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does the honorable member refer to the Colonial Sugar Refining Company?

Mr. WILKINSON.—The Colonial Sugar Refining Company has a number of the plantations, and of the planters also, under its thumb. I refer to that company for a moment in order to emphasize what has been said by the honorable member for Franklin, and by some honorable members on both sides of the House, with regard to the monopoly it possesses, admitting of an annual profit of nearly 20 per cent. I contend that the institution which takes that percentage out of an industry becomes a monopoly, and that it should be taken over by the Commonwealth or by the State, in order that the people who are at its mercy might be rescued from its clutches. If honorable members will notice the half-yearly reports of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, they will find that it regularly declares a 10 per cent. dividend on capital. That capital has been accumulated in various ways.

Mr. HARPER.—It has been paid up.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I question whether it has all been paid up. I notice that when the company divides £100,000 in a 10 per cent. dividend, it usually carries £90,000 or £93,000 over to the reserve fund. Will the honorable member for Mernda say that £100,000 represents the whole of the annual profits of the company?

Mr. TUDOR.—The company at the present time has accumulated about £500,000 of undivided profits.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I have noted the balance-sheets of the company very carefully for a number of years past, and the annual profits run to something like £190,000 a year.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Why does the honorable member desire to nurse the company any longer?

Mr. MAUGER.—It is a good job that something is paying in Australia.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I repeat that an institution that takes a profit of 20 per cent. out of an industry has become a monopoly which should be taken over by the State.

Mr. HARPER.—The company has never distributed any more than a 10 per cent. dividend.

Mr. TUDOR.—The company lets land to Chinamen, and will not give white men a chance.

Mr. WILKINSON. — The leasing of land to Chinese is a feature of the company's operations which will soon have to be dealt with. I am glad to notice that the State Government of Queensland is moving in the direction of imposing some restriction on the practice. There are a number of other matters with which I should like to deal, but I shall confine myself to one or two of special importance, which the Government might consider when dealing with the establishment of an agricultural bureau, such as was referred to by the Prime Minister this afternoon, in answer to my questions concerning the institution of an entomological and bacteriological laboratory. The honorable and learned gentleman has announced, on several occasions, the willingness of the Government to endeavour to foster rural industries of various kinds for new products. There is, in my opinion, a wide field open to us in this direction. I may mention one or two industries to which some attention might be given. It may be thought, when I mention the cultivation of cotton, that I harp on that industry somewhat unduly. But when we consider the enormous amount of money which is sent out of Australia yearly for cotton goods, the suitability of Australia for the production of cotton, and the possibilities of cotton manufacture in the Commonwealth, the question is one which might well occupy the attention of the Government, with a view to seeing whether it is not possible to establish this great industry. Then I might refer to linseed, flax, and castor oil. Last year, we imported linseed to the value of £5,023; linseed meal, £103; linseed cake and oil, £9,451; and linseed oil, £104,096; the total value of the products of this plant introduced reaching £118,673.

Then, with respect to castor oil, the castor oil plant will grow like a weed from Northern New South Wales up to Cape Yorke. I notice that in Victoria it is grown as a kind of garden plant, but it may be seen growing on the edges of scrubs, in gullies, and ravines, in almost any part of Queensland. Whether the plant can be grown profitably in competition with that grown in India I am not prepared to say. At any rate, it is a fit subject for inquiry.

Mr. HARPER.—The plant would grow well enough here.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Yes; it grows like a weed. I have seen a small plantation of it in Queensland, grown for economic purposes, from which oil of a very superior character was obtained. We import £36,525 worth of castor oil in bulk, besides what comes in in bottles; and the earth-nut, or pea-nut, from which China oil—of which we import £21,869 worth—is obtained, will grow like grass here. We import a considerable quantity from the New Hebrides, where the plant grows, and from India; but neither place is more suitable for it than are some parts of Australia. Indeed, in some places in Australia it has been found difficult to eradicate it. We import £6,973 worth of cotton-seed oil in bulk; and recently I had a letter from Messrs J. Kitchen and Sons, of Melbourne, about some cotton-seed oil expressed from cotton-seed sent down from Queensland last season. A sample area was under cultivation for cotton in Queensland last season, and twenty tons of cotton-seed were sent to Melbourne. The firm to which I have referred forwarded to me a sample of cotton-seed oil cake, and some cotton-seed oil. The fluff had not been removed from the cotton-seed, so that the sample of oil cake in question could not be used for fodder; but I am satisfied that when there is machinery to deal with the seed in the proper way, a good commercial article will be obtained. The letter says—

We are expecting our decorticator to arrive in the course of a few weeks, when we shall be prepared to decorticate the seed, and shall then have a very nutritive cake, more nutritive in every way than copra cake, made from cocoanut. We have received from Queensland this season about twenty-five tons of cotton seed; this embraces the whole of their harvest this year. We are in great hopes that next year a larger area will be grown, and as soon as we can see our way clear to get the required quantity of cotton-seed we have the machinery already here to send over to Queensland to start the manufacture of cotton-seed oil cake and cotton-seed oil. We are large importers of cotton-seed oil, and if we could get it grown in the Commonwealth, and consequently free from duty, we could use a very much larger quantity of it. To me it seems a pity that the growing of cotton should be so languishing, when it might be made the very largest industry in the Commonwealth.

However, I attach more importance to the value of the cotton fibre than to the value of cotton-seed oil. At one time there was a factory at work in Queensland which employed nearly 100 operatives, about half of whom were males and the other half females. These are some new products which I think might reasonably be encouraged by the Government when dealing with the matter. I congratulate the Minister of Home Affairs on the fact that he has decided to insist, as far as possible, upon the use of Australian timbers for public works. In the past we have been too much given to preferring imported timbers, and are only just realizing the value of a possession which we have been allowing to go to waste, although persons outside the Commonwealth have long ago realized its value, and even the British Admiralty is beginning to recognise the usefulness of Australian timber, as the following cablegram shows—

Australian teak is being tried for the backing of armour plates on the armoured cruiser Minotaur, 14,600 tons, 44 guns, which is now undergoing repairs.

When the Tariff was under discussion, it was decided, after a long debate, that Oregon pine should be admitted duty free, because it was needed in the mines; but the following paragraph shows that inquiries for Queensland timber are now coming from Oregon itself—

The Queensland timber exhibit at the Oregon Exhibition has attracted some attention. The Department of Agriculture have a letter from Messrs. J. A. Martin and Company, of Portland, in which they speak favorably of the timber, and ask for quotations. They ask for the price per 1,000 feet delivered at Portland, Oregon, of the following varieties:—Iron-bark, silky oak, silk-wood, hoop pine, maple, red cedar, bean, bunya pine, blue gum, red stringy bark, tallow wood, and quondong.

There seems to be some prejudice against the Queensland hoop pine on the part of the people of the other States, despite the fact that the whole export of Queensland butter, which amounts to 50,000 boxes annually, is sent away in boxes made of that pine, and there has been no complaint about its being tainted or injured in any way. Quite recently the Queensland Department of Agriculture made exhaustive tests to determine whether butter stored in boxes made of New Zealand white pine kept better than butter stored in boxes made of Queensland hoop pine. Both freshly-cut and well-seasoned timbers were experimented with, but the result proved the superiority of the Queensland pine over the New Zealand pine. In view of the fact that, under Inter-State free-trade, Queensland has become such a large customer of Victorian produce, not only the products of her soil, but also of her factories, it is not unreasonable to ask that the dairymen of Victoria and New South Wales should, as far as possible, use the timber produced in the northern sister State. I have the report of the Inspector of Public Works in Queensland, with regard to other timbers, but I do not propose to trespass on the attention of honorable members at any greater length, so far as that subject is concerned. I would urge the Government to encourage the formation of cadet corps in all parts of the Commonwealth. Every honorable member who has spoken on the subject of defence has emphasized the necessity of establishing such corps and of beginning the training of our young men for defence purposes in the schools. In this, however, as in other things, there is a disposition to place the burden on the other fellow. We are willing that other people should be drilled and taught how to shoot, but I do not suppose there are many honorable members who ever think of using a rifle. It is hardly to be expected that we shall always be immune from aggression. I believe that, in the event of any attack being made upon us, we shall be able to give a good account of ourselves, provided the means are at hand to enable us to do so. The men will not be wanting, because, if regard be paid to the number of males in the Commonwealth capable of bearing arms, it will be found that we could put a considerable army in the field. But, supposing we were called upon to do any such thing, what arms would be available? According to Coghlan, we had, in the Commonwealth, in 1901, when the last census was taken, 1,082,193 adult males, whilst there were also 101,956 males between the ages of fifteen and twenty-one, while the males over sixty years of age numbered 54,813. If we added to the number of adult males the males between the ages of fifteen and twenty-one, and subtracted the number of adult males over sixty years of age, we should have a total of 1,129,336 males capable of bearing arms. Without taking into account the males between fifteen and twenty-one years of age, or the males over 60 years of age, we should have a total of 1,027,380 males capable of bearing arms. Therefore, we need have no fear, so far as our resources in that direction are concerned, especially when we remember the willingness with which our young men recently volunteered for service in a country not their own. The question is—How could we arm these men? We are spending hundreds of thousands of pounds upon defences, and a very large amount is devoted to scarlet and gold braid, whilst the number of rifles that we have at our command is barely sufficient to arm our ordinary Defence Forces.

Mr. McCAY.—The scarlet and gold braid is paid for out of the pockets of those who wear them.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It costs us a good deal to keep up such a large number of officers.

Mr. McCAY.—No, it does not.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I would not attempt to set my opinion against that of the honorable and learned member, who is undoubtedly an authority on defence matters, and whose recent speech will be read with interest not only throughout the Commonwealth, but also in other parts of the Empire. Still, I think that the honorable and learned member will admit that a good deal of money has been spent upon what may be called ornamentation—in military displays, parades, and reviews, and that kind of thing, which are more ornamental than useful.

Mr. McCAY.—A very small amount is spent upon ceremonial parades; the conditions are much better than they used to be.

Mr. WILKINSON.—In my opinion there is still too much spent in that manner. There may be some use in ceremonial parades, but I think for the most part they are ornamental.

Mr. McCAY.—Ceremonial parades are practically wholly ornamental.

Mr. WILKINSON.—At any rate, whatever amount may be spent in that direction at present might be more usefully devoted to providing arms for those who are willing to bear them, to the encouragement of rifle clubs, and the establishment of cadet corps. If we begin the training of our youths whilst they are attending school, they will never forget what they are taught there, even though they may afterwards drop out of the Defence Force. Whatever alterations may be made in the drill manuals, they will have such a sound rudimentary knowledge that they will be able, if occasion requires, to quickly pick up their drill at a later stage. So far as drill is concerned, the men could be readily "licked into shape," but they could not be taught to shoot without spending a good deal of time in practice, and without considerable cost to themselves. As an old member of rifle clubs, I know that there are thousands of men in the Commonwealth who, if they had encouragement and facilities offered to them, would be prepared to spend a good deal of time and money in making themselves efficient rifle shots and in otherwise qualifying themselves to act as defenders of the Commonwealth.

Mr. McCAY.—What further facilities would the honorable member suggest?

Mr. WILKINSON.—I should allow the members of rifle clubs a more liberal supply of ammunition at a low price.

Mr. McCAY.—Each man is allowed 200 rounds free, and 230 rounds at half price.

Mr. WILKINSON.—A larger quantity of ammunition might reasonably be allowed, and some alteration should be made in the conditions under which the ammunition is used. I think that at present too much ammunition is expended in firing at fixed targets, lying down, and with all the conditions in favour of good scoring—conditions utterly different from those which prevail in actual warfare. I am glad to notice that many improvements have been made in the direction of the use of moving and disappearing targets, and firing at men's heads and shoulders, but even in the cases in which such objects are fired at, the distances are measured. It is essential not only to teach men how to sight their rifles for certain distances, but to judge distances. The men should be kept moving over the field of fire, and be halted at various points at the discretion of the officer, and ordered to fire at certain objects under conditions which would necessitate the exercise of the marksman's judgment as to distance.

Mr. McCAY.—There is nothing to prevent members of rifle clubs from using their ammunition in that way. They are supposed to use thirty rounds per man for field firing.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It may be that there is nothing to prevent members of rifle clubs from doing as has been suggested, but they naturally prefer to shoot under conditions which will enable them to score the greatest number of bull's-eyes. All old riflemen know how pleasing it is to hit the bull's-eye and see the white disc coming up, and so long as it is optional for men to shoot at fixed or moving targets, they will choose the former. If, however, it were compulsory for them to use a certain proportion of their ammunition in field firing they would become much more efficient for the purposes of actual warfare. I would urge also that more liberality should be shown in the matter of travelling expenses.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member will see that better provision than formerly has been made in the Estimates.

Mr. WILKINSON.—In this matter, I think that the States might reasonably meet the Commonwealth. After all, in defending the Commonwealth, we are defending the States. It would cost the latter little or nothing to occasionally carry a few men over their railways. Seeing that the members of rifle clubs are willing to give their time gratis, and to spend their money in defraying part of the cost of the ammunition which they use, in paying markers' fees, entrance fees, &c., the States would be going very little out of their way if they afforded them reasonable travelling facilities, so that they might obtain the firing practice which is so necessary to make them proficient marksmen.

Mr. McCAY.—The tendency of the States is to raise the rates for carrying members of the Defence Force upon the railways, rather than to lower them.

Mr. WILKINSON.—That is characteristic of their action in regard to every Department which has been taken over by the Commonwealth, and notably in regard to the Post and Telegraph Department. Immediately after the accomplishment of Federation the States found it necessary to increase the rates chargeable for the carriage of mails upon the railways, in spite of the fact that there had been no increase in the volume of mail matter. It seems to me unreasonable that the States should complain of the increased cost of administration by the Commonwealth when they know perfectly well that a great deal of that increase is due to the additional charges which they have levied upon the Commonwealth Exchequer.

Of course, it may be said that this all means extra taxation. I am aware that it does. But taxation does not necessarily imply that there is an absolute loss to the taxpayer. For example, a man may pay an insurance premium to protect himself against possible loss; and in the same way I contend that the defence vote in Australia partakes of the nature of an insurance fund. Then, again, an individual who is taxed in order to give effect to some scheme for water conservation, may, as a result of that expenditure, have the value of his property increased ten-fold. The taxpayer is too prone to look at the immediate burden imposed upon him by any State undertaking, and to take no cognisance of the benefits which are likely to flow from expenditure in legitimate channels. I hope that before very long the question of water conservation and irrigation, which was referred to last week by the honorable member for Corangamite—a question which I know the Prime Minister has very close at heart—will become a burning one throughout the Commonwealth. Of course, to make productive portions of the continent which may now be regarded as a desert, would involve the expenditure of much money. But although that expenditure might constitute a heavy drain upon the resources of the Commonwealth at the present time, I claim that it would be abundantly justified, and would eventually be returned one-hundredfold. The Treasurer knows, perhaps, better than any other man in Australia, that a large portion of the interior of this country to which we have been taught to refer as "the Great Australian Desert," is a desert only in certain seasons. Some explorers have described it as a desert, whilst others who have passed through it only a few months later, have depicted it as a land of promise—literally a garden of Eden. If, by the expenditure of money, we can redeem that so-called desert country, and make it available for settlement, I believe with a recent writer in the Age, that it is not too remote from our ports to become capable of supporting a very large and thriving population. The land possesses the fertility; it lacks only the moisture. Those who have visited that portion of the country are aware that its river-beds are magnificent in their proportions, and that along them millions of gallons of water annually run to waste to the southern seas. If some of that water were conserved in the billabongs, the lakes, and even in the rivers themselves it might be used to render productive the land adjacent to it, and to modify the climatic conditions not only of the interior, but of the rest of the Commonwealth, by reason of the greater humidity which would be imparted to the atmosphere, thereby creating greater density in the clouds, and bringing about a greater precipitation of rain than we have at present. However we may differ in regard to the methods which should be employed to develop this country, it is admitted on all hands that one of the great needs of to-day is an influx of desirable immigrants. To this end various projects have been suggested. In the early portion of my address, I endeavoured to show that suitable immigrants were deterred from coming to Australia by the slanderous statements which are constantly being circulated by those who owe their all to the country. I now propose to give my opinion regarding the manner in which desirable immigrants may be attracted to the Commonwealth. Personally, I would go so far as to make land free to any individual who chose to go upon it, irrespective of whether or not he came from abroad.

Mr. MAUGER.—We cannot do that. It is a matter in which the States must take action.

Mr. WILKINSON. — I am aware of that. At the same time, the Commonwealth can indicate to the States the way in which they may assist us to give effect to the very laudable ambition of the Prime Minister. The encouragement of immigration is a matter for co-operation between the Commonwealth and the States Governments. If the States will offer liberal inducements to persons to settle upon their lands, there will be no dearth of suitable immigrants. If we can show that Australia is a country worth living in, and worth dying for, there will be no lack of desirable settlers. On the other hand, if we decry the Commonwealth, and declare that it is a country which is not fit to live in, we cannot hope to increase our population from that source. Though the land which is close to the coast may not be available for settlement, we have only to utilize the waters which are now running to waste for irrigation purposes, and we shall have a sufficient area of productive land upon which to settle as many millions as are to be found in the United States—the great republic of the west. We have as glorious a country as there is upon God's earth, and it will be our fault—not that of others, who do not know what are the conditions of life here and who do not understand what are the possibilities of Australia in the matter of affording them a better means of livelihood than they can obtain elsewhere—if by means of lantern lectures, and by exhibitions of our produce, we do not advertise the truth regarding it, instead of allowing slanders to be circulated in the populous countries of the world, where people are seeking outlets for their energy and capital. We wish to attract immigrants to Australia, and we can achieve our object by telling them the truth about the country. I desire to see the Commonwealth attracting to its shores streams of immigrants as large as those which are flowing towards the western continent, America. More to be desired than the piling up of wealth by a few individuals is the settlement throughout Australia of hundreds of thousands—nay, millions—of persons who will use their own labour upon the land which they possess. Whether that land be held upon perpetual lease, or whether it be freehold, is a mere matter of detail. We have millions of acres of idle lands. Let us secure millions of hands to cultivate those broad acres. We need then have no fear as to the defence of the country, and shall never be short of a million or two to devote to public works. I believe, with an old heathen philosopher, that that country is best—

Where spades grow bright, and idle words grow dull;
Where jails are empty, and where barns are full;
Where church-paths are with frequent feet outworn;
Law-court-yards weedy, silent, and forlorn.
Where doctors foot it, and where farmers ride;
Where age abounds, and youth is multiplied;
Where these signs are they clearly indicate
A happy people and well-governed State.

I hope the day is not far distant—indeed, I believe that if the present Government be assisted to this end by honorable members generally, it is almost at hand—when the condition of things which this old-time philosopher has described will be brought about in Australia.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—The Committee have had the privilege of listening to a very excellent speech by the honorable member who has just resumed his seat. The honorable member dealt largely with the possibilities in the matter of cotton cultivation that confront Australia, and while it is to be hoped that the industry will be encouraged by the infusion of capital from abroad on satisfactory commercial lines, I certainly trust that no attempt will be made to bolster it up by means of bonuses, although, judging by his remarks with regard to the sugar industry, the honorable member would favour the adoption of that system. This is an occasion on which we should devote special attention to the Budget, and I should like, at the outset, to congratulate the Treasurer upon the very excellent speech he delivered in submitting his financial statement. To my mind, it is the best Budget statement that has yet been delivered in this House. Australia would never have federated, unless it had been shown to the satisfaction of the people that the union would be a financial success, and that upon financial lines the union would be beneficial to every State. In all previous Budget statements, however, little or no attention has been devoted to that point. It appears to me that the momentous question of the consolidation of the States debts, which must occupy the attention of the Parliament again and again until that task has been accomplished, received very little attention from the right honorable member for Balaclava when he occupied the important office of Treasurer. His successor has not only given much prominence to it, but has propounded a practicable scheme that is likely to meet with the approval of the States. The right honorable gentleman has gone further; he has clearly shown that if Australia secured a large influx of population from Europe, her future would be assured, and I feel satisfied that with such an influx, the benefits to which he referred in his peroration as being the result of the progress made by Australia during the last fifty years would be multiplied tenfold. I followed his remarks on this branch of the Budget statement with more than usual interest, for the reason that I had recently paid a visit to Western Australia, and had witnessed the beneficial result of the policy of which he gave us a brief outline. Not only do the Government of Western Australia, like that of the Dominion of Canada, give free grants of land to immigrants, but they have followed the practice of Germany and other continental countries where, by means of land banks, the people are not only placed on the soil, but are provided with the means of successfully engaging in rural occupations. That system has been followed by Western Australia to the extent that the State provides settlers with means to work the land given to them. The result is that after a period of some twelve or fourteen years, since my previous visit, I found on travelling through the agricultural districts of that State a few months ago that extensive settlement had taken place, and that there was a remarkable improvement in all directions. I was also informed by the Government land agents that applications for grants were coming in so rapidly that they could not be immediately complied with. All this has been the outcome of the broad and comprehensive policy laid down by the Treasurer when Premier of Western Australia—a policy which he has told us might be adopted with advantage by the Commonwealth. This system of assisting the settler to work his land has been in operation in Canada, and—through the agency of land banks—on the continent of Europe for twenty-five or thirty years, and yet no failure has been recorded against it. If, through the instrumentality of the Treasurer—who, I am sure, has great influence with the finance Ministers of the States Governments—it could be brought into operation as part of the Commonwealth policy, a glorious future would await us.

Mr. BROWN.—It would be called Socialism.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I do not think that it would. It is a well-worn scheme in Canada and other countries, but, unfortunately, owing to a lack on the part of the politicians of the States of that enterprise, that is so necessary to push forward a broad and comprehensive scheme of settlement. Western Australia is the only State of the Union in which it has been adopted. I should like to know whether I am correct in assuming, from the remarks made by the Treasurer in delivering the Budget, that he is in favour of the Government assisting immigration?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am certainly in favour of it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is a great advance, and it is a very courageous proposition to make. It is one which I thought would not be tolerated by a section of the House, known as the Labour Party; whereas it has been very well received, and has evoked no opposition. The question of immigration is one to which the late Sir Henry Parkes devoted so much attention, when he entered public life, and, to which, apart from Federation, he devoted special attention before he died. I am glad to find that it is revived by the Treasurer. If it is taken up with earnestness by the Government, I feel sure that it will receive a good deal of assistance from the several States interested in an influx of population and settlement on the lands. I have heard it said that population is not required, because land cannot be found for the men to work. There is very excellent land in every State of the Union. In the central part of New South Wales there is enough land for millions of people. Many holdings which now comprise millions of acres are found to be suitable for agriculture, and if a system of immigration were established it would bring people here who could settle and make a very fine living, contributing much to the prosperity of Australia. Some time ago, it was the custom to talk about the expenses of Federation. I was in favour of the establishment of the Commonwealth, and I agreed with those who had estimated that Australia could be federated and governed on the basis of an annual expenditure of £300,000. According to the statement of the Treasurer, 2s. 5d. per head of the population is the actual cost of government, the total coming within the estimated limit of £300,000 a year.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Was not that estimate made before Queensland was expected to join the Union?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Possibly it was, and, if so, it will leave a small margin for certain expenditure which must take place when the services outlined in the Budget are taken over. It is satisfactory to find that the "new" expenditure has not exceeded that estimate. The Treasurer paid some attention to the question of taking over British New Guinea. In deciding to accept that Possession, we have undertaken a very great expenditure. We have to provide a sum of about £20,000 a year, while the revenue of the Possession is not sufficient by one-half for its proper government. I believe that some legislation should be introduced by which the Possession should be made self-supporting. From its native products, in its uncultivated state, it supports a native population of nearly half-a-million. This goes to show that when the enterprise of the European is brought to bear very great results may be attained. I hope that the Government will do something in the way of bringing population to the Possession.

There is one question which stands out above others with which we must deal, and that is, the consolidation of the States debts. Under the Constitution we have power to take over States debts to the amount of £202,000. If these were taken over, the saving which was always promised to the people from Federation, would be effected. On a very rough estimate, we find that it would amount to £1,350,000.

Mr. WILSON.—How would it be effected?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The interest which is paid by the several States averages 3·67 per cent., but with the proceeds obtained from the issue of Commonwealth debentures the debts could be paid off as they matured, with a saving of possibly  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent.

Mr. WILSON.—But the quotations to-day do not warrant that statement.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—This is a matter which has been gone into carefully by financiers, and, while I say that  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. would be saved, that is the basis on which the calculations were made when the Conferences sat prior to Federation. Financiers say even to-day that the saving effected would be about  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. That is the sum which it is estimated would be saved within the Commonwealth.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—Does the honorable member mean a saving of  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. in interest?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Three-quarters per cent. in the interest on the present bonded debts of the several States.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That would be spread over a period of fifty years.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No, nearly the whole of the debts would be covered in a period of twenty years, and a saving of about £1,350,000 per annum to the States would be effected by the change.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member is assuming that we could float 3 per cent. loans.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am assuming that the Commonwealth would be able to float 3 per cent. loans. There is nothing extraordinary in that supposition when it is remembered that we can pledge the Customs revenue as a guarantee for the payment of the debt. Every debt which is guaranteed in Europe in that way stands at the most satisfactory rate in the British money market. We have exclusive control of the Customs, and we can also raise revenue by direct taxation. The best possible security could be offered to debenture-holders, and there is little doubt but that we should be able to issue permanent stock on the London market at 3 per cent.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is not the universal rule. The Customs revenue of Greece is hypothecated to English bond-holders.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There is no universal rule. The money market is regulated by the character of the security that is offered. If, for instance, we take the republics of South America, we find that, as the security is of a very unsatisfactory character, the rates of interest are very high. But when I take a country like Australia, with the resources which it is known to possess, and with results such as those stated by the Treasurer; when I consider the amount of trade which is being conducted from our shores with foreign parts, and the amount of private wealth which is held by our people, there is little doubt in my mind but that 3 per cent. stocks would be taken up. If then we were able to consolidate the public debts, and issue debentures for the purpose at 3 per cent., there would be approximately a saving of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. to Australia. That is what was held out to the public when Federation was advocated, and that is what they expect to see realized. Until it is realized the Commonwealth will not have given satisfaction. The Treasurer, in outlining the subject to which I have referred—although I am not quite sure that he has pledged himself exactly to what I have said—does say that there should be an understanding with the States Treasurers that money should not be raised outside Australia by them for internal purposes. We have evidence that money can be raised by the States on Treasury bills on a 4 per cent. basis. It will not, therefore, be very difficult for the States to raise money on short-dated notes in Australia; and such securities would not clash with the stock of the Commonwealth that would be quoted upon the London money market. But there would have to be a reserve of from one-half to one per cent. on the part of the States for the purpose of redeeming, at intervals, part of the £31,000,000 sterling that remains due over the amount that we have power to take over under the Constitution. With that 1 per cent. accruing, there is little doubt but that the selling price of the bonds could be regulated in London to such an extent as to keep the price fairly level. The tendency would be, under such circumstances, for bond-holders to realize, and take over the Commonwealth security as being better than the security of any individual State. There would be another great advantage in the Commonwealth consolidating the debts. Whilst in England there is power to invest trust funds in Australian securities, it is not availed of to any great extent, because the Commonwealth guarantee is not at the back of the security of the States. The Customs revenue having been taken from the States, financiers in London would much prefer Commonwealth stock to that of the separate States. Australian security is excellent, but the taking up of bonds in England is like the taking of securities in Australia or anywhere else. They are held by large corporations, and in large sums by investors, and are dealt with in the ordinary course of business. Persons going to their agents for investment would have these securities placed before them, with a recommendation; and we can depend upon it that such persons would always prefer the security of the Commonwealth to that of any one State. In time the rate of interest would be much lower, the Commonwealth stock being a better security than a State stock. Nevertheless, the State of Western Australia has issued debentures in London at 3.40 per cent. on the security of Western Australia alone.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We raised a loan at 3 per cent. at par.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The Treasurer states that Western Australia floated a loan in London at 3 per cent. at par.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At nearly 101.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That, of course, was when Western Australia had control of the Customs. I take it that that loan was raised to be invested in railways or water-works in Western Australia. The point I was making was that while there would be the Commonwealth security offered to the bond-holders, there would also be a reserve of 1 per cent. This would be an additional inducement for the investor to tender for a large sum of money. The point that I am working up to is that there are hundreds of millions of trust funds in England of which we can never get a penny until we offer the best security available in Australia. The best security available to them is the Commonwealth security. This Parliament, by passing an Act, could make it a negotiable security; and I take it that the people of Australia will not be satisfied with Federation until such an Act has been passed, and the debts have been consolidated. We hear a great deal about the difficulties involved in taking over the debts of the States. But the more one thinks over the subject, the less difficult the problem appears. To my mind, it has become a question of ordinary performance. There is no need for an alteration of the Constitution. We know that £202,000,000 sterling might be taken over at any time by the Commonwealth, and the balance could be arranged for by the States themselves, and the interest paid periodically as it is paid now. But if we take over the debts of the States, we have an enormous responsibility. How are we to be recouped for this heavy expenditure, covering something like £8,000,000 per annum? It would necessitate an alteration of the Constitution to abolish the system that now prevails, under the Braddon section, of returning to the States three-fourths of the sum raised in Customs and Excise. That, I think, could be easily effected, if necessary; but it might be advisable to wait until the Braddon section has expired, and then not to renew it. The Treasurer's remarks on that point were a part of the Budget speech which I admired very much. I take it that the right honorable gentleman is not in favour of an extension of the period within which the Braddon section is to operate.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that I did not think that an extension of the time would be in the interest of the States.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I quite agree with the right honorable gentleman. I think it would be an advantage to the States to discontinue the section, either by an alteration of the Constitution, or by waiting, and not renewing it on its expiration.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is becoming liberal.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member had better join the Labour Party.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am a free-trader, and no free-trader could ever be in favour of the Braddon section.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not mean that the States should receive nothing from the Commonwealth.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—To be fair, I think the Treasurer stated that the States should receive out of Customs revenue a fixed sum, which is practically the system that prevails in Canada to-day. If we take over the debts, we must have revenue with which to pay interest.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Braddon clause would be inoperative then.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That would be so, when the whole of the debts were taken over.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When the debts are taken over, the revenue will not have to be returned to the States.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I was coming to that. The payment to the States must of necessity cease, because the Commonwealth will want all the revenue to meet the indebtedness. However, the States still say they want part of the money. But the Commonwealth would still be responsible for some hundreds of thousands of pounds—the amount payable on the bonded debt, in addition to that which is now returned to the several States of the union.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The amount is about £1,400,000.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Quite so; that is the sum the Commonwealth would still be short.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At the present time?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Yes; and every State of the Union would be largely indebted to the Commonwealth—that is, every State except Western Australia, which to-day raises more than £300,000 a year above the amount necessary for the payment of the interest on her debts. The State of Queensland, on the other hand, would be indebted to the extent of something like £800,000 a year. And I suppose it would be necessary for the Commonwealth to be indemnified for the very large expenditure of, say, £1,500,000 that would be undertaken in addition to the amount of revenue raised from the Customs. Is that not so?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is so.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is the problem we have to consider, and it is one which I, having thought over it for four or five years, think should be grappled by the Commonwealth. If the question be taken in hand, it will not be found to be so slippery as might be supposed by any person who has not thought out the matter thoroughly. It is a matter which may be dealt with successfully and effectively, to the satisfaction of the Commonwealth and every State of the Commonwealth. The Treasurer has told us that, although the Government have not thoroughly considered the matter, he has given to it much thought, and is prepared to go on with it; and this brings me to the expression of my opinion that the Commonwealth will never conduct itself to the satisfaction of the people until the Prime Minister is also Treasurer. The Prime Minister should have to deal with these questions day after day, in order to become familiar with the financial side of Commonwealth affairs.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable member assisted to turn out the only Government in which the Prime Minister was also Treasurer.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I was going to make some reference to the fact that the honorable member for Bland, when Prime Minister, was also Treasurer; and I may here say that I thoroughly agreed with the distribution of portfolios in that Government. I may further say that the Government to which I am now referring were very fortunate in having the honorable member for Coolgardie as Postmaster-General; indeed, the Commonwealth has been very fortunate in our Postmasters-General. There has never yet been a bad Postmaster-General; and had the House allowed the honorable member for Macquarie to remain in that position for two or three years longer, I think we should have been able to get enough revenue from the Department to almost run the Commonwealth. The honorable member for Macquarie, when Postmaster-General, must have saved the country about £71,000 a year, and, no doubt, the present Postmaster-General will, in his speech by and by, show us how the scheme then laid down will effect savings in the future.

Mr. GROOM.—What scheme is that?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I suppose that the Government must be reconstructed by-and-by, because it can never go on as it is now doing; and I hope that the Prime Minister will in future be also Treasurer. We shall never have a satisfactory financial statement until the Prime Minister is thoroughly acquainted with all the ins and outs of the finances. When the Prime Minister has carefully considered this question of the sugar bonus, and when he realizes that the sugar-planters of New South Wales are receiving £40,000 a year in bonuses to which they are not entitled, and which they do not want—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I believe the New South Wales planters do want the bonus, or, at any rate, they do not want to lose it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I know that the New South Wales planters do not want to lose the bonus, but what I want to say is that they did not require the bonus at the time it was conferred.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—At any rate, they never deserved it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Of course, now that the planters have got the bonus, they very naturally do not want to lose it; and why? Because it is all bonus to them.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Is the bonus not necessary?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There was no coloured labour employed in the sugar-fields of New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The members for the districts concerned seemed very anxious about the bonus.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I repeat that the planters of New South Wales did not want the bonus, but now that they have got it, they, of course, do not want to lose it.

Mr. MAHON.—They did not ask for the bonus.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Richmond assures me that the bonus is very necessary.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I do not think that any representative of that part of New South Wales would dare to come here, and say that it is not a good thing to give the sugar-planters £40,000 a year. I am satisfied, however, that if the Prime Minister, who is a conscientious public man, were also Treasurer, found that the sugar-planters of New South Wales were getting £40,000 a year, chiefly out of South Australia and Tasmania—

Mr. LEE.—The planters pay £60,000 in excise.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I think that if the Prime Minister realized that this money was being paid to men who do not require it, and did not ask for it, he would say that this was a question which should be reconsidered.

Mr. LEE.—The Government have dealt with it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The question has not been grappled with. Under the Constitution, there can be no discrimination; but it is quite possible for us to say that the bonus shall cease in five years—that over such a period it shall be a diminishing quantity. It is always hard to get rid of a bonus. If the bonus were continued for five years longer, there would then be an agitation for an extension for another five years. However, if we make it terminable, diminishing as the years go on, we shall get rid of the bonus entirely, and there will be very little fuss about the matter. The planters during the intervening years will be preparing for a new condition of affairs, when the bonus will have ceased.

Mr. LEE.—Would the honorable member also abolish the excise?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I had no intention of speaking on the sugar bonus question, in view of the fact that it has already been very exhaustively dealt with.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And it is also such a touchy subject!

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I think I have said enough to show the desirableness of the Prime Minister being also Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A very good idea, I think.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—How would it be to make the Treasurer the Prime Minister?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I shall put the position that way if honorable members desire. Knowing that the present Prime Minister was not in robust health, I was prepared to hear of a reconstruction of the Cabinet, and that the reconstruction had been in the direction indicated by the honorable member for Franklin. I dare say, however, that the Prime Minister has regained his wonted strength, and will go on for a few months longer. But the Prime Minister cannot possibly go on for long with these problems facing him. The people have had enough of the present position; and they want a saving of £1,750,000 per annum, and a discontinuance of the sugar bonus. They do not want the proposed bonuses for the iron industry. How are we going to raise all this money? We have no means of raising it. If the Prime Minister were Treasurer of the Commonwealth, I am satisfied that he would have none of this talk about bonuses. As I stated earlier in my address, the right honorable member for Balaclava, when Treasurer of Australia, never showed himself equal to the situation. It was not necessary for him to display any ingenuity in raising revenue. It has all been raised for him, and it has been more than enough. He did absolutely nothing in that direction. If honorable members require evidence of this, I refer them to the right honorable member for Balaclava himself. The right honorable gentleman has been in very ill-health. No sooner did he go out of office as Treasurer than his health improved, but as soon as somebody said to him, "You must make a speech on this Budget," he became ill again. Do honorable members mean to tell me that in such circumstances the right honorable member for Balaclava was a fit Minister of the Crown to have charge of the financial side of Commonwealth administration? He was not. Somebody must say these things.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What Administration was the right honorable gentleman in?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—He was in the Reid-McLean Administration, and in two Administrations before, and it is said that he would have been in the third if he had been asked.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That shows that all parties were glad to get him.

Mr. MALONEY.—If the right honorable gentleman is a sick man, the honorable member should let him alone.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have no intention of saying very much more, but the Age newspaper said a very great deal, and when one is disgusted with the palaver of the Age, one must say something. The right honorable member for Balaclava was Commonwealth Treasurer for some years, but he did not grapple with the financial problem. It is not a question of the man himself. No one has greater respect for the right honorable member personally than I have; but I say that, as Commonwealth Treasurer, he was a failure. These financial problems were not grappled with as they should have been.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable member tried very hard to grapple with them.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The right honorable gentleman did his best to grapple with them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The right honorable gentleman did as much as any living man could to grapple with them.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There was a Conference of Treasurers held in Melbourne, and only the other day we had another Conference held at Hobart. The late Treasurer made a proposal at the Conference held in Hobart, but he was quite satisfied to come away after having failed in his object.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The right honorable gentleman tried his best to succeed, and it was the cantankerous Premier of New South Wales who made all the trouble.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The Commonwealth Treasurer is a responsible Minister. If he is satisfied that a certain course should be taken, he should leave office unless that course is followed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He could not coerce the Premiers of the States by leaving office.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I was leading up to that. Are the Premiers of the States forming this Federation, to be consulted upon these Commonwealth questions?

Mr. ROBINSON.—We cannot take over the States debts without their consent.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes, we can.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am told that we cannot do these things, but we have full power under section 105 of the Constitution—

Mr. ROBINSON.—With the consent of the States.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We can take over £102,000,000 of States debts accumulated up to the time that the Federation was established.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We are unable to take over the £31,000,000 of States debts since incurred, even with their consent. Before we can take them over we must have the consent of the people of the Commonwealth to an alteration of the Constitution for the purpose. That is the position. At these Conferences the States have been consulted as to what we should do. The people of Australia have intrusted us with the conduct of the financial affairs of the Commonwealth, and are we to go to the States Ministers, when they represent individually a smaller section of the people than we do, and ask them what we shall do? They say—so I am told here—“We will not allow you to do certain things.” But the fact is that they should not have been consulted at all. The Commonwealth Government has, I presume, a financial policy.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Does the honorable member not think that we have a right to consult the States Premiers?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No, none whatever. They should not be consulted; we represent the people of Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am afraid the honorable member will not find many agreeing with him in that suggestion.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It is a matter of no consequence what individuals think. Do we not know that the people of Australia determined that there should be a Federation of the various States, and that under the Federal Constitution the Federal Government should have control of the Customs revenue, with the power to raise revenue by direct taxation in order that the whole of Australia might be governed in a uniform manner? Our Government is so uniform that in one instance we gave £40,000 to New South Wales when we knew that that money was not required by that State. It was given in order that legislation should be uniform as affecting Queensland and New South Wales. We have our powers under the Constitution, and we do not require to go to Conferences to ask the States Governments what we should do. We know how precarious are their political lives. Two States Governments have already gone out of power since the Conference has been held at Hobart. Why should we go to them for advice as to what we should do when we do not know that they have the confidence of their own Parliaments? Why should we ask them what we should do in Commonwealth affairs and in connexion with great financial questions—the very questions upon which Australia was federated? Amongst those questions was that of the taking over of the debts of the States. The States Governments say—“No, we want you to raise our revenue for us.” No public man displays pluck who thinks of raising all his revenue from one source. It is the willing horse once more, and we go to the poor man, tax every commodity he uses, and raise our money in that way. We should say to the States of the Union, “If we take the responsibility attaching to the transfer of your debts to the extent of £8,000,000 yearly, we must handle the Commonwealth revenue from Customs and Excise.”

Mr. MAHON.—And perhaps railway revenue.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is another problem, but we should say—“We will control these matters, and as you will pay only once, and you will not have to disgorge £8,000,000 a year, you will be able to raise any deficiency which may arise from your revenues from some other source. The Treasurer mentioned that point when he said that if people have not to pay money, it remains in their pockets. I say definitely that I am not in favour of these Conferences. Why should we go to the States to ask them what we should do in Commonwealth affairs?

Mr. DEAKIN.—They may appeal to the Arbitration Court against us.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — The Prime Minister is not of that opinion. The last Government has passed away. That Government did a number of things to which I might refer if time permitted, but it must not be forgotten that it was a coalition Government. I might say that the Government now in power came into office under very excellent auspices. They came in with a possible majority, quite apart from the labour section of the House, if they submitted progressive non-contentious legislation. There was no coercion on this side. It was never once intimated to me that I might not support any particular measure. The Government has, however, brought in certain measures which I do not feel that I can support. Before concluding, I think that I should say something upon the question of defence. I hold that it is not at all necessary that the Minister of Defence should be an expert in the profession of arms. We have not yet had a professional man in that position, and it will be better for the Commonwealth if we never have such a man as Minister. In the last Administration, however, we had at the head of the Defence Department an amateur military man, who evidently had imbibed all the extravagant ideas of the expert. He made a long speech last week, which secured for him a good deal of praise outside the Chamber, and a certain amount of kudos among some honorable members. I followed that speech with considerable interest, and was very much pained to find the honorable and learned member posing as an expert in military affairs. Shortly after the inauguration of Federation, the Commonwealth engaged a gentleman of high military reputation and wide experience, who had seen active service in South Africa, and who had served both in Canada and New South Wales with great success, to place our military affairs on a satisfactory footing. He was here for some time, and before leaving issued a very long report, in which he estimated that the expenditure necessary to place our defences on a war footing was £525,000. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, the other evening, had a great many comments to make upon that report of Sir Edward Hutton, and seemed inclined to disparage it, notwithstanding the fact that the Major-General gave general satisfaction in the work of organizing the forces of the Dominion of Canada, had previously carried out similar work in New South Wales, and had been practically loaned to the Commonwealth for the same purpose. Major-General Hutton had nothing to gain by attempting to please those who rule the Commonwealth. He was a man of independent means, and of equally independent character and standing. Although he pledged his great reputation on the statement that £525,000 was sufficient to put our defences on a proper footing, this amateur military man, the late Minister of Defence, who follows another profession than that of war, and knows something of a great many things other than military affairs, went so far as to suggest that the necessary expenditure had been under-estimated to the extent of nearly £800,000. When he was asked by the Treasurer if that amount was arrived at on expert evidence, he said that he would take the responsibility for the statement. This is an extract from that part of his speech in which the matter is referred to:—

Major-General Sir Edward Hutton proposed to spend £525,000 to place the equipment of our forts upon a war footing. The Government thought at the time that it would cover everything. He (Lieut.-Colonel McCay) wished that it would. But apart from Major-General Sir Edward Hutton's scheme, he had a little list comprising items that would involve an expenditure of £800,000.

In reply to an interjection by the honorable member for Grey, he stated that we could not do what was wanted out of revenue—that is, we could not obtain an additional £800,000 from our Commonwealth revenue—

To get into a proper position, the Commonwealth should take the bull by the horns, and obtain the necessary funds by an issue of Treasury bills repayable in the course of five or ten years.

He advises the Government to adopt a scheme which will increase our military expenditure by £800,000. He would raise the necessary money by Treasury bills, payable in five or ten years. But during his speech he stated that guns purchased now would be obsolete within that time, therefore, when the Treasury bills fell due, we should require another set of guns to replace those which he would buy now, at a cost of another £800,000, or more. As we should have to redeem the bills as they fell due, our expenditure in principal would be £100,000 a year, and in interest £30,000 a year. There is no economy in an arrangement that would involve the Commonwealth in an annual expenditure approximating the amount now paid in bounties to the Queensland sugar-growers—an expenditure which bears very heavily upon the impecunious States of the Union. It is about time that the Government put up a responsible Minister who has been in charge of the Department of Defence to reply to the speech of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. That speech was applauded by Government supporters, but I should like to know from them if they think that the expenditure he recommended is absolutely necessary for the defence of Australia, and to offer protection to British ships visiting these waters?

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Defence Estimates are practically those of the ex-Minister of Defence.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Yes. He took a great deal of credit to himself for them, patting himself on the back, and saying that every line of the Estimates but one, had been passed by him. If that one line, about which he made a minute, had been adopted by the Government, he would have taken definite action. Now, however, he says that the Government should expend another £800,000.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I did not understand that.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have it here in print. Major-General Sir Edward Hutton's estimate is £525,000, but, in addition, the late Minister had a little list costing £800,000, and involving an annual expenditure of £30,000 in interest and £100,000 for the redemption of the Treasury bills. I think it is only due to us that some Minister should express the views of the Government with regard to the speech of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, which has been received with a good deal of approval. We should know whether any such sum is necessary to make provision for the proper defence of Australia, to meet the requirements of the British fleet in these waters, and to protect our trade.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am sorry to say that such an expenditure will be absolutely necessary if we are to have an adequate defence.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is a very guarded statement. The honorable and learned member for Corinella went further, and stated that we could not do what was required out of revenue. He said the Commonwealth should take the bull by the horns and raise the necessary funds by means of Treasury bills, redeemable in five or ten years. He advised the Government to do what he was not prepared to recommend when he himself was Minister of Defence. Only an amateur would speak in that way. I would not presume to offer an opinion upon military matters, because I am not an expert. It is because we are not experts that we employ the best available men to advise us, and yet we find an honorable and learned member who is an amateur in military affairs coming here with all the swagger of a Major-General, and posing as an expert. He says that he will take the responsibility of recommending the expenditure of £800,000, which is to be raised by the issue of Treasury bills, redeemable at the rate of £100,000 per annum, and involving an annual charge for interest of £30,000. The proposal appears to me to be outrageous. It has received the commendation of the Age, but that is of no particular value. That newspaper commends the honorable and learned member to-day, but it may denounce him to-morrow. A great deal of notice is taken of that newspaper, which, although it has no responsibility, influences the legislation passed by this Parliament. This is undesirable, because the Government, who are responsible, should frame their policy and carry it out independently of the Age, or any other newspaper.

Mr. CHANTER.—Will not the honorable member's remarks apply equally to other newspapers?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In other cases I think the newspapers are well and ably conducted. I should like to make one more reference to the proposal of the Government to encourage immigration to Australia. We have all heard of the good old days when colonists had the strongest faith in the future prosperity of Australia, and took care to select immigrants from the agricultural classes of England, Ireland, and Scotland—men of honesty and integrity, and among the best in the Kingdom. These men laid the foundation of our settlements here. It is well that we should go back to the good old policy of selecting agricultural immigrants, and providing them with land. In Western Australia the Government are giving 160 acres of land to any man who will apply for it, and we should bring pressure to bear upon the other States Governments to offer similar inducements to go on the land. In New South Wales, hundreds of thousands of acres of cultivable land, superior to anything I saw in Western Australia, are locked up in leaseholds, and it is desirable that steps should be taken to have these lands thrown open for agricultural occupation. In Queensland, also, millions of acres of land suitable for agricultural purposes are being thrown open weekly; but, unfortunately, settlers upon such land would labour under certain serious disabilities.

Mr. SPENCE.—How would the necessary water supply be provided?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable member has touched upon one of those disabilities. By boring operations, artesian water is to be tapped in that country. What becomes of all the water which flows into the Darling from the vast watershed?

Mr. CHANTER.—It finds its way into the sea.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—A great volume of subterranean water will be found running to the sea in the direction of Port Macdonell, also to the Gulf of Carpentaria. As a boy, I have seen little pot-holes in the neighbourhood which were said to be absolutely bottomless. Is not the Blue Lake at Mount Gambier said to be unfathomable? But, of course, it is not. These pot-holes cannot be bottomed on account of the under-current caused by the waters which are running to the sea. If we tap those waters, we shall have—as the honorable member for Darling has said—little rivers running in all directions through this arid country.

Mr. SPENCE.—There is no artesian country in the neighbourhood of Mount Gambier.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If the honorable member is acquainted with Mount Gambier, he will know that although it possesses a magnificent rainfall, subterranean waters are to be found there, running in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. SPENCE.—Miles of them.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Yes, there are scores of miles of them, extending as far as Kingston, on the north-west, and as far north as Narracoorte. That country is so fertile that £1 per acre rental is very frequently paid for it. After artesian supplies have been tapped in the States mentioned, an agreement might be arranged between the Commonwealth and representatives of the States for the purpose of determining what legislation should be enacted to make this land available to desirable immigrants.

Mr. CHANTER.—Let us get the land first.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Land is already available. Within the past month the Premier of New South Wales stated that there was plenty of land available for settlement at the present time, and that some of it was being offered to intending settlers in London. As a matter of fact, many of these men are already on their way to Australia. When Mr. Carruthers was asked by a representative of the Labour Party whether he would give a preference to applicants for land who were already in Australia, he replied, "The land is available now. If they want it, let them apply for it. If they do not want it, an opportunity will be given to desirable immigrants to select it. It will not be reserved for the dead-beats who live upon the benches in the Sydney parks."

Mr. CHANTER.—Does not the honorable member know that land in New South Wales is so scarce that within the past three weeks there were over 1,100 applicants for one block comprising 100 acres in the neighbourhood of Wagga?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I know that under the abominable ballot system which obtains in New South Wales, more than 1,100 men applied for a block of land, and had to await the result of a ballot before one of them could obtain it. Is that the way in which to settle people upon the land?

Mr. THOMAS.—What way would the honorable member suggest?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I would have no ballot at all. All other conditions being equal, the first applicant should be given a preference.

Mr. THOMAS.—Who would decide as to who was the first applicant?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I hope that we shall always have responsible Ministers who are above suspicion. If the States Governments make land available for settlement, there will be no dearth of settlers. We are told that this Government will assist to bring immigrants to Australia. If that be so, I hold that a new era is about to be inaugurated—an era in which, instead of losing population, we shall increase our population to a greater extent than is possible under existing conditions.

Mr. THOMAS.—Does the honorable member attribute all the evils of which he complains to the balloting system?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Evidently the honorable member does not treat this matter seriously. He is not a native of Australia, and would not be here had he not been pressed out of the large centres of population in the Old World, where it was difficult to exist. The honorable member has sought “fresh fields and pastures new,” where he imagines there is a better future in store for him. Will he not extend the same opportunity to his friends in the old world who would make equally good citizens with himself? The time will come when he will have to devote some attention to this question. The miners of Broken Hill will not always be able to return him to this House, and, unless he bestows some attention upon the political affairs of the Commonwealth, the people will tire of him. I compliment the Treasurer upon his Budget statement. It was the finest that has been delivered in this Parliament. At the same time, I think that it would be very much better if the Treasurer of the Commonwealth also filled the position of Prime Minister, for reasons which I gave in the earlier portion of my address.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby).—The honorable member for Robertson has made some most interesting observations. One of his statements was that the Government possess a majority in this House, quite independently of the Labour Party, which means that they have a very considerable majority indeed. Under such circumstances, we may hope for a very speedy conclusion of the pressing business of the session. I did not altogether agree with the honorable member when he roundly rebuked the ex-Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balaclava, for having consulted the States Governments upon the question of the transfer of the States debts. It seems to me that that question, above all others, is one upon which the States have a right to be consulted. In dealing with the consolidation of the States debts—a question that has occupied a prominent position throughout the debate—the Treasurer said that the chief objection to the extension of the Braddon section was that it led to friction and to charges of extravagance being levelled against the Commonwealth by the States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think I did. What I said was that if all States loans had to be raised through the Commonwealth there would be friction.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I think that the right honorable gentleman is under a misapprehension. Whether or not he made that statement, however, is a matter of no moment, for, in my opinion, the conditions arising under the Braddon section—the inter-dependence of the States and the Commonwealth—must lead to a certain degree of friction. The chief objection to that provision in the Constitution lies in the fact that it hampers the Commonwealth, inasmuch as under it we have to raise four times as much revenue as we require. It is said that the Braddon section protects the finances of the States, and, under existing conditions, it certainly does to some extent. There appears, however, to be a tendency in certain quarters to regard it as a fetish, which must be preserved at all hazards. I, for one, fail to see what special guarantee is afforded through its agency to the States. As a matter of fact, the guarantee which it offers from the point of view of the States Treasurers is not half as good as that which would follow the adoption of the proposal made by the Treasurer that the Constitution should be so amended as to provide that a fixed sum should be necessarily returned, per capita, to the States. The Braddon section merely provides that three-fourths of the revenue raised by the Commonwealth shall be returned to the States. It does not declare what sum shall be annually raised by us. That being so, if we had a real free-trade party in a majority in the Parliament, this so-called guarantee would go for nought; a provision that three-fourths of nothing should be returned to the States would not be of much value to them. The position would be the same if we had an out-and-out prohibition party in power. I question, however, whether there is such a party on this side of the House, or whether there is a truly free-trade party in opposition. If the proposal made by the Treasurer were carried out, it would afford far more protection to the States than would the continuance of the Braddon section.

Mr. ROBINSON.—How would the honorable member meet the exceptional case of Western Australia?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think that Western Australia would be seriously affected.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At the present time the per capita distribution would mean a difference of over £400,000 a year to that State.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Treasurer of course recognises that the disparity is growing less as the conditions of Western Australia are becoming normal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It will take some years to remove it.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I believe that it will. I should not be prepared to support the repeal of the Braddon section unless we substituted for it something that would afford the finances of the States a reasonable protection. To my mind this question is so inextricably involved with that of the transfer of the States debts that we need not be greatly concerned about it. With the taking over of the States debts the Braddon section would become inoperative, because, as has already been pointed out, the whole of the Commonwealth revenue would not be sufficient to pay the interest on those debts.

Mr. ROBINSON. — The balance would have to be raised from the States.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The question of the means by which it should be raised would be a matter entirely for the consideration of this Parliament. I think that the Treasurer observed that there was not much force in the objection that by at once taking over the whole of the debts of the States the Commonwealth would enhance the value of the present stocks to their holders, inasmuch as we should be sellers. We must recognise, however, that we cannot hope to at once convert all the debts of the States. That must be a gradual process, each debt being converted as it falls due. It would be impossible to induce the holders of the stocks of the States to give them up in return for a Commonwealth issue, unless we could give them something that would be more advantageous to them than are their present holdings; but if we were to give them something more valuable than they now have, what benefit would be reaped by the Commonwealth? In these circumstances we must realize that we shall only be able to take over the States debts as they fall due, and to raise fresh loans on better terms than the States individually could obtain. I wish to say a few words on the method in which the bookkeeping sections of the Constitution are administered. For the first two or three years all new expenditure was debited against the State in which it was incurred. Under that practice, for instance, South Australia had to bear not only the cost of a telegraph line to Tarcoola, amounting to £10,000, but also the loss on the working thereof. That, I think, was a perfectly fair and clear position. So long as the bookkeeping system is retained, it should be administered in its integrity. But since then we have had a different system under which the cost of additional advantages in connexion with the transferred departments has been debited, not against the States concerned, but against the Commonwealth on a per capita basis. Two or three years ago the late Treasurer introduced the practice of debiting the cost of new works against the Commonwealth, and the present Treasurer has gone somewhat further in that direction. The bookkeeping system as now administered is full of most absurd anomalies. The Estimates contain an item for a telephone line from Sydney to Melbourne, and an item for an additional telegraph line from Melbourne to Adelaide. The revenue will, of course, be credited, not to the Commonwealth, which erects the line, but to the States concerned. That is a very anomalous position, when in each case the line will run parallel to, and be worked in conjunction with, a line which was erected by the States. Assuming for a moment that all new works were built out of loan funds, and not out of the general revenue, the Commonwealth would erect a line, and pay the interest on the outlay, while the total revenue would be credited not to the Commonwealth but to the States. That is the extraordinary position we have got into. Then, as regards replacements, I am never quite sure where I am. In looking over the Estimates, it is difficult to know whether a work is to be undertaken on a per capita basis or debited against a particular State. Originally the States felt a special interest in keeping down the expenditure on new works therein. The Government of Queensland, for instance, sent a very pressing request to the Federal Government to keep down the expenditure on new works therein to the lowest possible figure consistent with the proper working of the Departments, and the Commonwealth Government acceded to the request. Now, any such proposal would be absurd. It would be to the advantage of the Queensland Government to get as much as possible out of the Commonwealth, because the greater part of the cost of a work would be borne by the other States.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Queensland again!

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I simply instance Queensland because it made that special request. Of course, the argument applies to all the other States. The Treasurer said that the bookkeeping system could not be abolished at once, because it would cripple Western Australia as compared with the other States. I admit that it could not be abolished straight away without in some way or other indemnifying the States for the losses which they would sustain. A sliding scale would have to be adopted, so that the discrepancies and disparities might gradually disappear. Last year it was pointed out that, under the present system, so far as new works and buildings are concerned, Western Australia is gaining enormously at the expense of the other States. Take the proposed expenditure on additions to post-offices and erection of new post-offices. It is proposed to expend £21,250 in New South Wales, £20,137 in Victoria, £25,425 in Western Australia, £5,624 in South Australia, and £7,145 in Queensland. Again, if we take the items for additions and new works in connexion with the Defence Department, we find that it is proposed to spend £13,818 in New South Wales, £11,717 in Victoria, £7,577 in Queensland, £4,985 in South Australia, £3,196 in Tasmania, and £25,223 in Western Australia. In other words, it is proposed to spend nearly as much in Western Australia as in any three States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is for the fort at Fremantle.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — Exactly; but until recently all these items were charged against the States in which the expenditure was incurred.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not all of them.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—All of them. For instance, the whole cost of the telegraph line to Tarcoola was charged against South Australia, but Western Australia is getting all these works constructed on a per capita basis at the cost of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But I did not do that. The system was changed before I took office.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The right honorable gentleman is extremely inconsistent when he agrees with this proposal, and yet protests that it would not be advisable to introduce a proposal under which the bookkeeping system would cease in a short time on a sliding scale. If the revenue and expenditure of the transferred Departments are to be charged against the several States that system ought to prevail throughout.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that Western Australia is deriving any particular benefit over any other State.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The right honorable gentleman must admit that the expenditure of very much larger sums of money in one State than in others means that that State is deriving an advantage. In the distribution of Commonwealth expenditure, Western Australia is obtaining a huge advantage over the rest of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My opinion is that Western Australia has paid more than she has received, if it is all added up.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Western Australia has been exceedingly well treated by the Commonwealth, though not perhaps better than she deserves. We are discussing questions of national finance, and cannot be governed by mere sentimental considerations; and when a State pleads that a very incongruous and awkward method of finance shall be continued for her benefit she must expect that kind of treatment all round. Therefore, I say that the method of distribution now proposed is all in favour of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Western Australia has been charged £20,000 on account of the sugar bounties for Queensland.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—So has South Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I know, but that does not alter the fact.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We had a specific object in view in that matter. I am asking the Treasurer to be consistent, and to make proposals which will lead to the early abolition—I do not say the sudden abolition—of the very awkward bookkeeping sections, which are costly, and under which the real benefits of Federation are delayed; because we are bound to consider the result of any proposal which is made, not on the Commonwealth as a whole, but on one or two States. That prevents us from looking at matters from a purely Federal point of view. We have had an interesting speech from the honorable member for Kooyong, in which he dealt with the population and the financial question. I tried to ascertain just what it was that he proposed, but unfortunately he did not develop any scheme. He outlined several ideas for increasing the population, and for establishing a committee of finance, which would do something or other, but he did not develop them sufficiently to enable one to decide whether they would be useful or otherwise. One point which the honorable member did make clear was that the condition of the workers is better in Australia than in any other part of the world. He said that our workers are better housed, better fed, better clothed, have more money in the Savings Banks, and that their productions are unequalled anywhere. Most of those statements are true. But then the honorable member went on to say that the reason why workmen from other parts of the world did not flock to this working man's paradise was because of the pinpricks that the Commonwealth and the States are administering to capitalists and to commerce generally. That is a somewhat remarkable statement. The honorable member tells us that conditions in Australia are better for the workers than they are anywhere else, and apparently he argues that workers in the older countries of the world will not come to Australia because of legislation, which has made the conditions better, and of proposals by which it is hoped to make them still better. He appears to think that the only way to bring a large population of workers to Australia is to reduce the emoluments of labour, and to make the conditions less generous for wage-earners. Surely that is a curious argument. It is sometimes said that the cities of Australia are overgrown. To some extent they are. During the debate, reference has been made to the population of Adelaide as being 45 per cent. of the population of the whole State of South Australia. But it must be recollected that the population of a city is reckoned within a ten-mile radius; and a ten-mile radius in the case of Adelaide includes a large number of primary producers. The great bulk of the fruit-growers are, I suppose, within ten miles of Adelaide, and many persons grow produce for export as well as for the local market. Within ten miles of the city there is a pastoral run, the Levels. The huge aggregations of population in Australia are not all engaged in purely city pursuits—in manufacturing, and so forth. That idea is entirely erroneous. If the facts are inquired into, it is found that the overgrowth of our cities is more apparent than real. Of course every one of us would like to see more of our country lands cultivated, and put to a higher use. I do not think that the Treasurer's speech showed any material advance in regard to the States debts and other questions of the kind. No speech is likely to advance such matters; but the question of the States debts must become of pressing importance shortly. When the time comes, I believe that the House will grapple with the matter readily enough, and the sooner steps are taken in this direction the better it will be for the community generally. I shall not detain the Committee further, because I know that honorable members are anxious that this debate shall close.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Denison).—I hesitated for a long time as to whether I should take part in this debate, and I cannot say that I have been very much encouraged to do so by the want of interest shown in the proceedings during the last two or three days. Yet when I speak of a want of interest I must not forget that during the past week there were several speeches delivered on the Budget, opening up subject after subject, and vista after vista—speeches that were not only interesting, but were delivered in a manner worthy of the best traditions of the various States Parliaments. I do not desire to be invidious, but I think I may mention the speeches delivered by the honorable and learned member for Corinella and the honorable member for Gippsland. The latter gentleman spoke under stress of great physical weakness, which ultimately overpowered him; but those who listened to that old statesman, as he is, with all his eloquence and force, could not help congratulating the Commonwealth on having amongst us such a representative. The speech of the honorable and learned member for Corinella elevated the debate to the tone which many of us, when we were advocating Federation, led the electors to believe would result from the association of a number of the best statesmen of Australia in the Commonwealth Parliament. That speech dealt mainly with our defences, and it is exceedingly to be regretted that party exigencies compel, from time to time, changes in the Ministry, which remove men from positions which they are best able to fill, and very frequently replace them by men of not equal calibre. I know, from officers of the Defence Department, that there has not been a Minister who has shown himself more capable of carrying on the work of administration. This is just one of those cases which may lead us to support motions which have been submitted by two honorable members of this House in reference to the election of Ministries. It is suggested that the Ministry should be selected, not by one man, who may be the Prime Minister, but by the House itself, the members of which know better who are the men most capable of filling the special positions apart from any consideration of party exigencies. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, in that speech, dealt with the various suggestions which were made by the late General Officer Commanding, Sir Edward Hutton, and he led us to the conclusion that if the recommendations of the military experts were carried out we should find ourselves, perhaps sooner than we expected, pledged to an expenditure of at least £800,000 for equipment, in addition to the expenditure already incurred in connexion with garrisons, mines, artillery, and other land forces.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not £800,000 a year.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The outlay to which the honorable and learned member for Corinella referred was specially in connexion with the suggestions made by Sir Edward Hutton.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The suggested expenditure was £800,000 altogether.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—But the £800,000 was largely in connexion with expenditure which must be incurred year by year.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is so—spread over a number of years.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am altogether at issue with the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the late General Officer Commanding, in this matter. The honorable and learned member did not convince me that we could wisely make any further expenditure on our land forces than that which is now being incurred. I have in my mind the recommendations of the various experts who have visited these shores in years gone by. Those experts were sent out here by the Imperial Government, and they have from time to time called attention to the fact that these shores can never be invaded except by a desultory marauder. It may be that artillery and other armaments become obsolete every ten years or so, and require replacing at further expenditure. Whether that be so or not, there is the fact that every expert who has yet visited these shores—from Colonel Scratchley and Sir Edward Jervois down to Sir James Bevan Edwards—has come to the conclusion that these shores cannot be invaded except by some desultory marauder.

Mr. KELLY.—It was to meet such an enemy that the honorable and learned member for Corinella proposed the expenditure.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The honorable and learned member very wisely pointed out that while we have been warned that attack was more likely from privateers of the character of the Shenandoah, or the Chesapeake, a new order of things has arisen in the Pacific during the past few years. So far as the navy is concerned, we know that war ships, once away from their own shores, cannot return unless they have been permitted to coal by some friendly State. But of late years, as the honorable and learned member for Corinella reminds us, Germany has established coaling stations in the Southern Pacific, and may in consequence place us in a position which heretofore we have had no reason to contemplate. That being so, I would remind honorable members of facts which have been forcibly pressed on their attention in sessions gone by. It is true that we may have to look for our defence and protection not to the immediate waters of Australia. We may have to depend for victory on some great battle fought 2,000 miles away from our shores, as Great Britain had to depend for victory on the battle of Trafalgar. If an enemy had a force sufficiently large to enable him to disregard the fleets which were harassing him, and to leave them, he might run the gauntlet, and, picking up coal at various coaling stations, at length reach these shores. Then would begin our responsibility, and we must consider what should be our first line of defence. It was my duty for many years in the past to suggest to a State Parliament what course it should adopt and what should be its fair share of a contribution to something like a naval defence. I had therefore to consider what was the first line of defence for Australia. It is not her garrisons, mines, engineering, and land forces, but a navy which may be stationed three, thirty, or one hundred miles away from her coast. Then, instead of spending more money on our land forces, I should like to see the mind of the Commonwealth Parliament directed to the purpose of assisting the Imperial Navy by a more liberal contribution than that which we give at the present time.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—We give too much now.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—We require to insure our States against attack. We require to insure the bullion which lies in our banks against the call of an enemy, who at any time might lay us under contribution. What does the merchant do to protect his interests against loss due to the operation of the laws of God at sea or against the aggression of an enemy? He from time to time insures himself against risks of that kind. Our best insurance against a risk of the kind to which I refer is to increase our contribution to the Imperial Navy. A sum of £200,000 a year is now spent in this way, whilst we are spending £600,000 on our land forces.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—That is too much also.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—As the honorable and learned member for Corinella reminded us, just as we have our lighthouses along our coasts—120 of them, I think—lighting up the maritime highway, so we have sea ports dotted here and there on the littoral of this great Continent, and they are practically defenceless. So far as Tasmania is concerned, I cannot forget Hobart with its magnificent waters, Frederick Henry Bay, D'Entrecasteaux Channel, and the Tamar, which are practically defenceless unless provided with forts. If we have forts, we must have garrisons. When we have our forts erected, our garrisons and guns ready, we shall have a support—a rendezvous—for our first line of defence—the navy, which from time to time may require to find cover near our coast or in our harbors. So I trust that our attention will be more directed to that first line of defence. I hesitate, as a non-expert, to talk about these matters. I speak only as I have been educated. For forty years I have been reading the various reports which have been submitted to the Imperial and our own Governments upon the question of defence. Those reports centre upon the fact that the first line of defence must be that upon which we shall rely most entirely, that is our navy. That being so, I trust that in the future, instead of turning our attention to the number of our land forces, we shall be content to provide an efficient garrison and an efficient staff of engineers, and to create a body of men who can well manage our submarine mines, leaving the rest to what we all agree is a capable and useful force, our citizen soldiery. As an old volunteer, I have witnessed war's alarms in the years gone by, and know that no sooner is the flag raised than there rally round it more men than are needed. Men are always ready to rally in support of the flag, whenever it is unfurled.

Mr. CHANTER.—But to be effective, they must be trained.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—They must be trained, and the money that we have spent on our volunteer system has not been wasted. I know from my personal experience, not in the last ten years, but in previous years when I was in the force myself, that if the flag were unfurled in Tasmania, not 800 men, but three times that number would rally to its defence, and they would be men who, with very little more training, would be fit to beat the foe. The training that we have given to our volunteers in years gone by has not been a waste of our public funds. We have instructed our men how to use the rifle, and we have instilled into them from their childhood the demands of patriotism. I would leave the question of defence there, hoping that whenever the subject arises, we shall devote attention not so much to expenditure upon our land forces as to supplementing, in all the efforts we can make, the operations of the Imperial Navy.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—What does the honorable member think it would cost?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—To that question I give the honorable member no reply; it is entirely a matter of experience. But I have indicated the channel through which our expenditure should pass, to the extent of our abilities. Instead of wasting our money upon guns which, if they cost £100,000 to-day, will be obsolete in five, six, or seven years, and on armament and forts which will go down before more modern weapons, I would give what support I could to the British Navy. If we spend our money on forts in 1905, the expenditure will be absolutely useless ten years hence.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella proposes to spend £800,000.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I do not think he proposes to spend that amount. I understood him to point out that that expenditure would be necessary if we went on the line of establishing garrisons at the various ports to which he alluded, and provided land forces to back up the forts. His suggestion, I understood, completed those of Major-General Sir Edward Hutton.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—But he recommended the issue of Treasury bills.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—When the expenditure came to be considered necessary. If I have misunderstood the honorable and learned member, I shall be found voting against any extra expenditure on our land forces and garrisons, although I shall vote to supply our garrisons with modern arms. Coming now to the Budget, I have to express my gratification that the Treasurer has given to the world a set of statistics which are useful, not only as any compilation of figures is useful for purposes of comparison, but as showing the people of the old country the progress which Australia has been making. Mr. James, the able Agent-General for Western Australia, has already telegraphed to this country his sense of their usefulness in that respect. Progress is a relative term, but the progress of Australia suffers no disparagement when compared with that of any other country in the world. I intend to supplement the Treasurer's figures, in order to emphasize this progress. His statistics deal with what the commercial and trading communities have done. I shall show what has been the result of personal exertion and thrift among the masses generally. The Treasurer has shown that our primary products are worth £120,000,000 a year, and the output of our factories £60,000,000 a year, while £14,000,000 a year is expended in capital and machinery. But if we ask what the people have done personally, we find that our Savings Banks, whose books record the thriftiness of the public, have accumulated deposits to the amount of £34,000,000, while our building societies and friendly societies have accumulated £5,000,000. Our life insurance societies have accumulated the amazing sum of £35,000,000, which represents insurances to the value of £120,000,000 on the lives of 400,000 persons, or half the manhood of Australia. This is the sum which has been put aside by our people to provide against old age, or to benefit their children when time shall be no more with them. These are grand figures for the Commonwealth to have reached within the last fifty years. Included in these insurances are policies on the industrial system such as those issued by the Citizens' Life and the Australian Mutual Provident Societies, whereby, by payments of 4½d. per week, the industrial classes have accumulated £6,500,000 against domestic vicissitudes. I am astounded when I read these figures; but when I inquire if they are trustworthy, I find that they are. I find further that our average area under crop has increased during the past five years from 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 acres. These figures show what the Commonwealth is doing in finding employment for its people, and putting the congested populations of the cities on to the land. The area under the plough has increased by 2,000,000 acres, or 20 per cent., in five years. I find further that our Customs and Excise duties have been revenue-producing, as well as fairly protective.

Mr. MAUGER.—It all depends upon what the honorable member calls protective.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I find, too, that they have been to some, but happily not to a large, extent prohibitive.

Mr. MAUGER.—To what item on the Tariff does the honorable member refer?

Mr. KELLY.—To the duty on hats.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The duty of 35 per cent. on hats has almost prohibited their importation.

Mr. MAUGER.—In the first place, there is not a duty of 35 per cent. on hats, and in the second place more hats are now imported into Victoria than were imported for years past.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The duty has been prohibitive except in respect to a certain class of hat sold by such shops as those to which I and other honorable members go.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is again wrong. It is the lower-priced hats that are imported to the greater extent.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I speak as an importer when I say that the class of hat made by the Denton Mills is no longer imported into Australia, except by two or three of the leading houses in our chief cities, where the shopkeepers practically charge what price they like, and the customers make no demur.

Mr. MAUGER.—What about the hundreds of thousands of Italian hats that are imported?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. — Comparatively few are being imported now. Then so far as boots are concerned, the products of America and Staffordshire are being imported to a limited extent, because some persons regard the imported article as superior.

Mr. MAUGER.—And they are wrong.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. — I believe they are wrong. I have seen Australian boots which are equal to anything that could be imported. The greater proportion of the hats, boots, flannels, and blankets that were formerly imported have been displaced by locally manufactured articles. The Tasmanian blankets and flannels are sold wherever they are shown all over Australia, and articles of similar value could not be imported from England and sold here after payment of the duty at prices which would permit of successful competition.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That was so before Federation.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Quite so. In Tasmania we have been gradually building up the manufacture of boots, flannels, tweeds, and blankets under a Tariff not protective—at least, not intentionally so. I was Treasurer of that State over and over again from 1868 onwards, and I am called a free-trader. But we lived under a 20 per cent. Tariff for such a long time that some of us unintentionally became protectionists. It may be said of Tasmanian finance, "My poverty but not my will consented." The Treasury needed money, and as I was denied revenue by means of direct taxation, I was compelled from time to time to resort to increased Customs duties. Ten per cent. duties were increased to 15 per cent., and then again to 20 per cent., and the free-traders were always asking us to impose a little more duty to protect their manufactures. Under such a Tariff, the manufactories in Tasmania have increased, and now every day we hear the sound of the factory bell, and the patter of the feet of thousands of factory hands proceeding to their work. That is what we want. Returning to the point from which I started, I contend that the Commonwealth Tariff has been revenue-producing, protective, and partly prohibitive. The Tariff yielded during the first year of its operation £9,600,000, whilst, for the current financial year, it is estimated to produce £8,683,000. Therefore, there will be a falling-off of less than £1,000,000 in five years. It must not be concluded that there has been any great falling off in general imports, because the difference is mainly due to the fact that our importations of grain and sugar have practically ceased, at a loss to the revenue of £1,200,000. Therefore, we have nearly passed through the first five years of our experience of the Tariff, to which the right honorable member for Balaclava referred when, in introducing his first Budget, he said, "I have to warn the House that the Estimates which are now produced will have to be reduced year by year as our manufactures increase." When the right honorable gentleman made his statement he was not aware that it was intended to abolish the duties upon tea and kerosene.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Was the Tariff completed when that statement was made?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. — No; it was not. From time to time it was pointed out that the Tariff as originally proposed would yield a much larger sum than £9,500,000. The Committee reduced the duties upon many articles, struck out the tea and kerosene duties, and placed one item after another upon the free list. The right honorable member for Adelaide, much to my chagrin, told honorable members that the Tariff was of a protective character, but honorable members were not prepared to go to the length that he proposed, and gradually the duties were pared down. The right honorable member for Balaclava predicted that the revenue would gradually be reduced to about £7,500,000, the value, as he stated, of the normal year; but our experience does not point to any such probability. The bookkeeping sections of the Constitution were inserted in order that we might learn what were the possibilities of the Commonwealth within that period. Notwithstanding that our population has to a small extent diminished, I have very little doubt that for some years we shall continue to enjoy to the full the amount of revenue which it is estimated we shall receive during 1905-6. I know of no reason to warrant the presumption—despite the fact that our manufactures are increasing—that the amount of Customs and Excise revenue which is at present being collected will not continue to be collected. If unhappily our population should decrease—and I use the word "unhappily" advisedly—we may expect somewhat different results. But so surely as we continue to manufacture for our own people, to extend our horse-power in machinery, and to pay good wages to our artisans, we shall enable them to consume articles which, by paying duty, will cause our revenue to be maintained. I am exceedingly sorry to observe that our population has, to a small extent, decreased. The number of emigrants from Australia exceeds that of our immigrants. I do not know how we can stop this leakage. That observation leads me to pass more rapidly than I had intended to another subject, which relates to the settlement of the people upon the soil. Until we can settle our own population upon the lands of the Commonwealth, we cannot attempt to introduce strangers. Too many of our sons, wearing stiff collars and starched cuffs, are to be found wasting their time in our cities. We want to induce them to go upon the land.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Let them go to Western Australia.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—By pushing men into pursuits which they do not understand without providing them with a certain amount of capital, we should be more likely to facilitate their downfall than to secure their prosperity. I observe that the Treasurer proposes to seek a conference with the States Treasurers upon this subject. He may arrange a conference with them, but he will find that every State is doing what it can in this direction. Some of the States have found it necessary to hold on to their lands in order that they may maintain their revenue. Others have found it imperative to retain possession of them, because, having sold them previously for £1, 10s., and 5s. per acre, it would be ruinous to those who have purchased if the Government now commenced to give them away.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is an exploded idea. The same argument was used in Western Australia, but there is nothing in it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I should like to know what area of arable land is available in Western Australia—I mean land upon which a man with sufficient capital could settle with any hope of being successful.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is an almost unlimited quantity of it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am afraid there is not. It is gratifying to learn that the States are providing opportunities for the settlement of the people upon the soil. In Victoria the Crédit Foncier system is in vogue. I believe in that system—in fact,

I have always been a Crédit Foncier advocate—and I endeavoured to introduce a similar system into Tasmania, but my efforts were baulked by the Legislative Council of that State. That we must assist our own people before we help outsiders is an article of my creed. In picking up our stalwart sons, who are at present resident in our cities, and placing them upon the lands of the country, we have a great work to perform. At Dookie, Hawkesbury, and other institutions they may become familiar with agricultural pursuits, but if subsequently their parents are unable to provide them with the capital necessary to place them upon the land, the Government must step in and assist them. That means that we cannot hold out any inducements to immigrants at present. Consequently, when I hear the Prime Minister or any member of the Government talking about the encouragement of immigration, and of the desirability of arranging conferences with the States Governments to discuss that subject, I am inclined to say, "Talk as you will, it will result in nothing." There can be no immigration of the class of people we desire to see settled upon the lands of the country for some time to come. In this connexion I would point out that Canada offers much better inducements to immigrants than we can. Where is the State in Australia which will give an intending immigrant 160 acres of land?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Western Australia will do that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—But what is the character of that land? Canada has flooded its lands with a very likely class of settlers, and now that no further areas are available within twenty-five miles of the railway it intends to duplicate the line from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in order to make its other lands more accessible. A very low rate of passage money obtains between Great Britain and Canada, and the Dominion Government offers 160 acres of land to each intending settler free of charge. It holds out inducements which we cannot hope to offer. I am afraid that it is idle for Australia to expect to populate its lands with immigrants in the way that we desire. I regret that our legislation during the past five years has not been calculated to induce the belief that outsiders upon their arrival here will be welcomed. We have not extended the hand of welcome to the men in the old country who would be most likely to come here. We have simply invited those having capital to come to our shores, and these men are exceedingly dubious when they learn of our various restrictive regulations in relation to wages and conditions of labour in the industries in which they are interested. In Tasmania, the State from which I hail, we have year after year had the most progressive legislation which any man of judgment could desire. Yet we have had no Labour Party in the State Parliament; we have all been labourers for the common weal.

Mr. WILSON.—It is an ideal State.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—An ideal State in that respect. We have maintained the wages of our workers, and have secured good homes for the people. We have encouraged them to settle on the land by granting holdings even as low as 5s. per acre, and giving them thirteen years in which to pay for them. We have offered them every possible inducement, and until Federation they never felt anything in the shape of real taxation. As the result of the action of the Labour Party in the Commonwealth Parliament, however, the poor labouring man and the poor labouring woman in Tasmania have to pay direct taxation which they never had to bear before. Some of the legislation of the Commonwealth has so reduced the Customs revenue as to compel that State to resort to direct taxation, and Tasmania now collects, from all the workers, from the best paid wage-earner to the poorest hospital nurse, a tax from which they ought to be free.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The honorable member is condemning legislation brought in by the Government of which he was a member.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am very glad that I am now a free lance.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable member has made a very serious indictment against legislation introduced by the Government of which he was a member.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I say that some of the legislation passed whilst I was a member of the Barton-Deakin Administrations was, to my mind, mischievous, and I am thankful to wash my hands of it.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why did not the honorable member do so before?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Surely the honorable member does not forget that a house divided against itself cannot stand.

Mr. MAUGER.—But why should it stand in such circumstances?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Does not the honorable member recognise that when seven men join in a partnership of liability it would be dishonorable for one of the number to do anything that might be detrimental to the others? It is because of this that, in connexion with every Administration in the world, we find over and over again that men remain in office, just as I did in the case in question, and just as I have had to do in Tasmania. In the State Parliament I have listened to a debate on a measure against which, as a member of the Cabinet I had raised my voice in protest; but I would rather go down myself than act dishonorably to the men with whom I was associated. I should get away from them at a fitting time, but not when my disagreement with them would possibly bring about a crisis. Is a man to think only of himself? If I or the right honorable member for Swan had thought only of ourselves, we might have resigned from the Barton or Deakin Administrations; but we had a right to remember that we were members of a party in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and were bound together for weal or woe, so that the house should not be divided against itself. But when the opportunity offers—when no claims are made upon me by the party with which I am associated, I am free to act for myself, and, as a free lance, may denounce the very legislation—

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member is really denouncing himself.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Some of the legislation passed by the Commonwealth Parliament during the last four years has been not useful but really detrimental to the Commonwealth. I turn from this subject to that of the sugar bounty, which is another of the important questions that have been discussed during the Budget debate. As the result of the sugar tariff, the Commonwealth has lost revenue to the extent of £614,000 during the last five years. This loss has been suffered by reason of our desire to rid the Commonwealth of the coloured labour question. I do not forget that that question did not apply to New South Wales; that, at the time of the introduction of the system, very little coloured labour was employed in that State, and that we have therefore been giving a bonus to the sugar-planter of New South Wales for no particular reason. Last year, if I remember rightly, there were 3,700 labourers—consisting of 2,400 coloured and 1,300 white men—employed in the sugar plantations of the Commonwealth. I should like a representative of Queensland to inform me what are the wages earned by white labourers in the sugar-fields. Shall I say 40s. per week?

Mr. BAMFORD.—With rations and quarters, the wage is about 35s. per week.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am quite sure that the planters cannot obtain white labour for the cane-fields under 6s. a day.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Yes; a ploughman can be engaged for £1 or 22s. a week.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Then what shall I say is the wage paid to the coloured labourer? Shall I put it down at 20s. per week?

Mr. BAMFORD.—27s. 6d. per week.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I do not think that a white man should be employed in the cane-fields at less than 40s. a week.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Very few get as much as that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—If you are going to push them into the most tropical districts of Queensland—

Mr. WILSON.—All that land will be thrown to waste.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—You are going to try to push them into the far north at 40s. a week, with coloured labour at 20s. a week. Therefore, the planter has paid, in order to get rid of coloured labour, £1 a week, or £52 a year, for every labourer more than he would have paid had he used all coloured labour. If a bounty of £2 per ton is paid when white labour only is employed in producing the 170,000 tons of sugar, then the Commonwealth will pay £340,000 a year. And if we work out the loss of 20s. per week made by the planter in substituting white for coloured labour, we shall arrive at the sum of £192,000. Therefore, we shall have given to the planters a bonus of £150,000 a year, in addition to all the losses they may have incurred in substituting white for coloured labour.

Mr. RONALD.—Does not the honorable member think that a white labourer is equal to two black labourers at any time?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I do not know anything about that; it is a matter for the growers. If these figures are approximately correct, it merely shows that we were monstrously misled in giving a bounty of £2 per ton for white-grown sugar. We have given the planters not only the advantage of the protection between the excise duty of £3 and the import duty of £6, but also a bounty of £2 per ton, which—assuming that all the labour is white, and it will be some time before it is—represents £192,000 a year, or more than £1 a ton, in addition to the extra cost they can show they have incurred by employing white rather than coloured labour.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It is not in addition to, but in lieu of that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No. The planter substitutes white in lieu of coloured labour, and we have given him enough to pay for the extra labour, and £1 per ton in addition thereto. If these figures are approximately correct, it shows that the bounty, instead of being £2, ought to be £1 a ton, to cover the actual cost; that is, if the whole quantity of 170,000 tons is produced by white labour. It will be seen, then, that we make the planters that enormous gift. I know that the planter has not been getting all the advantage which the honorable member for Franklin suggested, and that is the misfortune of the business. It may be that in New South Wales the planter, who never employed black labour, is getting all the advantage that is possible; but in Queensland, the planter, who deals with the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, may not be getting the amount of advantage which he ought to receive.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The New South Wales growers have received in three years £114,000.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Year by year the growers have been receiving this enormous gift.

Mr. RONALD.—And yet they are not satisfied.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—And yet they may not be satisfied. These observations are preliminary to the question of what we are to do when the period of five years has expired. I shall need to be better informed then I am now if I vote for a continuance of the bounty. All through the period when I, with others, was asking the people of Australia to federate, I boldly told them that Queensland must be considered, as she had an enormous product which I hoped would satisfy the requirements of all Australia. Five years ago, I used the same number of tons for the purpose of my calculations as I am using now, because I was told by Sir Hugh Nelson, in correspondence, that 170,000 tons was the quantity which was needed; and that before very long it would all be produced by Queensland. Last year very nearly that quantity was produced there. After we have had an experience of a few years, we are told by those in authority that the bounty must be renewed. When the question comes before the House, I shall be disposed to say that, having given the growers a bounty for five years, and helped them to get rid of a certain portion of their coloured labour, they must now help themselves. What was the position of the planter prior to Federation? I bought tens of thousands of tons of sugar from Queensland at a fair price—the price of Mauritius sugar. We are told that prior to that time, the planters held their own. The Commonwealth does not exist for the purpose of assisting men to make fortunes. We all had to hold our own, with difficulty indeed, prior to Federation. Therefore, the Queensland planters must be satisfied to do that.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The planters were paying £6 a year for labour then.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The planters still have the market, and we are going to continue, I hope, to give them the advantage of the proportion of £3 a ton. If that, which is equal to 20 per cent. on their raw product, is not sufficient, I do not know that the raw product is worth producing. When the question of the sugar bounty was submitted, many of us, perhaps, voted out of consideration for those who had plantations on the tropical line. When you get to the far north of Queensland, I exceedingly doubt, whatever may be said to the contrary by Queenslanders, whether the atmospheric conditions will enable European families to work in the cane-fields. I have heard representatives of that State say, "The planters have only to pay the price, and labour will be found." During the last three or four years we have offered the planters every inducement to pay the price. We do not find that in that district the coloured labourer is being dispensed with as rapidly as we had hoped. I am not an authority on hygiene, and if a medical man resident in the district tells me that while the white man may endure, his wife and children must suffer, that there must be ennui, dementia, and early decay, and all those weaknesses which extreme climates induce, I accept his testimony. It is the only testimony I can find, and it convinces me that tropical Queensland is unfit for the wives and children of white men.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Is the honorable member aware that doctors disagree as to that?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Where doctors disagree I have to arrive at a conclusion by exercising my own common sense, and basing my judgments on my own experience.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable member has had no experience on the subject.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I have had quite enough experience of tropical climates. I have been in Mauritius, and have seen something of cane-cutting there. When the rain falls upon the land the extreme heat causes the moisture to rise in dense clouds, by which one is enveloped. The climates of such countries are not such as white men can live and work in. When the time comes for the discussion of this question, I shall feel compelled to arrive at the conclusion that the sugar industry must depend upon itself for support, except so far as concerns the difference between the Excise and the Customs duty. There is another point which affects the people of the Commonwealth very considerably. Questions affecting Federation and the Commonwealth cannot arise in conversation without the matter of Federal extravagance being discussed. It becomes quite monotonous. I am pleased to know that the Treasurer has given figures to show that Federation is costing Australia only 1s. 5½d. per head. At the time of the Convention, and when we were recommending the Constitution to the people at the referendum, I even went so far as to say that the cost might be 2s. 6d. a head. But when the Treasurer mentioned the actual expenditure as 1s. 5½d. per head he omitted to include certain items of expenditure which are really consequent upon Federation. There is the sugar rebate, for instance, which for the year 1905-6 is estimated at £151,000. That expenditure is consequent upon Federation. It is no reply to say that the people have been relieved through the Customs to the extent of £500,000 a year in respect of tea and kerosene duties. Before I have done with the subject I think I shall be able to show that these reliefs which, in my opinion, we so unwisely granted, have been a serious contributory cause of the difficulties of some of the States—especially of Queensland and Tasmania—in respect of their finances. The abolition of the tea and kerosene duties certainly cost Tasmania £25,000, and Queensland very nearly £50,000 a year. Queensland has accumulated deficiencies of £102,000, in consequence of the reduced surplus handed over to her by the Commonwealth. That is largely due to the action of this Parliament in repealing those duties. Then, again, we shall presently have to deport a large number of kanakas. I have read that a deposit was paid for each of them. I cannot learn who holds that deposit, and whether it is held under proper conditions, so that it may be paid on the deportation of the kanakas.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The State Government holds it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I doubt whether the Commonwealth Government can compel the State Government to pay over the money. Then, again, I hope we are to have an additional expenditure in connexion with iron bonuses. I am not now committing myself to any particular amount. By-and-by we shall also have old-age pensions to pay—a matter about which I shall have something to say presently. There will also be the Federal Capital expenditure. Some honorable members may say that by means of the nationalization of the land money spent in that direction will be returnable later on. But there will certainly be expenditure for furnishing the departments at the Capital.

Mr. KELLY.—That expenditure was foreseen when the States entered Federation.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I do not know what the people may have thought at the time of the referendum, but we certainly did not anticipate such a large expenditure as is now projected. Then comes looming up before us that great project in which the Treasurer is so much interested—the transcontinental railway.

Mr. KELLY. — Is not that definitely shelved now?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. — I hope it is shelved for this session; but every effort is, I am sure, being made by the Treasurer to resuscitate the infant. I should not be surprised if he managed to galvanize it into life.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The honorable member supported it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I have never supported the transcontinental line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Government in which the honorable member had a portfolio introduced the Bill.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. — But the right honorable gentleman knows that, so far as I was personally concerned, I was not in favour of the project. Hopeful as I am for the development of Western Australia, I say to the Treasurer, in the words of Pease, of Darlington, "Let the country make the railways, and the railways will make the country;" but I do not know of country between Eucla and Kalgoorlie which, in this sense, can be made, and until I see that every effort has been put forth by Western Australia herself to construct this line, it will not find in me a cordial supporter of its construction as a Federal project. This question of the cost of Federation brings me to a point that is very near to four honorable members in this House besides myself—the honorable member for Franklin, the honorable member for Bass, the honorable member for Darwin, and the honorable member for Wilmot. That is the effect of these changes in connexion with Federal finance upon the finances of the State which is smallest in respect of numbers and weakest in respect of finance — Tasmania. Tasmania is small in population, small in finance, and small in area; but at the same time it is one of the six States of the Commonwealth. I am proud to belong to that State, and to recognise her position, although it may be a minor position. Tasmania is looming large in the Commonwealth in regard to her manufactures, the development of her mineral resources, her private and public wealth, and, generally, in her association with the commerce of Australia. That small State has developed a most satisfactory position, although she suffers because of a reduction of duties, and because of the cost of her public buildings being charged against revenue instead, as heretofore, against loan account. I saw from the newspapers a few days ago that Tasmania emerges from her financial difficulties with a surplus, though it must not be forgotten that the people there have had to tax themselves in a new direction. I have previously referred to this as a consequence of labour legislation. The poor man, and even the poor laundry woman, have, I am ashamed to say, to pay this taxation in Tasmania to-day. Previously the Customs and Excise realized £2 17s. per head, whereas under the Commonwealth Tariff the result is £1 17s. per head. In the year 1900 the Customs and Excise brought in £470,000, whereas under the Commonwealth in 1905-6 the surplus of revenue returned is only £240,000. or £230,000 less than that received five years ago. I am not going to make too much of this matter. By whatever method the reduction may have been brought about, I hope that that loss of £1 per head by Customs has been, to some extent, gained by the people; but instead of Federation costing 1s. 5½d. per head, we find, after making all allowance for this supposed saving in Customs and Excise, that the expense is 4s. 2d. per head. Tasmania is, therefore, in the rather serious position that she has, to an extent, got to the end of her tether. The amount of the surplus for the year 1905-6, estimated to be paid by the Treasurer to the Government of Tasmania, is within £4,227 of the actual amount realised; in other words, there is only that amount, so far as Tasmania is concerned, to reckon on for any further expenditure. The iron bonus will nearly consume the whole, while the trans-continental railway would consume twice as much. It will be seen, therefore, that in Tasmania, with the increased expenditure, the Commonwealth is likely to have a second State thrown on its hands, though not in default, because I hold that under the Constitution, there can be no default. Although the Commonwealth receives the whole of the Customs and Excise revenue, three-fourths of it must be distributed to the States in proportion to the amount collected. But what becomes of Queensland, which year after year, for four or five years, has had a deficiency which has now reached £102,000? I should like to know what the Auditor-General has to say in regard to this deficiency. I challenge the Treasurer's position when he treats this deficiency as a debit against Queensland. As a matter of fact, it is an item which hangs between heaven and earth, like Mahomet's coffin, and really and truly it ought to be placed to a suspense account. If the amount be debited to Queensland it gives rise to the presumption that it is an asset of the Commonwealth, whereas it is not an asset, seeing that Queensland cannot be forced to return it.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Queensland never got this money.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Queensland has had her full share of the three-fourths of the revenue.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not follow the honorable member.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Queensland has had her share of the three-fourths of the revenue.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — No; Queensland has not.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The three-fourths of the total revenue, which was taken into the hotch-potch of the Commonwealth funds, has been distributed in proportion to the amount received from each State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Queensland has complained very much at not getting her three-fourths.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—If Queensland has not got her three-fourths, I do not understand the account. The money is most distinctly set out as a debit against Queensland, and it appears as an asset of the Commonwealth, although it is not an asset.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Queensland has not received her three-fourths like the other States.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I cannot understand an account which shows this to be a debit against Queensland. Queensland might be shown as minus the amount, but, as I say, to debit her means that the Commonwealth has an asset.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Commonwealth has not a penny at the end of the year, or even at the end of the month.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The Treasurer does not follow me. If I were making out a balance-sheet, I should put down so much stock, and so forth, and £102,000 due by Queensland. However, I need not pursue the argument further.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I can assure the honorable member that there is nothing in the argument.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Does the Treasurer tell me that Queensland does not get her three-fourths of the revenue?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No, Queensland does not.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—But Queensland is entitled to three-fourths.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Queensland is entitled to a share of three-fourths of the whole.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I take it that three-fourths of the whole means three-fourths of what the State has contributed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—After another year or so I have no doubt that we shall find Tasmania with a similar deficiency. The question then arises whether we can hope for any other plan of distribution. We find from the Treasurer's statement that if there be a per capita distribution, Western Australia will suffer to the extent of £650,000 per annum, whilst the other five States would realize an advantage. How hopeless it is, therefore, to expect, while the position in Western Australia continues as at present, that the Parliament will deal with this question of bookkeeping otherwise than as it has been dealing with it in the past. Happily, we shall find that as the result of our five years' experience, the States payments per capita to the Commonwealth revenue have become more closely approximated. Western Australia is the only State which still stands in the way.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Tasmania would get some benefit the other way, would she not?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No. I propose to show the right honorable gentleman that, with the exception of Western Australia, the disparity in the per capita payments of the States of the Commonwealth is now so small that they are practically the same. We have now arrived at this position: On the consumption of dutiable goods New South Wales pays £2 1s. 7½d. per head; Victoria, £2 1s. 1½d.; South Australia, £1 16s. 5d.; Tasmania, £1 16s. 8d.; and Queensland, £2 2s. Honorable members will see that there is no great disparity between these amounts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does Tasmania pay more than South Australia?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Only 3d. per head more. The revenues of the States have now so nearly approximated proportionately that on the consumption of dutiable goods New South Wales pays £2 1s. 7½d. per head, and Victoria pays £2 1s. 1½d. The Treasurer knows that when his own State was represented in the Federal Convention, her people were paying £8 per head towards the Customs and Excise revenue, and it was then hopeless to talk of the institution of a sliding scale. The right honorable member for East Sydney suggested at the Adelaide Convention that there should be a sliding scale, enforced for five years to bring us into line, but directly the statisticians pointed out to us that the inevitable result would be a serious disadvantage to New South Wales, who, at that time, was collecting only £1 6s. per head, whilst Western Australia was collecting £8, and Tasmania £2 16s. per head, the proposal was seen to be utterly impracticable. I am referring now to the possibility of our coming into line in this matter. Victoria and New South Wales have automatically come together, and their payments are now within 6d. per head of being the same, a difference which need not be mentioned. In 1901, New South Wales collected £1 6s. 4d. on dutiable goods, and she now collects £2 1s. 7½d. Western Australia collected £5 6s. 7d. in that year. Tasmania collected £2 16s. 6d. and she now collects only £1 16s. 8d. per head. In Tasmania we have closely approximated to the position in South Australia, and our collections are within 5s. per head of those in New South Wales.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What is the Western Australian collection now?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The last statistics show that it is £5 8s. 3d. per head, without reference to the special Tariff. Honorable members will see how closely, year by year, during the past five years we have been brought into line in this matter. There is something further to be considered. Statisticians make use of a term known as the "opimeter"—the measure of the ability to consume articles of luxury. The opimeter of 1900 showed this disparity between New South Wales and Tasmania, that whilst in New South Wales the people spent £1 per head on tea, sugar, spirits, narcotics, and dried fruits, the luxuries and semi-luxuries, Tasmania spent at least 10s. per head less, and I am not sure that it was not 15s. per head less on these articles. That was the measure of their ability, by reason of good wages, to spend on articles of luxury liable to Customs duties. If honorable members will go through the returns on these items of luxuries, and semi-luxuries, they will find that the measure of ability to consume these articles has approximated throughout Australia, until it is now almost the same in each State. It is somewhat astonishing to find that in this respect the ability of Tasmania has so nearly approached that of New South Wales. When we consider the position of Western Australia, with her enormous Customs duty of £8 per head, we shall find that that was due to a much greater proportion of adult males living in wattle and dab, or tin huts, upon luxurious whiskeys and beers, and paying very heavily for narcotics and spirits of all kinds. But there is a normal condition of things, and by reason of the progress of mineral development on the west coast, Tasmania has so improved her position as a consumer of luxuries and semi-luxuries, that she has in the last five years more closely approximated to the position of the other States in the value of dutiable goods of this class which her people consume.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it really a difference in ability or a difference in computation?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I had a great dispute with the statisticians of the time as to whether they were not over-estimating this ability to consume dutiable goods, but whichever of us was correct, there remains the fact that on these articles—luxuries and semi-luxuries, in 1900, the people of New South Wales consumed a quantity per head which gave to the exchequer £1 per head, whereas Tasmania only paid some 10s. per head.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I cannot conceive of that difference having been made up in so short a time.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The figures show that the payments have become closely approximated, and New South Wales, in 1904-5, paid Customs duty to the amount of £2 1s. 7½d. per head, whilst Tasmania paid £1 16s. 8d. per head, a difference of only 5s. Tasmania has therefore picked up 5s. in the time. Honorable members will not wonder at that when I tell them that Tasmania has improved her position from that of an exporter to the value of £1,500,000 to that of an exporter to the value of £3,500,000. She has been paying off an old debt which existed; and she has increased considerably the value of her primary products—wool, gold, metal, root crops, and agricultural products generally. In every line she has shown a progress as marked as will be found in any one of the most important and progressive States of Australia. She has enriched the architecture of her cities, "has pulled down her old barns, and built greater structures," and has, in fact, "laid up much goods for herself for many years." This indicates a splendid position for the people of a young State.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Federation has not injured Tasmania so much after all.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Federation has only injured Tasmania in the way I have said, that she is paying 4s. 2d. per head of her population on account of Federal expenditure. Although I pointed out that she lost in revenue, plus new expenditure, £230,000, I did not forget to say—and if I did, I am glad the honorable member for Herbert reminds me—that for 180,000 people she has saved £1 per head per annum under the Tariff. Under the Tariff in force to-day, her people pay £1 16s. 8d. per head, whilst under the Tariff of 1900, they paid £2 17s. per head. They have, therefore, saved £1 per head, or £180,000. That amount has gone into, or has remained in, the pockets of her people. We shall probably not find many of them who will admit it, but it is nevertheless a fact. So that, although there is a black side to the picture, when we are dealing with the position of Tasmania in the Federation, there is also a brighter side which we can hold up to her people. We can tell them, for whatever it is worth, that though they may be in the position of having to submit to a new class of taxation, it is a substituted payment, and their taxation has only been increased to the amount of 4s. 2d. per head as the result of Federation. Unfortunately, they have had to enter upon a new class of taxation as I have said, but it is only fair to admit in the Federal Parliament, that so far as that is concerned, the people of Tasmania were entitled to a new class of legislation. With the exception of Western Australia, there was not one of the other States in the year 1900 in which the people were paying £2 17s. per head in Customs and Excise taxation. That was an extravagant rate of payment, and I am not at all sorry that the people of Tasmania are, under the Commonwealth, only paying £1 16s. 8d. in Customs and Excise taxation. It therefore seems to me that we have approached the time when the Treasurers ought to more closely investigate the position, so far as the bookkeeping period is concerned. If they do, I feel certain that New South Wales will not now say, as she said at the time of the Convention, that, so far as her revenue was concerned, she was like a lamb about to be consumed by the wolves, namely, the weaker States, but will find that the Customs and Excise receipts of the States so closely approximate that there should be no difficulty in amending the bookkeeping provisions under the powers given to the Parliament by that section of the Constitution which says that the bookkeeping system shall last for five years, or until the Parliament shall otherwise direct. That time will soon arrive, and I wish that it had been during the Treasurer's year of office, so that he might have come boldly to the front and said that Western Australia would not stand in the way.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—She is not prepared to give up £500,000 a year.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Western Australia will not be asked to give up £650,000 — which is nearer the actual figures — but the suggestion has already been made that a sliding scale should be adopted. The right honorable member for East Sydney proposed that in the Finance Committee of the 1897 Convention, but it was too big a thing at the time. New South Wales was then receiving only £1,250,000 from Customs and Excise, and could not afford to double her revenue from that head. Therefore, when the right honorable member got out of Committee, he found that he was making too liberal an offer. But, if either he or the present Premier of New South Wales were approached, and it were pointed out that the revenues of New South Wales and Victoria from Customs and Excise now approximate as closely as 1s., there should be no difficulty about throwing the whole into hotch-pot, and allowing the division hereafter to be per capita, giving to Western Australia the special terms that she may need.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—To what years do the honorable member's Western Australian figures refer?

SIR PHILIP FYSH.—They range from £5 8s. 3d. in 1901 to £4 5s. in 1904-5. Each year, as Western Australia becomes more settled, and as people build and furnish homes there, the revenue from Customs will decline. We shall not ask anything from that State, but will rather be inclined to deal liberally with her. Seeing that Western Australia, after five years, remains the lion in the path, it is time that we killed, or appeased, that lion. I shall not detain the Committee by a discussion of the Braddon provision. The honorable member for Wakefield, if he were here, would remember that he and I had much conversation with respect to the purpose which many of us had in the Convention of securing the return to the States of all or sufficient of the Customs revenue to keep them going. In talking the matter over at the time with other confrères with whom we were intimate, we were very doubtful as to what the result of the provision might be; but the late Sir Edward Braddon was not a man to see difficulties in his path, and at 2 o'clock in the morning he proposed the clause to which his name is attached. As a number of honorable members were favorable to some provision of the kind, though none of them knew clearly what he wanted, and less still the effect of such a provision, the clause was passed, in the hope that some good might come of it. Good has come of it, and I think will of it while it continues to have force. Of course, Parliament could make the provision valueless at any time by enacting a new method of taxation, but a Commonwealth land tax would be the downfall of any party that proposed it. We in Victoria are paying a land tax on capital value which is equivalent to an income of 10d. in the £1. The honorable member for Darwin a day or two ago foolishly talked about imposing a land tax to raise revenue to redeem our debt. I have heard the taxation of the land discussed ever since I have been in politics. It is all very well to talk about a land tax now that our flocks and herds have been restored, and we are getting 5s. a fleece for our wool, but we have to remember that our pastoralists and agriculturists have just recovered from the effects of a seven years' drought. I would not be a party to imposing further burdens on those who are subject to such vicissitudes.

MR. HUTCHISON.—What is the honorable member's policy?

SIR PHILIP FYSH. — I will not listen to any proposal to tax those engaged in any pursuit in such a way as to threaten their ruin. I am not going to tell honorable members what my policy is. I had to say to a member of the Tasmanian House, who asked me what my policy was, "The best policy of the angels, if it were to the Opposition to-day would ruin the country to-morrow." Therefore, although I may have an angelic proposal to make, I am not going to submit it to honorable members to-night. I know that the land is sufficiently taxed already, and I do not know whether any Ministry which brought forward a proposal for taxing the land, or, in fact, any system of direct taxation, would live very long.

MR. MAUGER.—What would the honorable member do if such a proposal were brought forward by a Ministry to which he belonged?

SIR PHILIP FYSH. — I think I should retire. Before I joined the Ministry I knew the whole policy of the Government as outlined in his Maitland speech, and adhered to it throughout. I believe that one of the results of repealing the Braddon section would be to bring about a proposal for the taxation of land, and, further, I fear that it would continue to expend money at the present it will be necessary, even with the Braddon section still in operation, to adopt some system of direct taxation. We are right up to our limit now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not at all; we have £400,000 or £500,000 left yet.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—That may be all very well so far as New South Wales and Victoria are concerned, but if I went to the people in any of the smaller States, and suggested that the Commonwealth should appropriate all the money to which the Treasurer has referred, they would exclaim, in the words of Mercutio, when he was wounded by Tybalt, "A plague o' both your houses." They would add, "Do as little as you can; the less you do the better. The public can support themselves, even against bad legislation, but give us as little of that as possible." They are satisfied to let things go on as they are, without fresh taxation or anything else. I have not said more than half I had intended to say, but I find that my voice is failing me. After the last general election I entirely lost my voice, and if I strain my vocal chords too much I may be visited with similar consequences again. In conclusion I would commend to honorable members the two or three points which I have presented to them, and I hope that they will give them serious consideration. Although this debate may have no direct result, I think that the exchange of ideas which has taken place will prove profitable. I thank the Treasurer for the important budget of statistics which he has published with his speech. I am gratified that he was able to give us, and truthfully so, an optimistic statement. I believe that what we are able to say of the Commonwealth to-day we shall hereafter be able to repeat in still higher degree; that we shall be able to tell the world not only that we are holding our own, but that we are enjoying peace, plenty, and happiness in one of the best countries in which a man can live.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but I think it desirable to refer to one or two matters which have been mentioned by honorable members. I was very pleased to hear the Treasurer say that he believed in spending during the financial year the money voted on the Estimates. I think that we should be very careful before we vote any money, because it is necessary to exercise economy, but when funds are once appropriated they should be disbursed as far as possible during the year for which they are voted. I find that £10,000 of the money voted for expenditure in Tasmania last year has to be revoted. I do not censure the present Government or the late Government for this result, because we have had so many changes under our present system of party government that it is difficult to know upon whose shoulders to lay the blame. It is important that the money voted for the year should be spent during that period, because under our present system of revoting unexpended balances our expenditure is represented as much greater than it actually is. I think that the suggestion made by the honorable member for South Sydney for the appointment of a Finance Committee is an excellent one. It is impossible for honorable members to discuss matters of detail in connexion with our financial affairs, and when frequent changes of Government occur the Treasurer is also placed at a great disadvantage. A Finance Committee would be in a position to keep itself in continuous touch with the details of the Commonwealth expenditure, and enlighten us considerably with regard to many matters in respect to which it is now impossible to obtain full information. I find that of £335 voted last year for the purchase of overcoats for the members of the Defence Force, in Tasmania, only £5 was spent. That seems a very small sum indeed if any vote was necessary last year.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — Did they have any rain in Tasmania last year?

Mr. STORRER. — Certainly. They must either have experienced a very mild winter there or there must have been very few volunteers. Again, though a large expenditure was sanctioned in connexion with the defence of Hobart, the vote was not expended. I understand that the work in question has now been put in hand. A great delay also occurred in the opening of the new post-office there. Only last Easter I saw the windows of that building placarded with advertisements. That was the only use to which it was being put at that time. However, I am glad to know that the building was opened last week, and consequently I do not intend to complain further upon that ground. In connexion with the post-office, I observe that £3,000 was voted last year, which was not expended. There are many other unexpended balances. Some time ago I endeavoured unsuccessfully to get a little board erected at a small country post-office for the convenience of those who wished to send telegrams. That work would have cost about 5s., but I could not get it carried out. Yet I find that last year £200 was voted for incidental expenses in Tasmania, which were not incurred. I wish also to call attention to the expenditure upon public works, which has already been referred to by the honorable member for Boothby. I find that the proposed expenditure in New South Wales is £99,777; in Victoria, £69,724; Queensland, £31,787; South Australia, £31,009; Western Australia, £73,718; and Tasmania, £11,196. In other words, the expenditure to be incurred in Western Australia during the current year is equal to that in Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania, notwithstanding that the population of those States is nearly four times that of Western Australia. I am aware that a large outlay is necessary to erect fortifications at Fremantle.

Mr. CARPENTER. — A large portion of that expenditure consists of re-votes.

Mr. STORRER. — But I would point out that in Tasmania and the other States, large sums have also been re-voted. Whilst it may be necessary to incur a large expenditure upon the defence of Fremantle, it is equally necessary that other places should be defended.

Mr. CARPENTER.—We shall have to pay for all defences, sooner or later.

Mr. STORRER. — We ought to deal with these questions in a Federal spirit, and in this connexion Western Australia should not possess an advantage over the other States. Any new expenditure for defence must be paid for by the Commonwealth; but the States are still paying for the defence works which they erected years ago. If we spend £20,000 upon defence works in Western Australia, we ought to pay interest to the other States upon the expenditure which they have incurred in the same direction. Last year I endeavoured to get the mails to the islands in the Straits carried by steamer in lieu of the sailing boat which is at present employed. Years ago they were carried by steamer, and a regular service was thereby insured. But, owing to some action on the part of the State Government, a sailing boat was substituted, with the result that the present service is a very irregular one. I trust that this matter will receive early attention, with a view to making the change which I suggest. In the course of this debate we have heard a good deal about the steps we should take to induce settlement upon the land. During the time that I have occupied a seat in this House, I have done my best to secure to residents in the backblocks the privilege of being allowed to post their letters by trains, without being called to pay an extra fee. A man may perhaps journey ten miles to meet a passenger, or in the expectation of receiving a parcel by train; but if he wishes to post a letter by that train he must either be at the railway station an hour before its arrival, or pay an additional fee of one penny. Seeing that residents in the city enjoy every convenience in regard to postal matters, surely some consideration might be extended to settlers in our remote country districts. Reference has been made to the question of the transfer of the States debts. I was one of those who opposed the draft Constitution Bill, because I foresaw that it would involve the people in additional expense without affording them any compensating advantage. But if any saving can be effected, as the result of Federation, it will certainly be made by the solution of that problem. If it had not been for the frequent changes of Government which have taken place, I think that the question would have been dealt with before now. I was sorry to hear the disparaging remarks which were made by one honorable member concerning the ex-Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balaclava. I believe that no abler Treasurer could be found, and therefore I am impelled to the conclusion that the honorable member to whom I refer was more in jest than in earnest. I do not think that the Braddon section affords any real protection or safety to the States, and for that reason I think the question of whether it is extended or not is immaterial. Mr. John Henry, who, although a free-trader, and as such is politically opposed to me, is one of the ablest financiers in Tasmania, has pointed out in letters to the press—one of which was quoted by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne—that even if the Braddon section were continued, and the Commonwealth required more than one-fourth of the Customs revenue, it would be open to us to impose direct taxation. That being so, the Braddon section affords the States no safeguard.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—But the Commonwealth Parliament would have to take the responsibility of imposing direct taxation.

Mr. STORRER.—We have to accept responsibility for everything that we do. It is for the electors themselves to see that they return those who will be prepared to practice economy, and thus to save the States from unnecessary taxation.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—But we ought to retain the safeguard of the Braddon section.

Mr. STORRER.—I repeat that, in my opinion, it is not a safeguard, but if the States believe that it is, and, being afraid of extravagances on the part of the Federal Parliament, are anxious that it shall be continued, I shall offer no objection to that being done. Much has been said in reference to the sugar industry. I was one of those who visited Queensland some months ago to investigate the question, and I made an independent inquiry as to the employment of black labour, the effect of the sugar bonus and other matters associated with this important subject.

Mr. WILSON.—The parliamentary party went at the wrong time of the year.

Mr. STORRER.—As a member of that party, I went at the right time, having regard to my own personal comfort. I went when I was invited. The Government of Queensland courteously extended an invitation to members of the Federal Parliament to visit the sugar-growing districts of the State, and it may be assumed that they selected the right time for the inspection. It is ridiculous to say that we went there at the wrong time. Surely, as men who are not accustomed to the tropics, we could not be expected to go to Northern Queensland to test whether or not the climate is suitable for the employment of white labour in the cane-fields. It would be just as unreasonable to ask us to do that as it would be to call upon those who are unused to working in the open air to labour in the harvest fields of Tasmania. The question is not whether any member of the Parliament can work in the cane-fields, but whether white labourers generally can do so. I am not going to express an opinion on that point, but shall quote a remark made by Mr. Draper, who is strongly in favour of black labour, and has been engaged for many years in the sugar-growing industry near Cairns. That gentleman said, on the occasion of the parliamentary visit, "I am not fool enough to stand here and say that a white man cannot do the work."

Mr. McDONALD.—He is the greatest opponent we have in the north.

Mr. STORRER.—He is strongly opposed to the principle of a White Australia.

Mr. WILSON.—He said that it was uncomfortable for a white man to work in the cane-fields of Northern Queensland.

Mr. STORRER.—It is even uncomfortable at times to remain in this Chamber. Sometimes it is very hot, and at others it is very cold; but still we manage to live. I went to Queensland with a perfectly open mind, determined to study the question free from all party feeling, and I came to the conclusion that a mistake had been made in giving a fixed bonus for five years instead of on a sliding scale. Whatever decision we may arrive at as to the continuance of the system, I hold that we should allow the bonus to gradually taper off. It would be wise probably to allow the planters the full bonus for another three years, and at the end of that period to reduce it by one-third per annum for the succeeding three years. The whole system would thus disappear at the end of six years.

Mr. FISHER.—Would the honorable member also do away with the Excise duty?

Mr. STORRER.—I do not believe that we should have an Excise duty on white-grown sugar, any more than I do that we should have an Excise duty on furniture, potatoes, or anything else that is manufactured or produced here. Why should there be an Excise duty on sugar produced in Federated Australia? I should not object to a black man working in the cane-fields, as long as he received the same wage as that allowed a white man, because I think that the one is as good as the other; but I have never believed in the importation of coloured men to work at low wages. I have always been opposed to the condition of semi-slavery under which these coloured labourers have been working.

Mr. WILSON.—They have not been subject to that condition under the Griffith regulations.

Mr. STORRER.—I remember hearing Dr. Paton, who knew more about the coloured men of the South Sea Islands than any of us do, saying, thirty years ago, that kanakas were brought from the islands to work in Australia in almost a state of slavery. They were brought to Australia subject to the condition that they would be returned to their island homes at the end of three years, and every coloured man to whom I spoke on the sugar plantations expressed the desire to be returned to his island. I do not include within this category the coloured men living in Rockhampton, who called upon the members of the parliamentary party, and asked that they might be permitted to remain. I do not think that any one anticipated when the Pacific Island Labourers' Bill was before Parliament that coloured citizens who had lived for thirty or thirty-five years in Australia would be deported under its provisions, and I fail to understand how these men could have been led to believe that they would be deported. But some persons are ready to make any statement in order to serve a party purpose. As an illustration of this, I may mention that a coloured man in Launceston, who earns his livelihood as a chimney sweep, was led to believe that he would be deported in a short time. He came to me shortly before I left Tasmania to attend the Parliament, to learn whether this statement was correct, and he informed me that he had a wife and a large family, whom the Government of the State or of the Commonwealth would have to maintain if he were deported. This case shows to what extremes some persons will go when they are anxious to arouse feeling against a party. I do not know that it is necessary for me to refer at greater length to the question of the sugar bounty, because a Bill relating to the subject will be submitted to us. I quite agree with the remarks made by the Treasurer as to the detractors of Australia. After reading Canada as it Is, I feel that it would be well if we had in Australia a little more of the spirit that actuates the people of the Dominion. The Canadians will hear nothing said against their country, for with them Canada is everything that is good. When we realize the progress that Australia has made within a comparatively few years we have a right to be proud of our position. We have everything which nature can provide us with, and all we want is the true courage to go forward and develop our resources. There is one difficulty which stands in the way, and that is that some matters are managed by the Commonwealth, and others by the States. I trust, however, that we shall be enabled to work to for the good of the whole community, so our resources may be more fully developed than they have been. I hope there are many men who hold the same opinion of the people of Australia, and the members of its Parliament, as does the Treasurer of Tasmania, who was pleased in his letter last week to refer to the representatives of that State in this House and in the Senate as not truly representing its interests. I do not take that statement to refer to me personally, for I am here, not of my own will, but because the electors sent me there as they did every other representative of Tasmania. When the Treasurer of the State passes a reflection on its representatives here, he passes a reflection on the wisdom of the electors. I am very sorry that he spoke as he did. I think that great mistakes are made by State Treasurers in referring to the Commonwealth as they do, with reference to matters of expenditure. It was known by every one in Tasmania who cared to think that there would be a large expenditure in connection with the Commonwealth, and that the State would lose a large amount of revenue through Inter-State free-trade, as its produce is imported largely from Sydney and Melbourne. For the Treasurer of the State to refer to the Commonwealth for any loss of that kind, when the people who cared to look to the other side of the question knew that such would happen, is, I think, altogether beside the mark. I trust that States Treasurers, instead of saying anything which is likely to stir up strife between the States and the Federal Parliament, will all work together for the good of Australia. I hope that the next Budget will be found to be better than the present one, that the moneys which we may vote will be spent to the good of the various States, and that we shall hear no complaints of votes not having been spent. I have more details to refer to, but I shall reserve my remarks until the items to which they refer have been reached. I shall conclude with the expression of my hope that the anticipations of the Treasurer will be fully realized.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—One has to look round the Chamber and see the weary appearance of the majority of the honorable members to know that this is an early day. As it is the custom to rise early on Tuesday, I ask the Prime Minister if he will consent to adjourn?

Progress reported.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

RETIREMENT OF MR. McLEAN.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—At the request of the honorable member for Gippsland, and with great regret, I move—

That the honorable member for Gippsland (Mr. McLean) be discharged from attendance on the Standing Orders Committee.

Honorable members are aware that the honorable member for Gippsland, in spite of our request and remonstrance, has thought fit to retire from this Committee. There are, perhaps, reasons of health for that, apart from the questions which were discussed in the Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I know that several honorable members desire to make some observations on this matter, and at this hour I ask the Prime Minister to consent to an adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DEAKIN. — What purpose can be served if the honorable member wishes to retire?

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Gippsland is absent.

Mr. DEAKIN. — The honorable member was aware that I would take this means of bringing the matter on.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Apart altogether from the honorable member for Gippsland, I think it is a matter of some importance.

Mr. CHANTER.—These observations could be made when the new standing order is before the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not yet aware that any new standing order is to be brought on.

Mr. DEAKIN. — If there is not, what cause of complaint is there?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable and learned gentleman say that it is intended to submit a new standing order?

Mr. DEAKIN. — I cannot say that definitely—probably it is.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is quite unfair to take a matter of this importance at this hour.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is only a formal motion when the honorable member concerned wishes it to be moved.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — It is not a formal motion by any means.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It must be when it is moved at the honorable member's request.

I do not wish the House to pass it. I would rather that the honorable member for Gippsland did not retire.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I ask the Prime Minister to consent to an adjournment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—When the honorable member for Gippsland asked me to bring on the motion as early as I could I asked him to allow me to do so to-night, after the Committee of Supply had reported, and he agreed. He said he did not wish the matter to be delayed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does that settle the matter?

Mr. DEAKIN.—So far as he and I are concerned it does.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No doubt the honorable member for Gippsland wants the matter brought forward at the earliest possible moment; but I take exception to the remark of the Prime Minister that it must necessarily be a formal matter. It is anything but that.

Mr. McDONALD.—Is there any need for a motion at all?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know; the honorable member should address that observation to the Prime Minister. So far as I know there will not be any unreasonably long debate. I had no idea of that sort in my mind when I asked for an adjournment.

Mr. THOMAS.—What debate can there be when the honorable member for Gippsland wishes to retire?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable member hold his tongue for a moment?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member should not speak in that way to another honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—May I ask you, sir, to protect me from the constant interruptions of the honorable member?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If any interruptions had taken place which seemed to me of such a character that they should be checked, I should have checked them; but for the honorable member to speak as he did is not, as he must know, in accordance with the duty which honorable members owe to each other.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am glad, sir, to take your rebuke at any time. If the Prime Minister declines to accede to my request, the matter must remain there.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I am very much alarmed at the new feature.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do I understand, sir, that I am taken to have spoken?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have no doubt that if the honorable member so desires the House will permit him to continue his speech; but, technically, he completed his speech when he resumed his seat.

Mr. FISHER.—I have no wish to continue the debate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I appeal to the Prime Minister to postpone this debate until to-morrow.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — It need not have been brought on at all.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not at all?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not at the present time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do I understand that the Prime Minister will not consent to an adjournment?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I really feel at a loss. I was asked by the honorable member for Gippsland to bring on the motion to-night, and do not see that I can be relieved from my promise.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to speak on this question; but I am not prepared to do so at this hour. If the Prime Minister chooses to treat the matter in this way I shall have to put up with it, I presume; but I desire to enter an emphatic protest against this method of dealing with an important matter of this kind.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It relates only to one member, and I am moving at his request.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It relates to more than one member. It relates to a resignation from the Standing Orders Committee, which affects the whole House. We want to know why the honorable member for Gippsland has resigned from this important Committee—this supreme Committee of the House. When a man of his standing and reputation retires from a position of that kind, the least we should have is a statement of reasons from the Prime Minister, who is also a member of the Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not wish him to resign. I regret that he has done so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the Prime Minister might have given some reasons for the resignation, and might have made a statement to the House concerning matters which led up to it. We all know that it has reference to the framing of a new standing order, which is not now before the House. It is quite an anomalous thing that we should be discussing this resignation, and that the standing order to which it has reference should be kept back from the House.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why not discuss all the Standing Orders? This is only one.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why not something else all the time? The Government corner seems to be the "why not" corner.

Mr. TUDOR. — The amendment of the Standing Orders was the whole of the late Government's programme; they had nothing else to propose.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—After all the ridicule of the proposal to amend the Standing Orders, it now seems that one of the most important proposals, in the view of honorable members opposite, is an instruction to the Standing Orders Committee to frame a new standing order of their own.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—But that is not our whole programme.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it not? I apprehend that we are well aware of that. We have been made aware of it by the business-paper of the House.

Mr. WATSON.—The late Government proposed nothing but the amendment of the Standing Orders.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am replying to the statement that this is not all the programme of honorable members opposite. The business-paper is full of their programme, and the members of the Government like lambs are carrying it out. I congratulate my friends in the Ministerial corner upon having their own way so far as schemes of legislation are concerned.

Mr. CHANTER.—What has this to do with the motion?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nothing; nor has the honorable member's interjection anything to do with it. I make my protest against this attempt to bludgeon this motion through at this hour of the night. It is a preposterous thing to do. The Prime Minister is not treating the House fairly over the matter, nor is he treating the Opposition fairly. If the Prime Minister is not able to control the House, and to pass legislation with a proper regard to what is due to the Opposition, and with a regard to reasonable hours and reasonable conditions, he ought to get out of his present position, which is no longer tenable.

Mr. WATSON.—That is the trouble.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is no longer tenable for any man who has any regard for the decencies of Parliament. That may be a matter for honorable members in the corner to be amused at.

Mr. THOMAS.—Fancy the honorable member lecturing us on the decencies of Parliament!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Barrier does more lecturing in the House than any one I know. I am not lecturing any one. My only complaint about him is that he does not get on to his feet when he wishes to lecture. He sits in the corner and does it. I should admire him more if he would rise in his place, instead of interrupting people who are trying to conduct the business of Parliament. It is an outrageous thing to bring this matter forward at this stage, and expect it to go through as a formal matter. I had some observations to make upon it, but I cannot make them instant. But I assure my honorable and learned friend, the Prime Minister, that if he thinks that this course will lead to the settlement of the matter without due debate, he is making a very great mistake. If he is prepared to deal with us fairly, and to allow the matter to be treated reasonably, so far as I know there will be no prolonged debate.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That is a threat.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nothing of the kind. I am merely making a reasonable assertion of the rights of the Opposition. I hope that we have some rights left. We do not hold caucuses, indicate our decisions to the Government, and expect them to be carried out. We make our opinions known to the Government in the broad light of day. Honorable members in the corner have a secret subterranean way of indicating their decisions to the Ministry, and they get their wishes put through in a manner which I have no doubt pleases them.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is that how the honorable member did it when he was leader of the Labour Party in New South Wales?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I never was leader of the Labour Party in the sense in which it has a leader to-day.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is a qualification.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is no qualification. I am simply stating facts. I hope we have not got to that pitch in Parliament when the domination of a caucus shall rule, and when proper consideration will not be paid to the wishes of those who desire to have a reasonable opportunity for debate. Here is an important proposal, affecting the resignation from the Standing Orders Committee of an honorable member, who has been a member of this House for five years, and was previously a prominent man in State politics for twenty-five years. He has felt impelled to resign as a protest against what he regards as an unwarrantable and unreasonable interference with the rights of the members of this House. The members of the Labour Party ought to be the first to see that a matter affecting the privileges of Parliament is reasonably debated. Yet they are trying to poke fun at any proposal of the kind now. They are amused at it. Of course, all they have to do is to be solid. They can carry through any kind of cronk business, so long as the caucus is solid behind it. And I say that this is as cronk a piece of business as I have ever seen proposed to a deliberative assembly.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member lacks a sense of proportion when he talks of there being anything cronk in this business.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not go to the honorable member for lessons in political proportion, though I might go to him for lessons in political finesse.

Mr. WATSON.—I cannot teach the honorable member much in that line.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think the honorable member can. At any rate, he has a way of getting his will by means of which we on this side do not seem to be masters. Until we know his secret, we must potter along in our own way.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must speak to the question.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall, of course, abide by your ruling, sir; but one must make some reply to these persistent interjections. I ask the honorable member reasonably—

Mr. DEAKIN.—Is this the honorable member's idea of asking reasonably?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think I was putting a reasonable request to the Prime Minister for ten minutes at least after I rose. Now, when, owing to the Prime Minister's contemptuous silence, I make a remark of any kind, he fastens on to it and asks whether it is reasonable. I shall make no more requests to the Prime Minister. Whatever results in the way of discussion, I hope he will not attribute it to any desire to block the business of Parliament. But we propose to discuss this question, and, in spite of whatever the Prime Minister may do, we will discuss it.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I do not see the necessity for the display of heat on the part of the honorable member for Parramatta. If this were a proposal to pass a new standing order at this hour of the night, I could understand the objection raised.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister will not even say that there is going to be a new standing order.

Mr. WATSON.—I should be quite willing to assist in preventing any action of the kind I have indicated. It is only proper that members should have a reasonable opportunity to discuss every important proposal, whether introduced by the Government or by a member of the House. In this case, however, the simple question at issue is whether a certain gentleman who desires to be relieved of his attendance on a Committee shall or shall not be relieved.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Have we no right to discuss the resignation?

Mr. KELLY.—Or the reasons which led up to it?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not say there is no right, but I do say there is no great need, in the public interest, to discuss the matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the honorable member's opinion.

Mr. WATSON.—In deference to the honorable member for Parramatta, who is so touchy to-night, I will say that, in my opinion, there is no need, in the public interest, to discuss the question now. Before any action can be taken, the standing order about which I am told all the trouble has arisen will come before honorable members, and may be discussed at length. I have sufficient confidence in the methods of the Opposition to rely on the matter being discussed at length.

Mr. LIDDELL. — We are not sure the standing order will come before us.

Mr. WATSON.—If the standing order does not come before us, in what way is the honorable member aggrieved? That interjection would tend to show that the Opposition are only anxious to get a grievance, or to be able to say that they are being deprived of their rights.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I am speaking personally, and not for the Opposition.

Mr. WATSON.—I trust that, as the honorable member for Gippsland has asked to be relieved of his attendance on the Committee, honorable members will consent to reserve the discussion of whatever principle is involved until the standing order is before us, and may be discussed in all its bearings.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The honorable member for Bland has rolled up with all his merry band of followers to endeavour to push through the House a certain proposal. What are all the honorable members doing in the corner to-night? We have not seen such a House since the session began. The honorable members are here for no good purpose, we may be sure. They are here to assist the Government to drive through a motion which presents the only opportunity we have to discuss the causes which led to the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unfortunately, that matter will be before us too frequently for discussion.

Mr. KELLY.—Will the Prime Minister say that he proposes to submit the new standing order to the House?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall give notice of any intention to do so.

Mr. KELLY.—The Prime Minister probably recognises that the proposed standing order is unconstitutional, and, consequently, he now seeks at this late hour to get the proposal off the notice-paper, so that it may be dropped before there is any opportunity for discussion. But a rather regrettable attempt has been made on the liberties of the House. An effort has been made to force through the Standing Orders Committee a certain proposal designed not in the interests of the House, but in order to ease the Government in its control of the House—and certainly the control requires easing—by a means which I do not think reflects credit on its originator or the Government who supported it. It is a great pity that the Prime Minister does not see fit to consent to an adjournment, because the House, after honorable members have been travelling all night, is certainly not in a state to calmly discuss a question affecting its liberties. I do not know whether I shall be in order in referring to the causes which led to the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland. The new standing order of which we have heard, would enable the business of the country to be carried on anywhere within the precincts of the House, and that is surely a proposal which we ought not to indorse. That, I take it, is the cause of the honorable member's resignation, and, therefore, I assume I am in order in as briefly as possible going into the question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The position is that it is not in order to discuss at any time in the House, until a Committee has reported, any proceedings of a Committee; and, therefore, it is impossible that we can to-night, or at any time, until the Standing Orders Committee has reported, discuss any proceedings that it may have taken, or proposes to take. But I recognise all the difficulties of the case, because it is understood there are reasons, resulting from the work of the Committee, why the resignation was tendered, and why the assent of the House is sought to be obtained. Therefore, those phases of the question, I must rule, are open to discussion. The question may be fairly debated now as to whether the honorable member for Gippsland has, or has not, been fairly treated by the Standing Orders Committee. Honorable members may discuss the reasons which led the honorable member to retire—reasons which, I understand, he stated in the House as sufficient. But as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the proposed standing order, any matter bearing on its acceptance by the House or otherwise would present phases which could only be discussed when the Committee reports, and then only if the report contains the suggested standing order.

Mr. KELLY.—Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I think that makes the position very clear. In order to keep myself within your ruling, I shall for the moment place myself in the position of the honorable member for Gippsland, when confronted with the proposal which members of the Government and their supporters in the Committee asked him to indorse.

Mr. McDONALD.—The Government had nothing to do with it.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Gippsland recognised that the proposal would, without any doubt, lead to a false system in our legislative methods—that it would lead to a system whereby honorable members could be said to be carrying out their legislative duties when—and I say this in no invidious sense—they were in the billiard-room or the refreshment-room upstairs. The honorable member for Gippsland naturally realized, in such circumstances, that this Chamber is the only proper arena for legislative effort. That is shown by the honorable member's resignation. The honorable member has given evidence that he realizes that the right of the people to govern themselves, through their representatives, demands that there shall always be a quorum in this Chamber to insure that every measure submitted to Parliament shall receive consideration. In order that that right of the people might be properly safeguarded, it was actually provided in the Federal Constitution, in section 39, that—

Until the Parliament otherwise provides—not until the Standing Orders Committee otherwise provides, but until the Parliament, which comprises not only this House, but both Houses of the Federal Legislature otherwise provides—the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of members of the House of Representatives shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers.

That safeguard was definitely inserted in the Constitution in order to insure the fair discussion of all measures submitted to this Parliament. The people have decided that at least one-third of their representatives must be present in this Chamber before any measure under discussion can be said to have received fair consideration. The honorable member for Gippsland was obviously correct in taking the view that the proposal which he was asked to indorse is one which strikes at the very root of the principle underlying section 39 of the Constitution. A number of inroads have been made upon the representative character of our institutions, and it is all the more necessary that we should have no more of them. Honorable members do not appear to recognise their high duty to the people of Australia in the exercise of their representative position as members of this House. The honorable member for Bland, when this matter was last discussed, told the House that, at any rate, he did not believe in such fair discussion as members of the Opposition were giving to all the contentious measures submitted by the Government. The honorable gentleman laid down what he regarded as his duty in the matter. He said that he would be prepared to stay within the precincts of the Chamber, and to come in and make a quorum whenever the Government desired.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I beg to draw attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. KELLY.—I take it that the honorable gentleman has a duty far higher and more comprehensive than that which he outlined so simply. He owes a certain duty to his constituents, and probably, after hearing his statement on the subject, they will demand that he shall pay some attention to it.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Does the honorable member think that they will demand that the honorable member for Bland shall come here and listen to twaddle like this?

Mr. WILSON.—Is the honorable member for Herbert in order in describing the remarks of the honorable member for Wentworth as "twaddle"?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am sure the honorable member for Herbert will withdraw the remark, since it has been objected to.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I withdraw it.

Mr. KELLY.—I regret that these interruptions should tend to make my speech longer than it would otherwise be. I was explaining that the honorable member for Bland told us the attitude he proposed to take up, and I contend that his duty to his constituents is more comprehensive than that which he has laid down.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—On a point of order, I wish to know if anything which the honorable member for Bland proposes to do has anything to do with the motion before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER.—It has nothing whatever to do with the motion. At the same time, the honorable member for Bland has spoken, and the honorable member for Wentworth is entitled to reply to any remarks made by the honorable member for Bland bearing on the question.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The references by the honorable member for Wentworth have been to something which the honorable member for Bland said on another occasion, and not to what that honorable gentleman said to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I was not listening at the moment, and if the honorable member for Wentworth refers to such remarks, he is not in order.

Mr. KELLY.—I was saying, before the numerous interruptions to my speech took place, that the honorable member for Gippsland, confronted as he was with such a proposal as that out of which the motion now before us has arisen, necessarily recognised that the right of the people to have measures submitted to Parliament properly considered was in danger of being infringed. I was pointing out also that in view of the apathy with which, during this session, the House has treated all public measures, the action taken by the honorable member for Gippsland was the more necessary. I mentioned that the honorable member for Bland had distinctly stated in this Chamber that he regarded his public duty as no more than coming in and making a quorum for Government whenever they desired. The question of the formation of a quorum at the root of the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland, and the honorable member for Bland has so much weight—not in this Chamber, but in its precincts—I take it that all that is forward as to the duty of honorable members in making a quorum will be referred to the debate. Am I in order in asking that?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is in order so far.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Bland is absolutely wrong in laying down such a code of behaviour as that which he attempted to lay down. It is his duty to his constituents, he has sworn to his party. There is a party in this country which has definitely laid down that its representatives in this Parliament must have no open honest alliance with representatives of any other party.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not now discussing the question.

Mr. KELLY.—Of course, I bow to the ruling, and will merely add that, as the honorable member for Bland has put his views of his own duty very simply, it is his duty as a member of the Labour Party to come forward and carefully consider every measure submitted to the House. What advantage is gained from the honorable member's being in at odd moments and making a quorum whenever the Government is awakened to its duty to keep a quorum? Surely this Chamber is the proper place for the consideration of measures. Are the people's liberties to be safeguarded if measures are to be considered in the House and then rushed through this House without the support of a majority?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not now complying with the ruling. I have just laid down at his request that he is discussing the merits of the proposal, standing order, a discussion which should take place only when the Standing Orders Committee reports.

Mr. KELLY.—I was not intending to infringe your ruling, sir. I thought I should be in order, because you have laid down that I should be entitled to state the reasons which may have prompted the honorable member for Gippsland in coming forward from the Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member would be in order in doing that; but such a discussion does not authorize the discussion of the merits of the proposed standing order. It may be suggested that the honorable member for Gippsland had not been fairly treated by the other members of the Committee, or that for some other reason he had a right to retire; or it may be argued that he should or should not have withdrawn; but none of these arguments will permit the discussion of the proposed standing order.

Mr. KELLY.—Then I shall proceed to discuss whether the honorable member for Gippsland was properly treated by the other members of the Committee. All I know is that he went to this meeting—I think that we have his words in this Chamber for it—and was suddenly confronted with this wild proposal. There was no notice given to the Standing Orders Committee of the proposal, which undoubtedly calls in question all constitutional right and authority. He and another member of the Committee, who also sits on the Opposition side of the Chamber, suddenly found themselves confronted with a motion which must have been sprung on the Committee. When the honorable member saw the serious and far-reaching effect—

Mr. McDONALD.—I ask if the honorable member is in order in discussing something which he supposes to have taken place in the Standing Orders Committee? If he is allowed to pursue this course, a misrepresentation of what happened will be made public, and that may compel some member of the Committee to break his bond of confidence, in order to put things straight.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—You have already ruled, sir, that not only the resignation, but the reasons leading up to it may be discussed. That discussion, of course, involves the statement made by the honorable member for Gippsland, and that again involves the discussion of the proposed standing order, and the course which was taken to bring it into existence.

Mr. SALMON.—The statement of the honorable member for Gippsland was made by way of personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That fact, of which I was not previously aware, entirely disposes of the argument which I thought justified the discussion which was proceeding. The honorable member is taking a most unusual, if not unprecedented, course, in discussing, first of all, something which took place in a committee of the whole House not yet reported to us; and, in the next place, the proceedings of a committee of the House, which are not supposed to be noticed, the Committee not having reported. It seems to me that this is quite out of accord with parliamentary practice. I am in some doubt as to what rule to lay down, because I was not aware until just now of the fact mentioned by the honorable member for Laanecoorie. I regret that this discussion is taking place previous to the presentation of the Committee's report. If the honorable member for Gippsland desires to be relieved forthwith from attendance on the Standing Orders Committee, he has a right to ask for relief; but I beg the honorable member for Wentworth to confine his remarks to the desirability or undesirability of accepting the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland without referring to the proceedings of the Committee.

Mr. KELLY.—I will certainly do so. In view of all the facts, it seems to be very undesirable that this resignation should be accepted. It is not the fault of honorable members of the Opposition that it has been launched on the House at a time when the House was not prepared to receive it. This is more than a resignation from an ordinary committee, and before I sit down I intend to move an amendment which will allow the House to state definitely whether it believes in the procedure adopted by the Government, or thinks that the Government should have acted in a way more worthy of its dignity, and with more regard to the rights of His Majesty's Opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Before I can allow the honorable member to discuss his amendment, I must know its terms, because I am afraid, from what he has said, that it is an amendment which I cannot accept.

Mr. KELLY.—I wish to move the insertion of the words "not now" after the word "be."

Mr. SPEAKER.—That would be in the nature of a direct negative.

Mr. KELLY. Not exactly. The motion is that the honorable member for Gippsland be discharged—inferentially forthwith—from attendance on the Committee. I wish to propose that he be discharged, but not now.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I cannot accept such an amendment, because it would be a direct negative. The motion, if carried, will free the honorable member for Gippsland from further attendance on the Committee, but the amendment would not.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I direct attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. KELLY.—On consideration, I cheerfully bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, because I think that you are perfectly right. I would ask the Prime Minister whether he cannot see his way to adjourn this debate. It will not be of the slightest use to go on to-night. If he will consent to an adjournment of the debate till to-morrow, and also promise to bring forward the motion relating to the new standing order, which has been the cause of all the trouble, in the immediate future, no difficulty will arise. It is important that honorable members should have an opportunity to discuss the question of principle underlying the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I cannot prevent honorable members from discussing the motion; they have every opportunity to do so.

Mr. KELLY.—Although members of the Opposition are prepared to transact non-contentious business as quickly as possible, they cannot be expected to accept everything that is offered to them. I propose to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot move that motion at the conclusion of a speech. If he had moved that motion immediately after he had risen, I should have at once submitted it to the House.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not wish to say anything more at present, except to tell the Prime Minister that the action he has taken to-night will not conduce to the despatch of public business. I hope the Opposition will accept the challenge he has thrown out.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—I regret that the Prime Minister has seen fit at this late stage of the evening to move a motion with regard to which honorable members of the Opposition feel very keenly, inasmuch as it seriously affects the privileges of honorable members. We all remember how quietly the Prime Minister gave notice of motion—so quietly that no honorable member could hear what he was saying. His conduct in that respect was quite in keeping with the way in which the proceedings of the Standing Orders Committee were carried out on a recent occasion, because so far as I can understand, no intimation was given to members of the Committee that an important matter was about to be discussed. As the action taken by the Committee was considered by the honorable member for Gippsland to be of so much importance that he decided to send in his resignation, I should like to direct attention to the fact that, in section 39 of the Constitution it is provided that—

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The honorable and learned member is now discussing the merits of the proceedings of the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. FULLER.—I take it that the basis of the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland was the action taken by the Standing Orders Committee in recommending the adoption of a new standing order relating to the quorum in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would direct the honorable and learned member's attention to the fact that if he succeeded in proving, not only that the proceedings of the Standing Orders Committee were unconstitutional, but that for many reasons, their recommendation was unworthy of being accepted by the House, neither of those points would touch the question of the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland. The fact of the Standing Orders Committee having passed an unconstitutional standing order, or one entirely bad in principle, or injurious in practice, would not in itself be sufficient to justify a resignation. Therefore, I cannot allow the honorable member to discuss the merits of the proceedings of the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. FULLER.—I take it that something very serious must have happened in the Committee to induce the honorable member for Gippsland to take such decided action.

Mr. THOMAS.—We can reject his resignation.

Mr. FULLER.—I do not wish to do that, because it would be ungracious on the part of the House.

Mr. THOMAS.—Then we can accept the resignation.

Mr. FULLER.—I would be no party to refusing to accept the resignation of the honorable member for Gippsland if he desires to resign, but we should consider the causes which led up to that resignation. I understand that the honorable member's action was due to the proposal that a standing order should be brought into force which would defeat the intention of the provision in section 39 of the Constitution. I take it that that was the cause of the stand taken by the honorable member for Gippsland. I thought that I should have been in order in pointing out that, under the Constitution, "until Parliament otherwise provides," one-third of the total number of representatives in this House is necessary to constitute a quorum to enable it to transact its legislative business. It appears to me that the passing of a Bill would be necessary to alter the effect of that provision. I should have liked an opportunity to look into this matter carefully, with a view to discussing it thoroughly, and I regret that I am prevented from so doing by the manner in which it has been brought forward to-night. I cordially agree with the remarks of the deputy-leader of the Opposition, and I shall be only too glad to support him in any action he may choose to take.

Mr. MALONEY (Melbourne).—It seems to me that this motion has been brought forward as an act of gracious courtesy on the part of the Prime Minister, at the request of the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did the honorable member for Gippsland ask that the motion should be submitted to the House?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; he asked me to move it as soon as possible to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—An unnecessary motion.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; a necessary one.

Mr. MALONEY.—It is news to me to learn that, if any honorable member wishes to retire from a Committee, he is not at liberty to do so. I was not aware that it was necessary that a motion relieving him from his position should be submitted to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is so.

Mr. MALONEY.—From the press reports which have appeared it is patent that the honorable member for Gippsland wishes to resign his position as a protest against the action which the Standing Orders Committee propose to take. It appears to me that his conduct in that connexion is perfectly justifiable. I would resign my position ten times over rather than act in opposition to my pledges. As some honorable members are aware, I endeavoured, when a member of the Victorian Parliament, to make the number constituting a quorum much higher than it was. I held that it was absurd that, in the House of Lords, a resolution in 1884 should have been carried by a majority of 39, and that three members constituted a quorum. My attitude in regard to that matter was indorsed by a large meeting which was held in Melbourne. Perhaps it would have been well if this motion had been submitted when the honorable member for Gippsland was present. A few words by him would, perhaps, have settled the matter.

Mr. WATSON.—He explained his position in the House on Friday last.

Mr. MALONEY.—He simply made a personal explanation. If the honorable member for Gippsland had been present I think that he would have followed the Prime Minister with a brief statement.

Mr. WATSON.—I think it is very doubtful, seeing that he explained his position the other day.

Mr. MALONEY.—That may be the opinion of the honorable member for Bland, but my acquaintance with the honorable member for Gippsland has been a little longer than his. If we are to have an all-night sitting, I am sorry that we should be kept here upon a little matter of this kind. It would have been much better to continue the discussion upon the Budget. Seeing that the honorable member for Gippsland has resigned his position on the Standing Orders Committee as a protest against the action of that body, I shall vote against the new standing order when it is submitted.

Mr. WILSON.—It was proposed by a member of the Labour Party.

Mr. MALONEY.—I am not responsible for that fact. Members of the Labour Party may make a few mistakes, but they do not commit half as many errors as do some honorable members opposite.

Mr. WILSON (Corangamite).—I am extremely sorry that the Prime Minister did not consent to an adjournment of this debate, to enable the matter to be discussed at a later date. Members of the Opposition have a perfect right to debate it if they desire to do so. This motion has been submitted by the Prime Minister at the instance of the honorable member for Gippsland. The latter has asked to be relieved from his duties on the Standing Orders Committee, and we have had a full announcement in the daily press of the circumstances which led up to his resignation. As the honorable member for Melbourne has pointed out, the action of the honorable member for Gippsland is intended as a protest against something which took place at a meeting of the Standing Orders Committee. I regret that we cannot discuss that matter at the present moment. The daily press has clearly stated that this question is of considerable importance to this House and to the Commonwealth.

Mr. McDONALD.—Upon whose authority do they make that statement?

Mr. WILSON.—I cannot say. It is impossible to tell how these statements find their way into the newspapers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All these statements have since been confirmed by members of the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. WILSON.—If they have not been confirmed directly they have been confirmed by the fact that members have been allowed to draw inferences which have not been disputed.

Mr. KELLY.—Before the honorable member deals with that aspect of the question, I wish to call attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. WILSON.—Quick and Garrahan's Annotated Constitution of the Commonwealth sets forth that the quorum of the majority of the legal number of members may be said to be the modern principle in general legislation, and yet we are asked to deal with this question at a time when honorable members are tired and unprepared to discuss it on its merits. We have a right to say to the honorable member for Gippsland that it is undesirable that he should retire from the Standing Orders Committee, inasmuch as his retirement would destroy the equality of representation. We have been led to believe that the honorable member for Kennedy, who is a prominent member of the Labour Party, and, doubtless, a great authority on parliamentary methods of procedure, brought forward the motion in question, and was guided by the practice obtaining in the House of Commons. I would point out, however—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is now proceeding to argue the general question of the proposed standing order.

Mr. WILSON.—I should be sorry to transgress the Standing Orders, and would point out that I am discussing a matter that has been referred to in detail by the press.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will recognise that a mere statement in the press is very different from an actual report of a Committee of this House to the House, and that we have no right to assume that any press statement is correct or incorrect. Press statements are not a sufficient ground for discussion.

Mr. WILSON.—The press statements to which I refer directly bear on the motion. It is a matter for regret that the honorable member for Gippsland, who was for many years a member of the State Parliament, who is well informed in regard to methods of procedure, and is respected throughout the length and breadth of Victoria, should have so strongly resented something that took place in one of the Committees of the House as to feel impelled to resign his seat on that Committee.

Mr. KELLY.—I wish to call attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. WILSON.—I do not wish to detain the House any longer. I feel very strongly in this matter, and think it is necessary that honorable members of the Opposition should express their regret not only at the retirement of the honorable member for Gippsland, but that the incident which has caused him to send in his resignation should have occurred.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: RETIREMENT OF MR. MCLEAN: ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SHOW.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

I must say that I think the deputy-leader of the Opposition might have recognised the difficulty of the position in which I was placed. I had been asked by the honorable member for Gippsland to move a motion that I did not wish to submit, and had exerted myself to induce him to refrain from preferring the request.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the Prime Minister say that the honorable member asked him specially to move the motion to-night?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The Prime Minister must not refer to a previous debate.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is so. I am referring, sir, not to a previous debate, but to a conversation. On Friday I saw the honorable member for Gippsland, who then said he wished to be relieved as soon as possible. I informed him that I had given notice of motion for to-day, but hoped that he would consent to its not being brought on at the commencement of business, as my desire was that the debate on the Budget should proceed. I told him that if he were willing I would bring it on later in the evening, after the Budget debate had been disposed of. At my request he consented to this being done. I had to act against my own will in moving that his resignation be accepted, and submitted the motion at a time to which he agreed. I was placed in a difficult position, and the deputy-leader of the Opposition chose to intensify it by addressing me in a manner in which, I feel sure, I should not have addressed him in like circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The Prime Minister is now referring to a previous debate.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member for Parramatta chose to make what he called a request, but what was really a threatening demand, which it was impossible for me to accept.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I deny in toto the statement just made by the Prime Minister. I made no threat or demand of any kind until I had pleaded like a mendicant for ten minutes. The Prime Minister sat like a statue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is now doing that which I would not allow the Prime Minister to do—he is referring to a debate which is closed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think I am entitled, at any rate, to reply to a statement made by the Prime Minister, which reflects on my conduct.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I twice prevented the Prime Minister from referring to a previous debate, and if I now permitted the honorable member for Parramatta to do that which I refused to allow the Prime Minister to do I should do a manifest injustice, which I am sure the honorable member himself would not desire.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—May I recall to your recollection, sir, that the Prime Minister concluded his remarks by reflecting on my conduct. I wish to explain the conduct to which he takes exception.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member wishes to make a personal explanation?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is precisely what I wish to do. I appealed to the honorable and learned gentleman, almost like a mendicant, to postpone the consideration of the matter until to-morrow, and it was only after pleading with him for ten minutes that I made the observation which I did, and on which he has just animadverted. In his conduct of the business of the House—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member consider this a personal explanation?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, sir, I am now speaking on the motion for adjournment. In his conduct of the business of the House the honorable and learned member is acting in the strangest way I have ever seen the leader of a Government act. One cannot get from him anything definite about the business of the House on any occasion. He told me nothing about this business to-night. We understood that we were to adjourn at the usual hour, after the debate on the Budget was postponed. I did not hear a whisper that this business was to be taken, and the honorable and learned member, after getting the debate on the Budget adjourned, and nearly all the Opposition away, on the clear and distinct understanding—

Mr. DEAKIN.—I sent word to the honorable member before that debate was adjourned.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Cowper came over here just a few minutes before that debate was adjourned, but that was after the members of the Opposition had all gone home.

Mr. DEAKIN.—At half-past 10 o'clock.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is unfair on the part of the honorable and learned member to spring such business upon the House without warning of any kind. Moreover, I think that he is acting towards the Opposition in a grossly discourteous way.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member will not get any one else to believe that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not care what other honorable members believe. There is a marked distinction between the way in which the honorable and learned member treats the members on this side and the way in which the leader of the late Government treated the late Opposition. We cannot get a definite statement from the honorable and learned gentleman about anything. I asked the other day whether he proposed to bring forward any new standing orders, and he said he might or might not. I then asked him when he was going to set the matter down for discussion. He said he did not know, but perhaps it would be for Tuesday or some other day. He knows nothing. If honorable members expect that we on this side are to be treated as so many automata, to be moved hither and thither at the behest of the leader of the Government, I venture to say that he entirely misconceives his position. If he wishes to get business through the House he had better observe the rule which has always obtained here of treating the Opposition as they ought to be treated—by letting them know what he proposes to do, and not by treating them as if they were a set of fools, and it did not matter to him whether he spoke to them on any subject or not. That is what I complain of in his treatment of honorable members. Do what we will, he will not tell us anything about the business which is to come on. I have already told honorable members what he said about this particular business. I had no idea that it was to come on to-night. I complain of the Prime Minister's entire want of definiteness in regard to the business of the House, and I resent, and will take every means I know to resent, such treatment as he has seen fit to mete out to the Opposition to-night.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—With regard to the Agricultural Show on Thursday, will the Prime Minister make an announcement whether the House is to meet at half-past 2 o'clock or half-past 7?

Mr. DEAKIN.—At half-past 2, as usual.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am rather sorry to hear that statement, because I know that persons have come here from almost every State. If the Prime Minister wishes to get on with business, I suppose we shall have to sacrifice ourselves, but still I think it would be wise if he would reconsider the question before to-morrow.

Mr. CHANTER (Riverina).—The acting leader of the Opposition has taken it upon himself to tell the Government how they should conduct the business of the House. The majority has rights as well as the minority, and when the majority is kept here until the trams and the trains have ceased to run, and put to a lot of inconvenience, my advice to the Government is to go on and do some useful work. We are not to be kept here for that purpose.

Mr. FULLER.—It was the action of the Prime Minister which brought about.

Mr. CHANTER.—I absolutely agree with that statement. During my parliamentary career I have never witnessed anything like this as I have had to witness here to-day. Whenever a member of Parliament resigns from a Committee, he, and not the Government, is the right person to give notice. The motion just carried was seized upon by the Government to keep you, sir, and the members and the public of the House here, without occupying the time of the country to any advantage. It might have been profitably occupied in passing useful measures.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think, sir, we ought to have a quorum here to hear the pearls of wisdom.

A quorum not being present,

Mr. Speaker adjourned the House at 12 (Wednesday).

House of Representatives

Wednesday, 6 September, 1902.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 and read prayers.

COMMONWEALTH CENSUS

Mr. KELLY.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if the following new paragraph contains a true statement of the intentions of the Ministry:—

There appears to be some doubt as to whether it is contemplated to hold a special census under Mr. Groom's States Representation Bill before re-adjusting the Federal electorates, in connection with the completion of the Commonwealth general census at the end of next year. It is not the intention of the Ministry to hold such a census. Under the provisions of the Bill an enumeration day will be chosen next year, and the best day for the population relating to the population day will be compiled by Commonwealth authorities on the system set out in the Bill. These figures will be made the basis of the readjustment of the electorates.

Mr. DEAKIN.—So far as I know, no statement is made without authority. I hope that the Minister of Home Affairs will have an opportunity, either to-day or to-morrow, to explain the Bill.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister, without notice, whether he is aware that it is alleged that ten aliens by whom Google wealth waters under permits to work in the pearling shelling industry of Torres Straits have deserted, and are now supposed to be in Australia? Will the Prime Minister make such inquiries as may be necessary to establish the truth or otherwise of these allegations? If it is ascertained through the Customs Department or otherwise that such allegations are well founded, will the Prime Minister take such steps as are necessary to have the bonds entered into by the persons indenting those aliens duly estreated?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I know nothing of the incident, and shall be glad if the honorable member will supply me with the name of the place where it occurred, and the persons concerned, so that inquiry may be made.

BUDGET.

In Committee of Supply: (Consideration resumed from 5th September, vide page 1910), on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST—

That the item, "President, £1,100," be agreed to.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—It has been my duty on more than one occasion to call attention to the imperfect ventilation of this Chamber. I do not know if a disease which appears to have broken out amongst honorable members—a certain affection of the throat—is attributable to that cause.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is the disease cacoethes loquendi?

Mr. LIDDELL.—You, Mr. Salmon, being a medical man, will understand me if I endeavour to give a name to the disease to which I refer. One of its symptoms is manifested by many prominent members, and especially by representatives of New South Wales, in their constant endeavour to address the Committee early in the afternoon rather than late at night. The only reason I can discover for these attempts is the fact that the speeches delivered early in the afternoon are recorded fully in the metropolitan papers of New South Wales. The name I propose to give to this mysterious disease is limelightitis. I call it so because of the evident desire on the part of those who suffer from it to appear beneath the full glare of the limelight. I was quite prepared to fill the breach, and make what remarks I had to make last night, in order that those who suffer from this disease might have an opportunity to speak to-day; but it has, nevertheless, fallen to my lot to commence the debate this afternoon. While on the subject of diseases, I would refer to what is known to the medical profession as general paralysis of the insane, one of the symptoms of which is that the sufferer begins to hold wrong ideas as to his position. His ideas become grandiose.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Would the honorable member mind examining those who are now sitting on the front Opposition bench?

Mr. LIDDELL.—If the cap fits any honorable member, though I hope it does not, he is at liberty to wear it. A man suffering from this disease begins to take large views of life, thinks that he is possessed of unlimited means, entertains his friends lavishly, taking every man he meets by the hand, and offering him untold wealth. I greatly fear lest the Treasurer of the Commonwealth may develop symptoms of this kind, because, if we are going to spend money at the rate which he proposes, we shall quickly find ourselves in serious difficulties. We have almost reached the limit of the £500,000 at our disposal, and if we go on as we are doing, it is possible that within the next five years we shall spend a very considerable amount of money. At the cost of some time and labour, I have estimated that expenditure as follows:—Old-age pensions, £1,500,000; penny postage, £200,000; underground telephones, £100,000; sugar bounties, £500,000; iron bonus, £300,000; weather telegrams, £60,000; High Commissionership, £20,000.

Mr. WILSON. Would £20,000 cover the expenses of the High Commissioner?

Mr. LIDDELL.—A High Commissioner who would fill the post as it should be filled, must be a man of independent means, and prepared to spend a large amount of money. Then there is the naval subsidy of £50,000, the cost of the census £25,000, and the expenditure in connexion with quarantine and meteorology £25,000, making a grand total of £2,780,000. I have heard the Treasurer speaking of millions as if they were pence, and I take this opportunity to ask him to put the break on, and not to be too lavish in his expenditure. The previous Treasurer was very careful of the funds at his disposal, but we have had examples in New South Wales of the way in which the public coffers can be emptied without any consideration for the good of the general community. I notice that there is a tendency to spend a large amount of money on defences, and I can hardly see why we should incur a large outlay in that direction. It is an utterly unproductive way of spending money. All the ironclads that are built speedily become so much scrap iron, and we have the testimony of the ex-Minister of Defence that a few good fire brigades would afford us the best safeguard against loss in the event of an attack being made upon us. We have at present to depend entirely upon Great Britain for our defence. Here we are, a small number of people — less than 5,000,000—inhabiting an enormous country with a coastline of 8,500 miles, and I ask how we can possibly hope to satisfactorily safeguard ourselves against invasion? It is true that we contribute £200,000 per annum towards the maintenance of the Australian Squadron, but I think that we might strike off even that item, because it is a mere drop in the bucket to Great Britain. If we, like Canada, declined to make any contribution towards the expenditure upon the British Navy, it would still be to the interest of Great Britain to protect us, so long as she felt that we remained part and parcel of the Empire. With regard to the Cerberus, I should like to say that I spent two lamentable days upon that vessel. Purely with a desire to obtain information, I accepted an invitation to spend two days on the ship, because I was told I should see some interesting target practice. It was suggested that I would be best able to judge as to the effectiveness of the practice by occupying a position inside the turret. I had first to crawl through a small hole and to take my place upon what was called the rear platform, behind a gun weighing 25 tons. I can assure honorable members that I required to exercise great strength of mind to remain in that position when I saw a mass of metal, weighing 25 tons, recoiling, and approaching within an inch of my body. The turret contained two 25-ton, or 10-inch, muzzle-loading, slow firing guns, and I think that as such weapons are absolutely useless, they should be done away with. I think also that the Treasurer should strike his pen through the proposed vote of £2,000 for the purchase of guns to re-arm the Cerberus, because that craft is quite out of date. Even as a training boat she would be of very little value. We have heard that the Japanese gunners in the recent naval engagements against the Russians owed their success largely to the accuracy of their fire in rough weather. In the case of the Cerberus, the whole of the sailors become seasick in rough weather, because the vessel, instead of rolling and pitching like an ordinary boat, revolves like a saucer, and produces a most peculiar feeling of nausea, even in the most seasoned navigators. I have already referred to the fact that owing to the smallness of our population we should find it difficult to properly defend our coasts, and I think it is our duty to increase our population as far as possible by encouraging the introduction of suitable immigrants. Instead of encouraging immigration it appears to me that we are seeking by our legislation to keep people out of the country.

Mr. RONALD.—Certainly not.

Mr. LIDDELL.—So far as I can judge, that is the effect of much of the legislation that has been passed to suit one particular section of the community. An honorable member on the Ministerial benches proposes that we should invite two or three experts to come here and look at this country, but there is no necessity to adopt that course. Every week experts in their own businesses are coming to Australia from the old country. I meet them at the hotel at which I am staying, and I have facilitated many of them coming here and listening to our debates. They have thus been enabled to see very clearly what class of men are legislating for Australia, and the objects they have in view.

Mr. WATSON.—I hear that they are awfully disappointed with the Opposition.

Mr. LIDDELL.—At the time to which I am alluding the Labour Party sat in opposition. These men have told me, "We are sent out here by our firms to inquire as to the possibility of finding suitable investments, but we regret to say that we feel that this is not the place in which we should launch out. We would rather seek a field of operations in the Argentine or some other South American State. Here you have a magnificent country, which is capable of producing wheat and wool to much more advantage than, say, Canada."

Mr. WATSON.—Give us a few names so that we may have something tangible.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I think that it is quite unnecessary to mention any names. Experts have said to me: "In the northern parts of Australia there is an enormous area which is quite capable of growing good cotton, and to-day in Manchester we are paying high prices for that commodity."

But Australia will never be able to establish the cotton industry if cheap labour is not available, and, unfortunately, the whole tendency of Commonwealth legislation is in the direction of driving cheap labour out of the country." I have already said that we ought to encourage immigration.

Mr. MAUGER.—And our young men should marry.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I certainly believe in encouraging the intermarriage of our race with foreigners. The finest nations of the world have been produced by the intermarriage of opposite races. What is the British race to-day but the progeny of various nationalities. We know perfectly well that the offspring of people who live in the same locality are not so sturdy as are those of persons who live in districts which are widely separated. In support of my statement, we have merely to look at the type of our population in certain isolated districts of the back-blocks. I have no doubt that the honorable member for Darwin, who has travelled through those districts, will admit that in these places our native population is degenerating.

Mr. KENNEDY.—From where do we obtain our sturdy citizens, if not from the back-blocks?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I am speaking from my own professional experience, and I defy any man to deny the accuracy of my statement. I maintain that in the back-blocks we are rearing a class of people who are little better than blackfellows. They are constantly intermarrying, and, as the result of their environment, we are producing a race of degenerates.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—In many instances we do not give them sufficient to live upon.

Mr. LIDDELL.—That is exactly what I am fighting for. One has only to walk the streets of Melbourne or Sydney at night to see a lot of undersized brats of boys and girls, who will be the fathers and mothers of future generations. What are we doing to assist them? We are merely attempting to bolster up our factory system, under which many of these children are employed in what can only be described as "dens." I say that we should encourage immigration—I do not care whether the arrivals be Celts or foreigners. Let us welcome them all, irrespective of whether they be French, Italian, or German settlers, and by so doing we shall establish a better nation. In this temperate zone, it is certain that we cannot continue as we have been doing, unless we wish eventually to become anæmic and to produce a race of degenerates. If we encourage immigration, we shall be doing the right thing. We wish to attract to our shores those who will populate the country, and work upon the soil. Another important matter to which I desire to direct the attention of the Committee has reference to the urgent necessity which exists for Commonwealth action in regard to quarantine arrangements. At the present time we are doing absolutely nothing in this direction. A number of Bills are being submitted by the Government which nobody apparently desires, and which, I contend, will not accomplish any good. There are many other matters, however, of which no notice is being taken, and which deserve very serious consideration, and amongst them is that of Federal quarantine. Under present conditions, we are exposed to the introduction of all sorts of diseases from other countries. Only the other day, I read in Coghlan that much inferior fruit is sold in Australia because of the introduction of certain pests from America and elsewhere.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member must know that a system of Federal quarantine can be established without the introduction of any Bill.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Then the sooner the matter is dealt with the better. I am inclined to think that members of the Labour Party agree that vaccination is not a good thing. At any rate, I am satisfied that we have a good many conscientious objectors to that system. I do not propose to discuss the merits or demerits of vaccination, but I do say that if we had a proper system of Federal quarantine we should incur very little risk of the introduction into the States of such diseases as smallpox.

Mr. FISHER.—I am in favour of a system of Federal quarantine being immediately established.

Mr. LIDDELL.—As the honorable member now occupies the box seat of the Ministerial coach, and handles the ribbons, he should so direct matters as to bring about that desirable result. Another disease to the introduction of which we are extremely liable is tuberculosis. Yet no effort is being made to guard against that contingency. It would be the simplest matter in the world to create a Federal quarantine system, and it could be managed very much more satisfactorily than quarantine is at present managed by the States. Unity is strength, and unity in this matter would provide us with a better opportunity for combating the disease. I look forward to the time when we shall establish a Department of Health which will be presided over by a Minister. I see no reason why there should not be a seat upon the Treasury Benches for a Minister of Health, who would be able to direct our various bacteriological examinations, laboratories, and attend to kindred matters. Moreover, it would be a great advantage if the various medical Acts in the different States were made uniform. At the present time is quite possible for medical men to commence practice in some of the States without being called upon to pay any fee, whilst in others a heavy fee is exacted before they are at liberty to engage in their calling. Uniformity in this connexion is extremely desirable. I appeal to the Labour Party to recollect that there is such a thing in the world as unionism, and I am of opinion that it would be well if the members of the medical profession who qualify in this country were given some advantage over those who hail from elsewhere. I also contend that this Parliament should be given an opportunity to pass an Adulteration Act which would deal with the adulteration of our wines. It is all very well for the Minister of Trade and Customs to say that he will look into the matter, and insert a clause in a Bill dealing with that question.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Such a provision is already to be found in the Commerce Bill.

Mr. LIDDELL.—But I should like to see a comprehensive arrangement made under which all these matters could be dealt with in one way. Then we should not witness the spectacle of a private individual, who is merely a piano expert, and knows nothing whatever about health matters, being allowed to travel abroad for the benefit of his own business, as an accredited representative of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member hold that that appointment should not have been made?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I express no opinion upon the matter. We have been told that Mr. Beale served an apprenticeship under Dr. Mackellar. I do not understand what that means. How can we possibly expect a piano expert to know anything about patent medicines or children's foods? His commission looks to me as though it were nothing more nor less than a piece of political dodgery on the part of a protectionist Government.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I did not intend to address the Committee on this question, and should not have done so, except for some of the statements which have been made, and the fact that no replies to them have been offered by honorable members opposite. They seem to take all the criticisms, from whatever quarter they come, as needing no reply. Perhaps they are right from their stand-point, but I purpose to say a few words in regard to certain matters to which I think the attention of honorable members ought to be directed. Last week I came into collision with the Treasurer in regard to a statement about "eating dirt." I had no wish to be offensive to the right honorable gentleman. We all like him. He is a jovial, kind-hearted man, although there is a certain amount of method in his joviality.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member knows that it was not a friendly thing to say.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have not had time, nor have I the inclination, to wade through all my right honorable friend's old speeches, but I have a few quotations to make from some of his past utterances which, I think, will be interesting to the Committee. We think that it is our duty to criticise the Government, and in that connexion I was much struck with one remark made by my right honorable friend with regard to the Labour Party when their Government was in office. He said—

In my opinion, the Opposition should never say anything very complimentary about the Government, but should find fault with them if they do wrong. If they are right, the Opposition should say, "that is just what you ought to have done; you have done your duty."

That is the sort of generosity which my right honorable friend manifests towards his opponents.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What led up to that? I said there was too much "beslobbering" with praise.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I will tell my right honorable friend what led up to the remark. The leader of the Opposition is, as we all know, invariably generous to his opponents. I think that the honorable member for Bland will admit that the leader of the Opposition was always fair in his criticisms when the Labour Government was in office. Whenever credit was due, he was always big enough in his ideas to give praise. But the Treasurer is not large-minded enough to adopt the same attitude towards his opponents.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was supporting the Opposition then; so was my leader.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Well, the leader of the Opposition and the head of the present Government are both big enough men to say kindly things of their political opponents when they are deserved. I make these remarks because I was very much struck with the absence from the Budget speech of any reference to the late Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balacava, though the Treasurer took advantage of all the hard labour of his predecessor and former colleague. We all know the care and attention which the right honorable member for Balacava devoted to the preparation of the Estimates. The Treasurer must admit that he adopted the Estimates of the late Government to a very large extent, making very few alterations in them. The late Treasurer was as careful, painstaking, and conscientious a finance Minister as ever sat on the Treasury bench.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—For years I was opposed to him on certain principles. He believed in protection, and I believed in free-trade; but at the same time we admitted his fairness in dealing with financial matters. But the Treasurer never said a word in his Budget speech about the care and attention devoted by his predecessor to the preparation of some of the figures he used.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I referred to him very often, and always in complimentary terms.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have not read the Budget speech through, but I can find no such references. I presume that that is the principle upon which the Treasurer chooses to deal with those opposed to him.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think he is opposed to us.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I remember hearing an old and prominent politician in New South Wales remark that on one occasion he was opposed by a supporter, who defended himself by saying, "Well, I always vote for you when you are right." The reply was: "I like a man to vote for me when I am wrong; any fool will vote for me when I am right." That remark was recalled to my mind by an interjection made by the Treasurer last week. He said, "I wish I had the honorable member in Western Australia."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was only said jocularly.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is recorded in Hansard. If the remark was made jocularly, I wish to reply in a similar spirit. In former days my right honorable friend used to be called "the Emperor of the West." Whenever any politician dared to oppose him in those days, he had a method of getting rid of the offender. I believe a case was referred to a committee, which, it is said, decided against his opponent. On another occasion I am informed a supporter dared to criticise him in regard to his financial arrangements. The right honorable gentleman resented this criticism, whereupon the opponent said, "I think I have a right to criticise you if I choose." The reply was: "What right have you to complain? Did I not make you a magistrate?" I do not know how highly the position of magistrate was valued in Western Australia in those days; it is not, I regret to say, much valued in New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The position was spoilt in that State.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—At all events my right honorable friend evidently thought that it was a very great honour to confer upon the man.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It surely ought to be regarded as a very honorable position.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I quite agree with my right honorable friend. But it is an extraordinary doctrine to preach that because he made a man a magistrate that man ought to support him whether right or wrong.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He was elected to support me.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My right honorable friend admits the truth of the story.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My Government supported him.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—And therefore my right honorable friend thought that the member of Parliament ought to support his Government right or wrong.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — We wanted a general support.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—At all events I believe that the one time supporter of my right honorable friend resented this interference, and promptly resigned the position of magistrate, saying that if it was given to him with the object indicated, the sooner he vacated it the better. My right honorable friend denied that he ever made any statement about eating dirt. I am not going into the question of the exact words he used, but I shall read a few extracts to illustrate the position of affairs when my right honorable friend was on this side.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — We cannot get away from Hansard, can we?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I believe not; though sometimes some of us may wish we could, especially when we go before the electors, and are quoted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not afraid of Hansard.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have gone through the mill as many times as my right honorable friend, and I have always come out all right.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hansard is all right.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am not afraid of anything in Hansard so far as I am concerned; but I do not know whether the right honorable gentleman will say that after I have read some extracts from his speeches.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — I am not frightened.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I ask my right honorable friend to listen to these extracts from his speeches:—

He has found since Parliament has met that parties are almost of equal strength. The supporters of the Government are, perhaps, stronger than either of the other parties, but a combination of the force gathered together under the standards of Labour and the Opposition could at any time bring about the expulsion of the Government from office. That is a position which it would be impossible for any one with any experience in leading Government to regard with equanimity. To me the position seems impossible. It will be just the same for those who succeed us, if any one does succeed us.

I am in accord with him when he agrees with the right honorable and learned member for East Sydney that the existence of three parties in the Federal Legislature of nearly equal strength has thrown public affairs into confusion, makes Parliamentary Government on constitutional lines impossible, and calls for some immediate remedy.

I am opposed to the platform and the methods of the Labour Party. I am opposed to the domination of any class, irrespective of whether they are members of Labour Unions or otherwise.

Mr. FISHER.—A proper sentiment.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes; and I am showing the honorable member what a different position the Treasurer takes up to-day—

He offered us the security that we should enjoy, by acting as the tail, or perhaps, in time, as a very small part of the body, of his party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who made the offer?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I believe there was an offer made that if certain honorable members would go over and support the Labour Party they would not be opposed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I thought the honorable member was quoting me.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am quoting the right honorable member—

It was another case of "Come in to my parlour said the spider to the fly."

In view of the principles I profess, I, for one, should not be willing to kiss the hand that struck me a severe blow. I know that if I did I should sooner or later receive another blow which would practically destroy me.

I do not know when that blow is coming—

Why did not the honorable and learned member and his party turn us out? Because it did not suit them to do so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who was "the honorable and learned member"?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think it was the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, when he was Attorney-General in the Labour Government.

I should not have given them a week's trial.

I believe that on one occasion the right honorable gentleman denied that he made that statement, but this is an exact quotation of what he said:—

I should not have given them a week's trial if I had had my own way, but that was due to only one reason—that, in my opinion, they had not a majority in this House.

I rejoice that honorable members of what is called the Labour Party (and, as I have already defined the meaning of the term I need not do so again), are in Opposition. I prefer to see them there, or in possession of the Treasury benches, rather than directing the Government from the cross benches.

Mr. PAGE.—Can the right honorable member give us one instance in which we directed the Government of which he was a member?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes! the great pressure which was exerted resulted in section 16 of the Postal Act being inserted in the Bill, and the previous action of the Government in the Senate being reversed.

We shall now have their physic direct from their own hands. We shall not have to take physic from the third party as has been the custom, not only in this Parliament, but in all State Parliaments of Australia in which there is a Labour Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was referring to the time when the honorable gentleman was under the dominance of the Labour Party in New South Wales.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Perhaps so. It is difficult to ascertain what is the right honorable gentleman's mind on any subject. At all events, he cannot find such passages as these in any speeches I have delivered:—

Hitherto they have not been so numerically strong as they are, but they have occupied the position of a third party with the balance of power, and have wielded that enormous power that all third parties similarly situated exercise in the administration of the affairs of a country.

What does he say in regard to them now? The Labour Party are in the same position, and he cannot move in any direction without their support. I shall show presently that in regard to the contract section of the Immigration Restriction Act, Ministers were afraid to give expression to their opinions until they heard the honorable member for Gippsland say what the late Government intended to do. Thereupon, the honorable member for Bland expressed his opinion, and now the Government are going to break their silence upon the question.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Gippsland did not state what the late Government was going to do.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable gentleman indicated what the late Government was going to do.

Mr. WATSON.—The late Government announced no policy.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If the late Government had had an opportunity of meeting the electors, as we wished to do, the honorable member would have known what our policy was.

Mr. WATSON.—They kept it very dark.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There is a record of what we were going to do. But let me continue the extracts from the speeches of the Treasurer—

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Does not the right honorable member think that we gave the Government, of which he was a member, a good innings?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Bland no longer occupies the commanding position of real power which he held for the three years during which his party sat on the cross benches; it is no longer "Yes, Mr. Watson." The honorable member is now a humble suppliant for an alliance in order that he may regain the power that he has lost, and which, of course, he desires again to exercise. . . . They must realize that although at one time they were a "Samson" in the House they have since had their hair clipped.

Mr. WATSON.—The Minister is happier than when he was in the clutches of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. KELLY.—He was out in the cold then.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. The right honorable gentleman practically denied that he ever was in the clutches of the right honorable member for East Sydney. Replying to a question by a reporter, he said that he was never a supporter of the latter, but he was very anxious, I think, to get his support in Western Australia, when a large number of the Labour Party were going over there.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not know that. It was more in the interests of the right honorable gentleman that I took action then.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That shows that the right honorable member was a member of the party for the time being.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was helping the right honorable gentleman. What I said was that he was never my chief.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If the right honorable gentleman will refer to the newspapers, I think he will find that he used the word "supporter" to the interviewer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was supporting the right honorable member for East Sydney, but I always owed allegiance to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The right honorable member for East Sydney was leader of the Government, and when he was asked to go to Western Australia he went, at much personal inconvenience, in the interests of the party, of which, at that time, we believed the right honorable member for Swan was a member.

Mr. KELLY.—That was before the secret cable.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Macquarie surely does not say that I was ever a free-trader?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not say that for one moment of the right honorable member for Swan.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was a member of the party which was led by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and which was helping the party of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—At all events, we went into office in an honorable manner, and we retired with flying colours. That Government were prepared to face the people, and to abide by their verdict, and we were told by the present Treasurer, and the present Prime Minister, that there was no occasion for us to have gone out of office.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member for Macquarie advised suicide.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is not often that Governments are found prepared to commit suicide; as a rule, Governments are anxious to cling on to office on any conditions or terms. Considering what had taken place, we felt, as honorable men, that we could no longer remain in office—that the only course open to us was to place our policy before the people and abide by their verdict.

Mr. FISHER.—Yes, after the Government had wasted six months in recess.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Wide Bay and his party have wasted a good deal more time. The honorable member has no reason to complain, because those whom he represents have done very well over the sugar legislation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What was the policy of the honorable member's Government on that question?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The present Treasurer did not give that Government an opportunity to come down with a policy. It would, no doubt, have been very different from that advocated by the honorable member for Wide Bay.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We had the policy from the honorable member for Gippsland, who was a member of that Government.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That Government never dealt with the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Never dealt with it?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The question was never considered by the Cabinet.

Mr. WATSON.—Then what did that Government do during the six months of recess?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall show presently that the Treasurer did very little during the time he was a State Premier. If Western Australia had been looked after then, that State would not have been in its present disgraceful position in regard to the Post and Telegraph Department.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What did the honorable member for Macquarie do for Western Australia in postal matters while he was Postmaster-General?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Treasurer ought to ask the present Postmaster-General that question. I am prepared to let my work as Postmaster-General stand on its merits.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member, as Postmaster-General, never did anything for Western Australia.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I leave my work to the judgment of honorable members.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of Western Australia were most dissatisfied with the postal administration.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—And now, under, considering the state in which the postal administration was left by the present Treasurer. I shall presently read a list of reports dealing with the administration of the Post and Telegraph Department in Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did the honorable member, when Postmaster-General, not go to Western Australia and see for himself the administration of the Department?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I sent an impartial officer to make a report, and I think that honorable members, when they hear the result of that action, will say that I was quite justified in what I did. Furthermore, that the revelations did not reflect credit on the present Treasurer's administration.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of Western Australia are more dissatisfied now than ever they were with the administration of the Post and Telegraph Department; they say that the whole Department has been upset.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—All I can say is that if the Treasurer looks through the report to which I have referred, he will see that there was strong reason for the "upset" of some kind.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people are more dissatisfied now than ever they were.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is very easy to satisfy people by spending thousands of pounds on useless works. However, I am not given to any policy of that kind. If a public work be justified, I am glad to carry it out, but I refuse to spend money merely for the purpose of getting additional support.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have no doubt that the honorable member, as Postmaster-General, carried out some wonderful reforms!

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I leave the reforms which I carried out to speak for themselves.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The "reforms" made the people dissatisfied, at all events.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The people had been dissatisfied for a great many years under the present Treasurer's administration as State Premier. Honorable members ought to read the report which was submitted to this Parliament soon after Federation was brought about. That report was referred to by the late Postmaster-General, the honorable member for Coolgardie, when he was dealing with the postal administration of the present Treasurer in Western Australia. The right honorable member for Swan went on to say of the Labour Party—

They must realize, although at one time they were a "Samson" in the House, they have since had their hair clipped, and that the strength, power, and influence, which they wielded for several years, has now disappeared. They have had to make a humble alliance with protectionist members who have seceded from the protectionist party.

Honorable members opposite know perfectly well that I am opposed to them because of their programme, which I call socialistic, and because of their methods.

There are numerous other quotations which could be made from speeches delivered by the Treasurer, but I think I have quoted sufficient to show that, if I were not correct in saying that he had complained of having to eat too much dirt, he is quite prepared to eat humble pie, in order to secure a seat on the Treasury benches.

Mr. WILSON.—He is quite prepared to take the "physic" of which he spoke.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Treasurer is now prepared to take that "physic" again. The right honorable gentleman complained that for three years he had been taking "physic" from the honorable member for Bland, and he said that, rather than take any more, he was prepared to leave office. We now find, however, that the right honorable member is quite prepared to take more "physic" of the same kind.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We were forced to come into office, because we could not leave the honorable member and his party there.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No doubt that is the right honorable member's opinion. The Ministry, composed of members of the party to which the Treasurer belongs, must have been a very happy family. The honorable and learned member for Adelaide, who has always been regarded as a strong democrat, when speaking of the present Treasurer, with whom he had been associated in office, said, "We have practically had enough of the Forrest curse."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What the honorable and learned member said was that Western Australia had had enough.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Well, that meant enough of the "Forrest curse"; and I think there is a great deal of truth in what the honorable and learned member for Adelaide said.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member and myself were then in controversy, when people sometimes say disagreeable things.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Denison last night made a strong speech, showing that he, at all events, is quite sick of the "physic" he had to swallow while he was a colleague of the present Treasurer.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Nevertheless the honorable member for Denison hung on to office.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I daresay that the honorable member for Denison might, had he chosen, have been a member of the present Government. No doubt, in refusing to support the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, the honorable member for Denison took the course which he considered justifiable. Nevertheless I think he would have had a good chance of becoming a member of the Cabinet had he voted in the same way as did the right honorable member for Swan. The present Prime Minister also condemned in no light way the methods adopted by the Labour Party, of the domination of which he expressed himself as perfectly sick. He said that he would not have any more of it. The right honorable member for Balaclava also spoke in a similar strain.

Mr. MAUGER.—When did the Prime Minister make the statement to which the honorable member refers?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I could cite a number of cases in which he said that the methods adopted by the Labour Party were objectionable. He asserted that the Labour Party were driving Australia over the precipice, and gave expression to other sentiments which showed that he was heartily tired of the domination of the party. Then, again, the right honorable member for Swan said that as a member of a former Administration, he had eaten quite enough dirt.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not. The honorable member should not attribute to me statements that I have never uttered.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman said something worse than that. When challenged by the honorable member for Boothby, he remarked that, "You know that Ministers have often to vote for measures in which they do not believe."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When did I make that statement? I am prepared to accept a quotation from Hansard, but certainly not a statement made from the honorable member's belief, and without foundation.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall give the right honorable gentleman the exact words that he used. He told the honorable member for Boothby that it was well known that members of a Government, out of loyalty to their party, had often to vote for measures in which they did not believe. Thus, four members of the Barton Administration practically stated that they were sick of the control which the Labour Party, while sitting on the Ministerial cross-benches, exercised over the Government. Sir Edmund Barton and Senator O'Connor, two other members of that Administration, left it, and are well provided for. We do not know what are their views regarding the Labour Party, but we find that the right honorable member for Swan, notwithstanding the assertions to which I have referred, was quite prepared to return to the fold, and to submit to such direction as the Labour Party might choose to give. I was disappointed by his Budget statement. The right honorable gentleman quoted numerous returns from Coghlan, which are very valuable in their way, but in view of the present position of the finances of the Commonwealth, we anticipated that he would be prepared to come down with some original proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What time did I have to formulate an original scheme?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman and some of his colleagues were in office when the Federal Parliament first met, and, with the exception of about twelve months, have been in office ever since. We find that we have a decreasing Customs and Excise revenue, and that it is estimated that the revenue for the current financial year will be about £70,000 less than that received during last year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I explained that, but for the sugar arrangements there would be an increase.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But the Government propose to continue the sugar bonus, and that being so it is idle for them to offer such an explanation. They must provide for the payment of the bonus just as they have to provide for public works, or other undertakings. It is estimated that this year we shall be able to return to the States only £469,000 over and above the three-fourths of Customs and Excise revenue to which they are entitled. It must be borne in mind that we shall have to provide for interest upon the post-offices, and other public buildings taken over by the Commonwealth, and that, according to estimates prepared by the States, £450,000 will be annually required to meet these interest charges, and to provide the necessary sinking fund.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not if we deal with balances. If we adopt that system, the balance cannot be more than £1,000,000.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—According to a report laid on the table of the House some time ago, the estimated value of transferred properties is, in round numbers, £10,000,000. Three per cent. on that sum would mean £300,000, and 3½ per cent., £350,000 per annum.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But under the proposed arrangement—

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Unfortunately, we do not know what arrangement has been made. The Government has not made any disclosure to the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I referred to the matter in my statement. I said that balances only would be dealt with.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I know that the right honorable gentleman said something about balances, but he is trying to mislead the Committee and the public. We know that the value of the transferred properties has been estimated at £10,000,000. We are using them for departmental purposes, and we know that we shall be required either to pay for them or to pay interest on the cost of their construction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think so. Let the honorable member read the Constitution.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I hope the right honorable gentleman does not propose that we should repudiate our obligations to the States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Let the honorable member read the Constitution, and he will find that Parliament has to decide, if we cannot agree with the States in the matter.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman will at least admit that we are now receiving the benefit of the use of the transferred properties.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The States are receiving the benefit also.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My right honorable friend can put it in any way he pleases, but we know that the Federal Government are receiving an advantage in having the use of the buildings which have been transferred to the Commonwealth. We must pay for those buildings, or meet the interest which has to be paid on the money borrowed for their construction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The balances are what we shall have to deal with.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That may be so, but the whole of the transaction must appear in the balance-sheets of the Federal Treasurer. I do not know how the right honorable gentleman proposes to manage the financial affairs of the Commonwealth; but he will not find that commercial men manage their affairs in the way he suggests. I can tell him that he will have to make a very different explanation to the States Governments.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If we cannot agree we must come to this Parliament to decide the matter; that is what the Constitution says.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I am sure that this Parliament will deal fairly by the States, and will have no desire to repudiate Commonwealth obligations. Parliament will realize that these buildings having been transferred to the Commonwealth, we have the right to pay for services rendered.

Mr. CAMERON.—The payments will have to be made from the revenue returnable to each State.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I admit that.

Mr. CAMERON.—When we return a surplus to the different States it comes to practically the same thing as paying for these services.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member will admit that we must keep our accounts separately from those of the States, and we must account for the properties transferred to the Commonwealth either in capital or in interest; if in capital, we must pay interest to the people from whom the money has been borrowed, and if in interest we must also pay it out of the annual revenue of the Commonwealth. No doubt the various sums will be debited to the different States, but the money has to be paid by the Federal Government. No Commonwealth Treasurer has yet proposed a scheme for dealing with the matter in a manner acceptable to the States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A Bill dealing with the subject has been passed by the Senate.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — The right honorable gentleman estimates that there will be this year a balance of only £469,000, but I point out that he has made no provision for a number of important measures, involving expenditure, which the Government has in contemplation. I refer, first of all, to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill. Honorable members are aware that I have made no secret of my opposition to that measure, though, in all probability, the iron deposits in the district which I represent are of greater extent than those of any other district in New South Wales.

Mr. FISHER.—Would the honorable member nationalize the industry?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Wide Bay is aware that I have fought the proposal in Parliament, and before my constituents. I cannot be accused of inconsistency, for I stand to my previously expressed opinion on the subject, and do not approve of the principle involved in the measure. The present Government propose to pass the Bill. They believe they have a majority in this House in favour of it. I doubt that, but time will, no doubt, tell whether they have or not. It will involve an expenditure of £300,000 in bonuses, but the Treasurer does not show how the Government propose to provide for that expenditure. Again, expenditure is involved in the proposed survey of the transcontinental railway.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is dead and buried.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not know what the Government propose to do in connexion with that matter. In reply to a question, they intimated last night their policy in regard to the railway, but so far the proposed survey has not received the approval of this Parliament.

Mr. PAGE.—What was the policy of the Government to which the honorable gentleman belonged on that matter?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There is no secret about it. We proposed to allow an inquiry to be made.

Mr. PAGE.—Yet the honorable member is condemning the present Government for proposing the same thing.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; what I say is that the Treasurer reminds us that there is a decreasing revenue, that the surplus to be returned to the States will come down this year to £469,000, an amount which will be required for the payment of interest and sinking fund in connexion with transferred properties; and yet the right honorable gentleman makes no provision for £300,000 involved in the payment of bonuses under the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, or for some £20,000 which will be necessary for the survey of the transcontinental railway. If that proposal is carried, it may involve an additional amount. Then we have to consider the old-age pensions scheme. I do not know how much money is provided for the operation of that scheme. It has been before us since the Treasurer first took office in 1901, and it is still in the same position. It has, no doubt, been a splendid card with which to gull the public. The Treasurer does not intimate where the Government are going to get the money necessary to give effect to an old-age pensions scheme, and I presume, therefore, that it is again put forward merely to gull the public. We have a Bill submitted for the appointment of a High Commissioner, and that also will involve serious expense for which no money is provided on the Estimates. We propose to deal with navigation and shipping, with the lighting of the coast, and with a Statistical Department for the Commonwealth. There is no provision on the Estimates in connexion with these matters, nor is there any provision made in connexion with the proposed Commonwealth Agricultural Department. Honorable members are aware that this House unanimously, and, I think, wisely, decided in favour of the establishment of a Department of Agriculture in connexion with Federal affairs. I think that a great deal can be done in this direction. The Treasurer admits that he is in favour of assisting rural industries, and intimates that the Government intend to bring forward some scheme dealing with the question, but I can see no provision made on the Estimates for any expenditure in connexion with agriculture.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What provision did the late Government make for it?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The late Government were going to make provision for it.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They were going to have a general election first.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They were prepared to go to the people and submit their policy to them, if they had been given the opportunity. I have no doubt they would have come back with a majority. This matter of a Federal Agricultural Department was discussed by the late Government, and they proposed to place a sum of money on the Estimates in connexion with it. I think that the present Government should give some attention to the matter. It is not a new proposal. It was discussed on a motion submitted by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and seconded, I think, by the present Attorney-General.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What was the decision of the Hobart Conference in connexion with that subject?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Conference met for the purpose of dealing in an amicable way with certain matters, but the Federal Government of the day is surely not to be led entirely by the decisions of a conference.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It put a stop to the proposal.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It did not, as my honorable friend will find if he refers to the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The proposal is as dead as Julius Cæsar.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Gippsland is an honorable man, and I am prepared to leave him to say whether he intended to do anything in that direction. At all events, we intended to deal with the matter, and I think that it should be dealt with. There are many ways in which it could be dealt with without interfering with the functions of the States. As one who has had a good deal to do with agricultural administration in New South Wales, I know that the States Departments are doing excellent work. But the expenditure in this direction might be lessened, and greater efficiency obtained, by the establishment of a central Commonwealth Department of Agriculture. Very often diseases affecting stock or plant life cause serious loss to stock-breeders and farmers. At present we have in the States five or six different agencies investigating such diseases; but the division of forces makes it impossible to obtain the services of the very best experts. If the Commonwealth carried out investigations to ascertain how best to prevent or to remedy diseases such as tuberculosis, the tick pest, or swine fever, the people of all the States would be greatly benefited. Salary should be no object in considering the appointment of the best man procurable.

Mr. CAMERON.—The money will be well saved.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am sure of it. If there were a Federal Department of Agriculture, with a large, properly-equipped laboratory for the investigation of diseases of animals, and of plants, under the direction of the best man obtainable, our farmers, pastoralists, and others would benefit greatly, and the country might be saved millions of expense.

Mr. PAGE.—This is Socialism. I thought that the honorable member did not believe in Socialism.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I call it assisting individual effort; but even though the honorable member calls it Socialism, I am in favour of it.

Mr. CAMERON.—There are already Departments of Agriculture in the various States, and by amalgamating them we should obtain better results.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes, and should effect economies.

Mr. PAGE.—Speaking for Queensland, I think there is too much centralization now.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—A very large number of pastoralists and others in Queensland were ruined a few years ago by the spread of the tick pest there.

Mr. PAGE.—But the honorable member saved New South Wales from the pest.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I tried my best to do so, and I did a little in preventing the tick from spreading, though my efforts incurred the hostility of a large number of pastoralists in Queensland. I felt it my duty to protect, not only New South Wales, but Victoria, and in that I was ably assisted by the Agricultural Department of the latter State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The tick would not live down here; it will not live in Western Australia.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did not think it wise to run any risks.

Mr. PAGE.—It would have meant ruin to the dairying industry of New South Wales if the honorable member for Macquarie had not taken the action he did.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not know about that. The pest does not exist in temperate climates. We know that from our experience in Western Australia.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—At all events, the northern districts of New South Wales were very close to places in Queensland where the pest was doing great damage. In regard to the means of prevention which we adopted, we were at variance with the Queensland Department of Agriculture. In such cases there should be a Federal authority, empowered to take measures to prevent the spreading of disease from State to State, and to secure uniformity of action on the part of State authorities. That in itself would be very beneficial.

Mr. FISHER.—Under what law would it be done?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Under the Commonwealth law. It was previously held that our power to make laws in regard to quarantine applies only to human beings; but the Attorney-General of the late Administration gave the opinion that it applies also to animals. I cannot see why any limitation should be placed on the word, and I think that the interpretation which he gave is that which would be accepted by the High Court. Even if there were a little trouble at first, I think that the various States would soon see the advantage to be gained in the way of economy and greater efficiency by the establishment of a central authority. The dairying industry, the wool industry, and the meat industry might any of them be seriously affected by the spread of disease, and if that happened a large number of the citizens of the Commonwealth would be injured. Therefore, it is our duty to try to protect these industries.

Mr. PAGE.—We have already enough centralization.

Mr. FISHER.—The Commonwealth must exercise power in regard to quarantine.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Treasurer indicated that he is rather in favour of doing away with the Braddon provision of the Constitution at the end of the ten years during which it must have effect, though he says that the matter has not yet been dealt with by the Cabinet. I think that there is a great difference of opinion even among his own party on that subject, which will create a good deal of trouble, and it would have been better, as he is not prepared to deal with it now, to say nothing at all about it.

Mr. CAMERON.—No alteration can be made for four years to come, and the present Government will probably not be in power then.

Mr. PAGE.—There is every probability that they will.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Perhaps the Treasurer will have joined the caucus party then.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No doubt we shall see the honorable member there.

Mr. PAGE.—How far is he from it now?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—During the many years which I have been in politics, I have always been fair to labour, but I prefer to remain independent of caucuses, so that I may give free expression to my views. I am perfectly sure that my attitude in this respect will meet with the approval of the workers, and that I could successfully contest an election against the right honorable gentleman in a working man's constituency. The right honorable gentleman is acting in accordance with the desires of the Labour Party, because he knows that he cannot live without them. The honorable member for Gippsland suggested that the contract labour section in the Immigration Restriction Act might be modified in such a way as to make it apply only to men introduced under contract at lower rates of wages than those prevailing here, or at the time of a strike. Not a word was said by the Government as to their policy on the subject, until after the honorable member for Bland had expressed his approval of some action being taken in the direction indicated by the honorable member for Gippsland, but two days later we were told that the Government were favorable to a modification of the provision. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney recently stated in Sydney that the Act had been badly administered, and that it had been made to operate more drastically than was intended. The Treasurer having made a statement to-day with regard to the dissatisfaction existing in Western Australia in reference to postal administration, it may not be out of place for me to offer a few remarks with regard to the condition of postal matters in that State. I do not wonder that dissatisfaction should exist. When I was administering the Post and Telegraph Department, I found that the condition of affairs in Western Australia was anything but what it ought to be, and I approved of the appointment of an officer from New South Wales to make a comprehensive inquiry. I thought it desirable to select an officer from another State, who would be able to view matters apart from any local influence, and give us the benefit of his experience. I adopted a similar course in connexion with the revision of the arrangements for letter clearances in Melbourne. When I found that letters for Queensland and New South Wales, instead of being sent away on the day that they were posted, were detained for twenty-four hours, I thought it necessary to make a change, and I brought over an officer from New South Wales.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member did not bring over any bull.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports displays great anxiety when any matter relating to the manufacturing interests is mentioned, but he ridicules every effort that is made to assist the agricultural class. I may tell him that the importation of the bull to which he has referred, resulted in more good to humanity than the honorable member will be able to effect during his whole life-time. I am glad to say that in a report dealing with the work of the Royal Agricultural Society of Victoria, special reference was made to the good work done by New South Wales in that direction. If the honorable member for Melbourne Ports will take the trouble to make inquiries, he will find that there are other industries just as important as those in which he takes such a great interest. The Treasurer challenged me in regard to the state of affairs in the Postal Department in Western Australia, and I wish to refer to a report referred to by the honorable member for Coolgardie last session. This disclosed a most disgraceful state of affairs.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Was that an official report?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes; it was prepared, I think, by the accountant of the Postal Department. I believe the as arrived when we should deal with the Post and Telegraph Department as a Federal, rather than from the stand-point. That is why I propose to appoint a chief electrician and an inspector to visit the various States, to furnish reports entirely free from any colouring. I am very glad to know my successor in office has also adopted this course. I felt the need of some such person to advise me at the time of the trouble in regard to the clearances of letters for Melbourne and Ballarat and other matters. I did not have acted in that matter in the interest of the Melbourne daily newspapers, but I claim that the changes I made have secured appreciable benefits upon a large scale to the public. At present over 1000 letters, which were formerly delayed to a delay of many hours, are being cleared daily, and although the newspapers may have been incidentally benefited, confidently, that the change has been justified by the results. I was subjected to severe criticism in connexion with the English mail contract, but I was not able to face it. I showed the shipping companies that the Commonwealth law was observed. I sent an officer to Western Australia to report upon the Post and Telegraph Department there, and I have a list of between fifty and sixty alterations which were proposed in the telegraph and telephone services. The officer did not send his report to the Deputy Postmaster-General of Western Australia, who recommended its adoption. As a consequence, a saving of £1000 will be effected during the current year, whilst a permanent saving of over £1000 per annum will result, and the efficiency of the service will be increased. The report of the Under-Secretary, covering Mr. Young's report, reads as follows:—

I submit herewith the report of Mr. Young, of the telegraph branch, Sydney, and of an inspector in New South Wales, on the condition of the telegraph and telephone services of this Department in Western Australia pursuant to the special instructions of the Minister (vide previous papers).

The report is, in my opinion, very full and complete, and contains information of great value not only from the stand-point of economy in working, but also what is even more important, increased efficiency, if immediate effect be given to the recommendations that have been fully concur in all the recommendations with only two exceptions, one, a very minor matter, the substitution of caps for messengers' wear, instead of the straw hats now worn by them. This may, I think, be left to the discretion of the Deputy Postmaster-General; it is largely a matter of climate, and, in my opinion, the caps do not afford sufficient protection in a warm climate during the summer. The custom of the country might, I think, safely be followed in this respect. The second is much more important, that is allowing the acting manager of the telephone branch, Perth, to retain his position for another three months to demonstrate his ability. In my opinion he has had ample time in the past for this, and has miserably failed. I think he should make way for a better man without further delay.

The whole report reflects very adversely and necessarily very severely upon the whole management of the Department in Western Australia. It shows that money has been wantonly wasted, and efficiency sacrificed, owing entirely to the incapacity or negligence, or both, of highly-paid and responsible officers. They should have an opportunity of replying to those portions of the report concerning them.

The Deputy Postmaster-General, Perth, should be instructed to impress upon all his officers, and particularly upon those holding responsible positions, that, without respect to either persons, or positions, officers who prove themselves to be either negligent or incapable in the discharge of their duties will be dealt with under the provisions of the Public Service Act and regulations.

As a first step towards dealing with this report, the whole of it, and the accompanying papers, should be referred to the Public Service Commissioner for his concurrence in those matters in which it is required.

I think it is only due to Mr. Young that he should be thanked for his report.

The Treasurer wishes to make it appear that my administration of the Postal Department resulted in an unsatisfactory condition of affairs, so far as Western Australia is concerned.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — That is the general feeling over there.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I rely upon facts, not upon feeling.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The statement has been made in the press.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I can tell my right honorable friend that within two or three days after I had appointed a board to inquire into the conduct of a certain officer I received from one of the newspapers in Western Australia a telegram congratulating me upon the step which I had taken. Upon the report of the officer to whom I have referred, I wrote the following minute:—

In view of the numerous complaints received with respect to the conduct of the business of this Department in Western Australia, I approved of Mr. E. J. Young, of the Sydney office—an officer of wide experience and ability—being deputed to make a thorough investigation of the matter, and his report fully justifies the step taken. If Mr. Young, a stranger to the place, could in a few weeks discover so many evidences of waste, and want of business capacity, what excuses have the officers concerned to offer for allowing such an unsatisfactory state of affairs to remain so long without suggesting any remedial measures? The responsible officers have been tried, and this report, which is supported by Mr. Hardman, the Deputy Postmaster-General, shows that they have sadly failed in their duty to the public and the Department, and they should be dealt with under section 65 of the Public Service Act. Public money has been squandered, and the public compelled to submit to inconvenience and loss, through either incompetence or neglect. In addition to the other evidences of maladministration, it appears that a new telegraph line, to cost nearly £5,000, was recommended without any justification.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What line was that?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I will give my right honorable friend the name of it presently. I cannot recollect it off-hand.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — One would think that the honorable member would remember an expenditure of £5,000.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did not anticipate making any reference to this matter, or I should have been prepared with the full report.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The honorable member can supply me with the information only by reference to his papers. He does not recollect the name of the line in question.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I will give particulars later. When he was delivering his Budget statement the right honorable gentleman did nothing else but refer to papers. My minute continues:—

Mr. Young also makes reference to the way in which the condenser system has been used, and it is with surprise that I learn how little interest officers have evinced in the working of this inexpensive means of communication. Under this system, small communities can be given the advantage of cheap telephone communication, but instead of the officers assisting to perfect its working they appear to have shown the utmost indifference and neglect. I have, during the last few months, authorized the extension of the condenser system of telephone connexion to a large number of country districts, and, as the success of these facilities will largely depend upon the care and attention bestowed by the officers in charge, I wish the Deputy Postmaster-General to inform all concerned that I understand the efficiency of the system is being seriously imperilled through carelessness on the part of the officers, and that any case of neglect will be severely dealt with.

Prompt action should be taken to carry out the suggestions made by Mr. Young, except as to the use of caps and the appointment of the acting manager of the Telephone Branch, Perth, and the papers may then be forwarded to the Public Service Commissioner, who will surely see the necessity for a complete alteration in the staff arrangements in the State men-

The Treasurer has made a statement which reflects upon my administration as Postmaster-General. If I had given effect to some of his proposals no doubt the staff would have been all right. But in carrying out any reform, I endeavour to ascertain whether they were justified in the public interest. I leave it to my successor to say whether many of the reforms which I initiated have not added to the efficiency of the Department.

Mr. GROOM. — The honorable member has continued the good work which he has been making progress.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am not going to reflect upon anybody. As Postmaster-General, I claim that I did my duty, and in endeavouring to make such alterations as I thought would eventually prove of benefit to the people. During the period of the Reid-McLean Government remaining in office I kept the expenditure of the Post and Telegraph Department within the revenue.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — The line which the Treasurer referred a few months ago is that from Perth to Eucla.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The wire which I referred just now was the suggestion of a wire from Midland Junction to Northam, and the arranging of a wire instead of erecting an additional wire from Perth to Coolgardie, at a cost of £4,000. Mr. Young considered it to be unnecessary, and therefore he proposed an alternative which got rid of the necessity of erecting up the additional line, and made a saving of some thousands of pounds.

Mr. PAGE.—Who recommended the line?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I cannot say.

Mr. PAGE.—Did the honorable member take any action to find out?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes, I have asked the Public Service Commissioner to set up a board to find out whether the officers were allowed such a state of affairs to exist, and to be retained in the service. I feel that it was due to the Department that an inquiry should take place, and I admit that we have excellent officers in the Post and Telegraph service who are doing good work; but I consider that incompetent officers ought not to be a to reflect discredit upon those who are efficient.

Mr. PAGE.—Was the inquiry made?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The board was appointed before I left office. I do not know what has been done since.

Mr. PAGE.—I think the Committee ought to know what the result was

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The board was instructed to inquire what officers were responsible. I felt that in the public interest the matter ought to be dealt with promptly, and I also approved of the recommendations by Mr. Young, which were supported by the Deputy Postmaster-General and by the Secretary of the Department, making alterations which, I presume, have been carried out. During my term of office the Post and Telegraph Department had a surplus of £64,730. Therefore I do not think that we have any reason to be ashamed of our administration, nor has Parliament any reason to complain of the way in which affairs were managed. Indeed, no complaint has been made except by the present Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I merely said that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in Western Australia.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not wonder at it.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member did excellent work.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I merely did my duty. Reference has been made to the contract made with the Orient Company for the carriage of mails to Europe. The Treasurer did not say much about that subject in his Budget speech, except to remark that the price was large. We all admit that. My right honorable friend knows that I was subjected to a good deal of criticism at the time the negotiations were being conducted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think I was rather friendly to the honorable member in that matter.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—In his Budget speech my right honorable friend made it appear that it was one of the matters as to which I merely did my duty, and that rather a big price was paid. The Government of which I was a member had a considerable amount of trouble in connexion with the contract.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I thought that the honorable member was too long in concluding negotiations.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If we had occupied a shorter time we should have had to pay perhaps £30,000 a year more. I believe that when the matter is gone into fully, honorable members will admit that the Administration to which I belonged did its duty by the people of the Commonwealth in resisting what we thought an unfair demand by the Orient Company.

Mr. PAGE.—Why was Brisbane left out?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I asked the Orient Company to give consideration to the proposal to extend the service to Brisbane, but at that time the reply was that to do so would necessitate an extra vessel being engaged upon the line, and that it could not be done.

Mr. FISHER.—Why did the honorable member tie the company to go to Melbourne and Sydney?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Under the old contract the boats were compelled to go to Melbourne and Sydney, and the only alteration we made was one to enable them to go to Brisbane, and to make that port a terminus if they could make satisfactory arrangements.

Mr. PAGE.—How much difference would it have made in the amount of the contract if Melbourne and Sydney had not been included?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not think that it would have made any difference. My object was simply to give them more latitude. Under the old contract Sydney was looked upon as the terminus, and I altered the condition so as to enable the vessels to go to Brisbane, if satisfactory arrangements could be made by the company.

Mr. PAGE.—They have made them now.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the honorable member know that according to the contract the boats have to go to Sydney, whether they carry mails or not?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The boats have to go to Sydney with parcels and mails.

Mr. FISHER.—But the contract says that the boats have to go to Sydney, whether they carry mails or not.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That made no difference to the price, because the boats always carry mails. By striking out Sydney and Melbourne, we should give the company more latitude, and enable them to do practically as they liked in connexion with time-running.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Had the contract been for a service to Adelaide, would not the price have been less?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not think so, because the boats must go to Melbourne and Sydney for trade purposes. I could not get the boats to Brisbane, and I felt that I could not get the service performed for a less sum by asking the company to deliver the mails at Adelaide.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member had no thought of Brisbane.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did all I could to study the interests of Brisbane. The honorable member will admit that tenders were invited, not by our Government, but by the previous Government.

Mr. FISHER.—But for a service, including Brisbane as a port of call.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The only tender which was received by either the Deakin or the Watson Government, excluded Brisbane, and included Sydney and Melbourne only.

Mr. PAGE.—A good way for the honorable member to show his bona fides is to assist us to get the £26,000 out of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I must see the terms and conditions of the contract before I can make a statement on that point. I was asked by a gentleman, "Why do you not cut out Sydney and Melbourne, because if you do, you will have no complaints from Brisbane." I said, "I have no right to do that. It will not cost any more to impose the condition, but it will give us the advantage of being able to compel the boats to run to time, and eventually I believe they will run to Brisbane." We also had considerable trouble about the Vancouver service before we renewed the contract. At first, the contractors asked for an extra sum of £20,000 a year.

Mr. FISHER.—They get £66,000 a year.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Barton Government entered into this contract. All that the new contract will cost the Commonwealth is an additional sum of about £2,000 a year. I tried very hard to get the price reduced to the former sum, but I did not succeed. In the interests of Queensland, as well as of Australia generally, it would be unwise, I think, to discontinue this service. I believe that it is surrounded with great possibilities.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Our exports to Vancouver are valued at £25,000 a year, and we pay an annual subsidy of £66,000 a year.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I admit that, but I should be very sorry to see the service discontinued at the time. I believe it is surrounded with possibilities, and if we could only quicker service on each side, there is a reason why mails should not be more quickly by that route than via Melbourne. I believe the time will come when it will be done. In time of war, the service route will be quite free from a number of complications which must inevitably arise in the neighbourhood of the Panama Canal. At all events, the late Government sanctioned the continuance of the service in the public interest. Previously, the Commonwealth had to contribute £10,000 a year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It seems to me that the honorable member is on his defence.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My honorable friend has referred to this contract, and I think I may be excused for saying a few words, especially when it is remembered that my action in this regard has been criticised a good deal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I thought the honorable member rose to criticise the contract. But he is defending himself instead of criticising me.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am not here to be the critic of the right honorable gentleman, but to deal generally with the Estimates from the Federal standpoint. At this stage, we have a right to deal with financial questions, and the right honorable gentleman ought not to object to my remarks. Previously, Queensland and South Wales used to pay the whole of the subsidy for the Vancouver mail service. The late Government felt it was their duty to charge the expenditure according to population, and, in my opinion, that course was taken. I am very glad to hear that the Postmaster-General has accepted the proposal of the late Government for the administration of the central mail. For years the work was carried out on unsuitable premises. Although the premises were as good as the staff to be found in any office, still they had not the necessary accommodation to enable them to do out their work in a satisfactory way. Worse than that, their number was inadequate to the work to be done. The late Government felt that, in the public interest, it would be wise to increase the number of the staff, and I believe that the increase which we sanctioned, has tended to economy, but to better administration. We all remember the great delays caused to take place in dealing with these matters. The time taken up in getting up papers and instituting innovations necessitated a great deal more expenditure than that occasioned by the appointment of a few extra clerks. I am so glad to find that my honorable friend is carrying out our proposal to appoint a chief electrician and a chief inspector. We found that great advantages were derived from the sending of officers from the Colonies to inquire into various matters. I felt that it would be a proper thing to have at the head office a chief electrician and a chief inspector, who could be sent to the Colonies on the spot, and also to deal with special cases in the various Colonies. We used to get reports from the Colonies Postmasters-General and the local authorities, but very often we felt that matters were not dealt with from the Federal point of view. I think that the presence of two officers at the head office will tend to assist, as well as economic administration. Some progress has been made to the question of penny post, and the Treasurer indicates that, in his opinion, that is a desirable reform, though he has not told us whether he would like to see it carried into effect.

I should like to see penny postage introduced throughout the Empire, if we could afford to adopt the system. Unfortunately, I found that at present the loss consequent on penny postage would be more than we are in a position to bear. The Government of which I was a member approved of the next best plan, namely, an Empire rate. The British Government suggested that if there were an Empire rate of twopence, the authorities in England would adopt a rate of a penny from England to other parts of the Empire. The Government fell in with that proposal.

Then, again, the rate on postcards throughout the Empire was reduced to one penny; and all these changes are in the direction of cheapening postal communication. We had to be careful in the matter, however, of the finances of the various Colonies, and these had to be considered. I shall be glad to see the day—and I hope it is not far distant—when the Commonwealth will be able to approve and adopt an Empire rate of twopence, but of one penny, because I am sure that such a system could not fail to have a useful influence throughout British possessions. However, as I have already said, we are not in the position now to adopt penny postage; although if the finances of the Post and Telegraph Department continue to improve, I hope to see the reform accomplished in the not far distant future. I regarded the construction of the additional telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne as perfectly justifiable; and I am glad to observe that my successor concurs in that view. Speaking from memory, I think inquiries showed that the income would return 10 per cent. on the cost of construction. During my term of office I was able to carry out a number of alterations in regard to the telephone service; and, since the beginning of the year, towns to the number of 400 have been approved to be placed in communication on the cheap system. For years these have been applying for extensions, and I thought it only right to place within the reach of the people this cheap means of communication. The honorable member for Illawarra suggested that Wollongong should be connected with the telephone system, and the cost of the work was estimated at £3,100; but by means of the condenser system, we gave the desired convenience at a cost of only £60. Expenditure of that kind is economical, and, at the same time, it offers facilities to the residents of the country districts, who are entitled to our consideration. In the past there has been a prejudice in some quarters against these cheaper systems of telephoning; but, all the same, I think that the advantages they offer ought to be availed of, and trees and fences utilized, and the condenser method adopted as far as possible.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Where were the towns connected by these cheaper means?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There were some in Western Australia and some in Queensland.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How many towns were there in Western Australia?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There were fifteen or sixteen towns approved to be connected in Western Australia, about 150 towns in Victoria, and, I think, about 200 in New South Wales. These lines were either approved or constructed — some were approved, but not carried out. People in the country districts, who live far away from medical men, and are not overburdened with facilities for carrying on their business, ought to receive some consideration in this connexion. The Treasurer, I regret to say, takes a different view from that which I would approve in connexion with the status of the Deputy Postmasters-General. It has been decided by the Government to make the maximum salary for a Deputy Postmaster-General £800 per annum. In my opinion, we ought to get the best man possible for this position. In New South Wales, for example, there are about 6,729 official and non-official post-offices, with a revenue of about £1,000,000, and an expenditure of about £950,000 per annum. To control a business of this kind we, as I say, require the best men, and these cannot be obtained unless the salary is adequate. By one act of neglect or carelessness in wrongly placing one of the subordinate officials, a loss might be incurred far greater than the saving which is sought to be made by a reduction of the salary. What is necessary is, as far as possible, to place this position beyond political influence, and it would be better to leave the question of salary to be dealt with by the Public Service Commissioner under the Public Service Act, the same as are those of other officers of the Post and Telegraph Department.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It would be possible to have the Deputy Postmasters-General graded by the Public Service Commissioner.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—All other officers are graded by the Commissioner, the only officers not so graded being the Deputy Postmasters-General, although they are in charge of a branch of the Public Service which employs thousands of men. An incompetent deputy, who is paid a limited salary at the instance of the Government, might frustrate all the intentions of the Public Service Commissioner. The present Postmaster-General would be wise to give this matter further consideration. If we give the Public Service Commissioner power to grade subordinate officers, we ought to give him power to grade the Deputy Postmasters-General, subject, of course, to the approval of the Governor in Council. One of the Deputy Postmasters-General brought this matter under my notice. The officer in question took exception to certain statements made in the press as to the duties which he and his fellow deputies had to perform, and submitted a long list of functions discharged by them, his object being to show that they were now called upon to perform more responsible duties than fell to their lot prior to Federation. I did not have an opportunity to bring his report before the Cabinet. Parliament concurred in the view which I submitted last year, that the salary of the Deputy Postmasters-General should be fixed at £920 per annum. On that occasion I thought it my duty, in the public interest, to defend the fixing of the salary at that amount, and the House agreed with me. As the report, to which I refer, was not dealt with by the Cabinet of which I was a member, it cannot be said that a Cabinet decision has been overruled; but the fact remains that Parliament determined last year that the salary should be £920 per annum. In my opinion, that remuneration is not too high, having regard to the responsible duties performed by these officers. Before retiring from office, I left on record a memorandum, in which I stated that—

Owing to the pressure of other important questions, I regret I have not had an opportunity before of looking into this matter, but, in my opinion, the success of the postal system of the Commonwealth must largely depend upon the intelligence, the initiative, and the vigour with which the Deputy Postmasters-General manage the business in their respective States. The nature of the business is such, and is so far removed from the centre of Government in most cases, that I personally do not quite see that their responsibilities can be considered as lessened since the establishment of the Commonwealth. We require in such positions men of tact, judgment, and good business ability, and if they act up to the public requirements in the positions they hold, I am of the opinion that they cannot be considered to have lesser responsibilities than they had under the State, when they had practically at their elbow a responsible Minister to whom they could submit their every action for confirmation.

This, as stated, is my personal view, but as I am about to leave office, I merely place this on record.

In these circumstances, I hope that the Government will carefully consider this question, and determine whether it would not be advisable to place the Deputy Postmasters-General in the position occupied by other Public Service officials, so that it will be the duty of the Commissioner to report whether he can obtain an officer, at the salary mentioned, to fill any vacancy that occurs. The Public Service Commissioner might have to appoint an officer below the standard which be considered desir-simply because he was called upon to a salary below that which he thought able.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member think that £800 per annum is a sufficiently high salary for a Deputy Postmaster-General?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think that in some cases it might be impossible to secure a suitable man for the office at that salary. The time is coming when the deputies, being far removed from the central administration, will be called upon to discharge more important duties than they have hitherto to perform. Each Deputy Postmaster-General controls not only a very large number of officers, but all matters relating to the construction of telephone and telegraph lines and various postal requirements involving an expenditure of many thousands of pounds, and it should be our duty to secure men of the highest ability in such positions.

Mr. THOMAS.—Does the honorable member think that the salaries paid in times past have been sufficient?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Deputy Postmaster-General of New South Wales received £920 per annum before Federation. I admit that in some cases very good men were secured for the office. I would recall the honorable member for Barrier as a private company, carrying on operations in his own constituency would think of paying £5,000 or £6,000 per annum for the services of an expert officer.

Mr. THOMAS.—But would the honorable member be agreeable to the Commonwealth paying £5,000 or £6,000 per annum to a Deputy Postmaster-General?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not think it would be necessary to go to that extent, but we should give the Public Service Commissioner power to recommend to the Governor-General in Council what, in his opinion, is a proper salary to pay, in order to secure an officer of high standard and competency.

Mr. THOMAS.—The blundering way in which the Postal Department has been administered seems to show that we have not done enough. There have been more mistakes in connexion with that Department than have occurred in any other.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is one reason why I hold that, in relation to this matter, we are pursuing a false economy which may prove disastrous. If we cannot obtain a suitable officer for less than £1,000 per annum, we must be prepared to pay that salary.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Is not the honorable member advancing an argument against centralization?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No. We must have a central authority, and I think it only fair to say that we have not a more honorable and trustworthy officer in the Public Service than is Mr. Scott, the Secretary to the Department.

Mr. THOMAS.—He is an able man.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He is an able man, who does his duty fearlessly and conscientiously, and he has a large body of excellent officers associated with him. It has been urged that if the Deputy Postmaster-General in New South Wales received £920 per annum, the difference between his salary and that of the Secretary of the Department would not be sufficiently marked. That fact, however, should not prevent us from granting the former a reasonable salary.

Mr. STORRER.—The Deputy Postmasters-General in the other States receive less.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But their responsibilities are less.

Mr. STORRER.—In some cases, they are further removed from the central administration. Take, for instance, the Deputy Postmaster-General of Western Australia.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is true that they are in some cases far removed from the central administration, and that is a reason why we should do our utmost to secure competent men for the position. The condition of affairs which prevailed in the Department in Western Australia in the early days of Federation serves to emphasize my point.

Mr. STORRER.—A big salary does not always carry the best man.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I agree with the honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the honorable member seems to think that £800 per annum is a small salary.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is a good one, but I hold that a salary of £1,000 per annum would not be too much, if it would command the services of a highly competent man to control the work of the Department in New South Wales, or, indeed, in any other State.

Mr. THOMAS.—£2,000 might not be too much in certain circumstances. The trouble is that, although we have paid good salaries, we appear in the past to have had some duffers receiving them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—One reason why we passed the Public Service Act was that it was desired to do away with political influence. If the Public Service Commissioner is competent to deal with the grading of officers in the subordinate ranks of the service, he should surely be intrusted also with the grading of officers in the highest ranks, on whom he must depend to see that the work of the subordinate officers is efficiently performed. This power should be taken out of the hands of Ministers. I do not hesitate to say that I would not accept the position of Postmaster-General if I had to make appointments in the Department without the assistance of a Public Service Commissioner. In view of the great distance of many places from the centres of government, and the trouble which he would have in dealing with applications for increases and appointments, the life of a Postmaster-General would be most unenviable. No matter how conscientious a Minister might be, he could not properly carry out such duties.

Mr. PAGE.—Social influence is quite as bad as political influence.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not believe in either. I never on my own initiative appointed a single man to any position while I was in the Post Office Department.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable gentleman had not the power to do so. He was simply a recording clerk.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I might have appointed temporary officers had I chosen to do so.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable gentleman was only a temporary officer himself.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That may be so, but I feel sure that no Postmaster-General desires any such power of appointment. He would be aware that the appointment of any one of his friends would offend twenty other persons.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable gentleman said the salary of the Deputy Postmasters-General should be raised from £800 to £920 a year.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I say that we should leave the matter to the Public Service Commissioner. Ministers should not deal with such questions.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable gentleman left the recommendation for the higher salary on record.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I know I did, and I have no hesitation in saying that, for a competent man in the position, £920 a year is not too much to pay. My strong argument is that such a matter should not be left to this or that Postmaster-General, but to the Public Service Commissioner. That officer should make his recommendation to the Government, and then, if the Government disapproved of the recommendation, Parliament should say whether they were justified in doing so.

Mr. PAGE.—The Public Service Commissioner has already too much say.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member assisted to give the power to him.

Mr. PAGE.—I am sorry for it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have had a good many years' experience of the work of the Public Service Commissioner. He was an Under-Secretary of mine in the Department of Mines in New South Wales for two or three years, and I am in a position to say that there is no more efficient, trustworthy, and honorable man in the Public Service of Australia. We were fellow clerks together thirty years ago, and I speak of him now, not as a personal friend, but as a public servant, when I say that he is a trustworthy, conscientious man, and that the Government of the Commonwealth were fortunate in being able to secure his services.

Mr. PAGE.—No one in this House has said a word against him.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He is one of our appointments.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I give the Government of which my right honorable friend was a member every credit for the appointment of the present Public Service Commissioner. I believe they got the best man who could have been selected for the position. He is a man of great determination of character, and is not afraid to follow his judgment, even against a friend.

Mr. PAGE.—But the honorable gentleman will admit that he is not perfect.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We are all liable to make mistakes, but I am sure that the Public Service Commissioner is a man who would be found willing to admit that he has made a mistake when it is pointed out to him, and there is no man more ready to do what he believes to be

The honorable member for Mar-of opinion that this officer has already uch power. I do not admit that.
onorable member admits that the Service Commissioner has been given powers in connexion with all suborofficers of the Public Service, and no reason why he should not have given similar powers in connexion Deputy Postmasters-General. I be-that Parliament intended that he have those powers, but when the n was raised subsequently the At-General decided differently.

PAGE.—The question was not raised he Public Service Bill was being red.

SYDNEY SMITH.—I would ask onorable member whether at that time not understand that every Deputy ster-General was as much under the of the Public Service Commissioner e matters as were the subordinate of the service?

PAGE.—I did.

SYDNEY SMITH.—I venture to nineteen out of every twenty mem-this House held the same view.
ne question was subsequently raised ver was withdrawn from the Public Commissioner, and in that respect was not done to the Commonwealth

PAGE.—Why did not old parliamenlike the honorable gentleman see e matter was dealt with properly
Public Service Bill?

SYDNEY SMITH.—I admit that ke was made in not making what ded more clear, but we should now medy the mistake.

PAGE.—The present Postmaster-has now settled the matter by fixing e of the salaries.

SYDNEY SMITH.—I hold that r who is responsible to Parliament work of the Public Service should ed that competent men are placed e of the Departments. They should paid a salary which will enable ic Service Commissioner to select positions men who will be com-see that his classification scheme ly carried out.

PAGE.—Why did not the honorable n practise what he is now preach-

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did practise
it. I proposed a salary of £920, as recommended by the Public Service Commissioner.

Mr. PAGE. — The honorable gentleman greased the fat pig every time.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member cannot say that of me. If we want brains and ability we must pay for them.

Mr. PAGE.—We may pay too much for them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If we consider our own position we shall find that while we are paid £400 a year as members of Parliament, honorable members, on taking office as Ministers, are given a salary of £2,000 a year.

Mr. PAGE.—Is there no honour attached to the position?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — Of course there is, but there is also extra pay attached to it, because it is admitted that Ministers of the Crown have to assume extra responsibilities. I am aware that the present Postmaster-General has no feeling in this matter.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is an easy thing for a Minister when leaving office to leave a recommendation for the payment of a big salary.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My honorable friend cannot accuse me of that. The matter was raised in this House. I stated my opinion and my determination to have the salary fixed at £920.

Mr. THOMAS.—The taunt of the present
Postmaster-General is a very unfair one.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It was no taunt.
It is sometimes very much easier to talk about these things than to do them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—This is what I said:—

The suggestion was then made that the salary attaching to the office (Deputy Postmaster-General, Sydney), should be reduced to £800 per annum. It is perhaps needless to say that I do not agree with that suggestion. I think that an officer who is qualified to fill such an important position, should, by reason of his ability and experience, be able to command a salary of £920 per annum. There is no doubt whatever as to the ability of the present occupant of that office.
He has to control a revenue which last year amounted to £941,000, and an expenditure which aggregated £950,000. Further, he has to take charge of the Government Savings Bank's transactions, and of all Money Order and Postal Note business. He has also to accept a responsibility which he was not previously called upon to bear. In pre-Federation days the Postmaster-General shouldered the responsibility of approving of practically all expenditure in connexion with the Department, but at the present time it devolves upon the Deputy Postmaster-General. Last year this officer had to control no less a sum than £11,000,000. He controls 3,865 permanent officers, and 2,859 non-official officers, or a total of 6,724 officers. Obviously, it is necessary that we should have a man of ability to fill that position, and to secure the services of such an officer we must pay him a good salary. We all know what is done by private employers. The Broken Hill Proprietary Company does not hesitate to pay £5,000 or £6,000 to a person to manage its business.

Mr. PAGE.—There is no comparison between the requirements of the two positions. The manager of the Broken Hill mine is an expert of high reputation.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes, but the officer of whom I am speaking must possess a fair knowledge of post and telegraph matters, and of business generally. There is another question arising out of the Budget to which I wish to refer. This Parliament has affirmed the desirability of paying for public works out of revenue. I think that that is a course which tends to economy, and the Treasurer himself has expressed the view that public buildings should always be paid for out of revenue.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is my view of what should be done, and the practice followed in Western Australia was, as a rule, to pay for buildings out of revenue.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We have adopted this principle, and have boasted that we are going in for economy. The Treasurer of the day comes down, and points out that all the new buildings and works in connexion with the big Departments of the Post Office and Defence are to be paid for out of revenue, and that there is to be no extravagant expenditure. But, on looking through two reports of the Auditor-General I find that the Treasurer of Queensland has done what amounts to the overriding of the Federal authority by that of a State. In two instances, in one of which £34,760 was involved, and in the other £23,183, the Treasurer of Queensland has taken out of Queensland loan funds the amount deducted by the Commonwealth, and paid it into the Queensland revenue. The Auditor-General in his report refers to this matter in the following terms:—

The following amounts charged by the Commonwealth from 1st July, 1901, to 31st May, 1903, to revenue fund on account of new works were charged by the State to the State loan fund. Votes and consolidated fund credited with the total amount—

Electric Telegraphs	...	£33,287
Defence	...	1,472
Total	...	£34,760

The following amounts charged by the Commonwealth from 1st June, 1903, to 31st May, 1904, to revenue fund on account of new buildings were charged by the State loan fund. Votes and consolidated fund credited with total amount—

Electric Telegraphs	...	£16,464
Defence	...	6,718
Total	...	£23,183

The Premier of Queensland wrote Government protesting against the expenditure in connexion with the building of post-offices at Cairns and Longabba, but we did not take notice of his request, because we considered that buildings were required in the public interest, and we were prepared to take responsibility for the expenditure. Economy will come to nought if the Treasurer can, by taking from loan funds the amount we expend, and paying it into his consolidated revenue account, practically meet the expenditure out of loan funds. Whilst we are practising economy and endeavouring to meet current expenditure out of revenue, it is not fair that a State Government should adopt this means of adding to the public loan burden. We have some controlling power in the matter, and a uniform system should be adopted in connexion with our public accounts. Sooner some definite arrangement should be made, the better it will be for the Commonwealth and for the States.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the honorable member argue that the fact of our carrying out our expenditure to the amount available for revenue tends to economy?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. It is very easy to apply loan funds to the construction of all kinds of works, while the money has to be found out of revenue, greater care is as a rule exercised in expending it.

Mr. FISHER.—Loan expenditure is waste, and to too lavish an outlay.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. It would be impossible to carry out a programme with the money available from revenue at the same time, I believe that the system which has been adopted by the Commonwealth

th is a good one, and that we should gly discountenance the course adopted ne Queensland Government.

Mr. McDONALD.—Does the honorable member mean to say that the Queensland Government have recouped their revenue of loans to an amount corresponding to that which has been devoted to the erection of public works in that State of the Commonwealth?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That has been the case in the two cases to which I have referred.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is absolutely distasteful.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have been able to ascertain whether a similar course is being followed during the current year;
I hope not. I obtained my information with regard to the expenditure last year from the Auditor-General's report.
It is unfair to us that the States Governments should thus increase their loan debts whilst we are endeavouring to study our interests by practising rigid economy.

Mr. STORRER.—Are all the States doing what the honorable member describes?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; the only one of which I know have occurred in New Zealand. The Government of that country may consider that they are doing a very ingenious thing; but I do not think they are acting fairly towards the Commonwealth. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports has had a good deal to say with regard to the Tariff. He seems to think that the duties levied by us should be regulated in such a way as to suit the peculiar needs of the Victorian manufacturers. An agitation has been entered into to induce the Tariff Commission to report as to the effect of the Tariff upon the industries in Victoria before they make their inquiries in other States, but I intend that that would be an utterly unjustifiable course to take.

Mr. MAUGER.—What is desired is that the industry shall be made the subject of inquiry in every State, and that a report should be presented with regard to it before any matters are inquired into.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But surely it must be recognised that one item in the Tariff may affect a number of industries.
For instance, the sugar duty. We know that that has a considerable influence upon a large number of enterprises.

Mr. MAUGER.—The Commission might be divided into a group of inter-related items.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — The duties should be considered from the stand-point of those engaged in every industry that is likely to be affected by them. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports represents that the industries of Victoria are in a very distressful condition, but, according to a report which has been laid upon the table of this House, the position of affairs is not so unsatisfactory as has been represented. The report reads as follows:—

In order to show in a concise form the development of the manufacturing industries of the States, and the effect of the Federal Tariff on such development, the subjoined summary of the values of transfers to other States of Australian goods is given. The figures show the total trade from each State, after carefully eliminating articles of agricultural produce, raw material, and coin and bullion:—

From	1899.	1904.
	£	£
New South Wales ...	515,021	1,731,590
Victoria ...	1,521,899	3,356,354
Queensland ...	1,110,639	1,502,814
South Australia ...	697,529	867,673
Western Australia ...	4,526	14,199
Tasmania ...	123,583	175,953
	£3,973,197	£7,648,583

Increase since Federation, £3,675,386.

That does not bear out the statements put forward by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. It has actually been suggested that, in the interests of local implement makers, we should prohibit the importation of harvesters.

Mr. MAUGER.—I wish that we could.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member will give no consideration to the other industries of the country. He was not justified in making the statement which he did. Does he expect the Treasurer to support his claim that drastic alterations should be made in the Tariff? Some time ago the right honorable gentleman wished to know where was our mandate for making any such alteration?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When was that?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—During the current year. The right honorable gentleman said—

Where is our mandate from our constituents to alter the Tariff? I am in favour of the existing Tariff being given a fair trial. It was arrived at after much labour and controversy, and I recognise that it would be unwise to disturb it, and that to do so at the present time would be detrimental to the interests of Australia and to trade all round. The verdict of Australia will, at the coming elections, be in accordance with the above decision.

The Prime Minister. it will be recollected, made a similar statement. Yet, despite these facts, the honorable member for Melbourne Ports is now attempting to force the Government to effect drastic alterations in the Tariff.

Mr. MAUGER.—We have appointed a Tariff Commission since then.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Treasurer adopts a very peculiar method of reasoning in regard to the operation of the Tariff. In his Budget speech he said—

We have often heard that Queensland has lost an immense sum of money through the operation of the Commonwealth Tariff, but the people of Queensland have in their pockets the money which is said to have been lost. On the other hand, we are told that New South Wales has gained considerably, but the people of that State have had to make up the excess which the Treasury has received over the revenue of 1900. The Treasurer of New South Wales will have gained, up to the 30th June, 1906—the end of the financial year—£5,941,408.

In one case, the right honorable gentleman argues that, because the taxpayers of New South Wales have contributed to the Treasury £5,941,000 in excess of what they would have contributed under the old State Tariff, they have gained to that extent, and, in the other, he claims that the people of Queensland, who have been taxed to the extent of £2,100,000 less than they were previously, have also gained. The Treasurer has declared that the cost of Federation represents only 1s. 5½d. per head of the population. I venture to say that he will experience some difficulty in persuading the people of New South Wales of the accuracy of his statement, in view of the increased taxation which has been imposed upon them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What have the Government of that State done with the additional revenue which has been returned to them?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—In many instances, I regret to say, that they have spent it in a way that I do not approve. I have no desire whatever to prolong this debate, but I felt that it was my duty to criticise certain portions of the financial statement. I regret exceedingly that, in regard to some matters, the Treasurer was not more definite.

Mr. THOMAS.—Definiteness is the honorable member's strong point.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We look to my honorable friends in the Ministerial corner to give us a definite lead in connexion with these proposals, but I am afraid we shall look in vain. Reference has been made in the course of the debate to the administration of my honorable and learned friend the member for Corinella while he was Minister of Defence. It is only due to him to say that during the time he was in office he put in as much work for the improvement of the defences of Australia as all his predecessors had done.

Mr. PAGE.—He was the best Minister of Defence we have had.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I quite agree with the honorable member. Those who listened to or have read the honorable member's speech will admit that he has given a great deal of thought to a problem which we must all admit to be an exceedingly difficult one to solve. For many years past our defences have been in an unsatisfactory condition. I believe that the time will come, and that at no distant date, when we shall be called upon to increase our defence expenditure very largely. When that time arrives I hope that such advice will be tendered to us as will enable us to expend our efforts in the right direction, and so to lay out our money as to insure the best possible result. In the past our expenditure has not been so usefully directed as it ought to have been. I trust that the present Government will give their earnest attention to the problem which, complicated as it is, must be solved, and that they will bring forward a satisfactory defence scheme for our consideration.

Mr. PAGE.—Does the honorable member think that we have had value for our money in the past?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have no hesitation in saying that we have not. I have myself criticised severely the reduction of expenditure on equipment and ammunition.

Mr. BROWN.—Does the honorable member think that we are going to get value for our money in the future?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I hope so. There can be no question that the British Government has done a great deal for us, and is still doing much. I am afraid that had it not been for the protection of the grand old flag we should have been in a very sad position. The recent war in the East has shown us the necessity for immediate and close attention to all questions connected with our defences. We are living in a fool's paradise.

matter must be taken up seriously and not only by the military authorities and the Government. When the Estimates are forwarded for discussion in detail I intend to take some action in connexion with military and naval expenditure, and I hope that other honorable members will be prepared to criticise it thoroughly. I am sorry that I have taken up so much time, but I hope that I have said nothing that is offensive to any honorable member. Our duty should be so to conduct our debates that although we may hit hard in the matter, we disturb no friendships outside. Personally, whenever in the heat of debate I have let fall any remark which appeared to be of an unfriendly nature, I have always been more sorry for it than the honorable member whose feelings were hurt could have been. I felt it to be my duty to make these observations in connexion with the Budget in order to make known what I believe to be the opinions of the members of whom I represent.

MR. FULLER (Illawarra).—The honorable member who has just resumed his seat has given us an explanation of the administration of the Post and Telegraph Department, and I am glad he had the honour of being at the head of it. I think every honorable member representing a country constituency throughout Australia can cordially indorse what he said, because if ever there was a Master-General who did his utmost to protect those people in the country districts who live at a great distance from the centres of civilization, the honorable member for Wide Bay is that man. He did all he could for them at the smallest possible expense, and every one must feel satisfied that he succeeded in his efforts. I sincerely trust that his successor will do as well, at any rate in this respect, in the footsteps of his predecessors, and look after the interests of country people, more particularly in connexion with the question of postal communication. I agree entirely with everything which has been said by honorable members in regard to the helping of rifle clubs. If there is one thing more than another that we should encourage as far as possible, it is rifle shooting. We should make as many of our citizens as possible expert rifle shots. I am very much indeed to see that the vote for this purpose has been cut down. I have always favoured to support their interests here. I sincerely trust that all honorable members who have followed recent doings in warfare will encourage the establishment of these clubs. The principal question on which I rose to speak is one which affects me personally as a member of perhaps the most important Royal Commission which has ever been appointed in Australia. I take this step because of an article in the Age of this morning. I am sorry that the Prime Minister is not present, because I think it is a matter to which we ought to direct his very serious attention, in the interests of not only the Commission itself, but the country generally.

MR. FISHER.—Some of us have not seen the article. What is it?

MR. FULLER.—I intend to read a few extracts, so as to enable such honorable members to understand the references I intend to make.

MR. FISHER.—My view is that it is a very serious matter for a member of the Commission to raise such a question here.

MR. FULLER.—That is a matter for me to consider. At any rate, I think it is of such serious importance that I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the article, in the hope that he will see that the Tariff Commission is protected against attack in this way. The passages to which I wish to draw attention I will now quote—

In their impatience with the dilatory delays of the Tariff Commission, the Protectionist Association and the Chamber of Manufactures simply speak the sense of the industrial community. The proceedings of that Commission are really an outrage on the interests which the Commission was designed to serve. . . . It is a common expression now in the lobbies of Parliament House that there will be no attempt at Tariff revision in this Parliament, and that the Tariff Commissioners are astutely marking time with that very intention.

MR. RONALD.—Hear, hear.

MR. FULLER.—It shows the feeling amongst some honorable members in connexion with the Tariff Commission when one of them can say "Hear, hear," to a grave accusation of that character against its members. The honorable member for Wide Bay interjected that this is a serious matter for a member of the Commission to bring forward here. Surely I have a right to resent accusations of this sort, especially when I know them to be absolutely untrue?

MR. FISHER.—My reason for the interjection was that the honorable and learned member held a commission from the Crown, and that nobody could touch him.

MR. FULLER.—I know that, but the further accusation I am about to read is one from which the Commission should be protected by the Government, because it is a very serious one indeed—

New fiscal questions will arise doubtless in all the States—questions affecting the encouragement of sugar and cotton, hemp, flax, fibre, essences, and the like. But they are not questions which need a Tariff Commission for their settlement.

We all agree with that.

And it is almost literally true to say that in Victoria alone are there any extensive injuries to industry from the Tariff. And yet the Chairman of the Tariff Commission would have us believe that there can be no recommendations in relief of the ruined industries of this State until there has been an exhaustive inquiry into all kinds of irrelevant matters in all the other States. It is this bad faith on the part of the Commission towards Victoria which excites the indignation of those who are so sorely suffering.

The members of the Commission as a body are accused of bad faith to Victoria. Much as I have always disagreed with the policy of Victoria, much as I have believed that it has been a mistaken one in the interests of the people, still I have always been prepared, as I still am, to give not only Victoria, but every other State, full, fair and honest consideration in this inquiry. I, as a Commissioner, object to be accused of acting in bad faith to Victoria or any other part of the Commonwealth. When we are accused of acting in this way, I, as a Commissioner, call upon the Prime Minister to find out from its Chairman the circumstances under which the Commission has been conducted. In this article, we are accused of neglecting to inquire into the industries of Victoria, and it is pointed out that irrelevant evidence has been taken in other States. I want the Prime Minister to inquire from the Chairman what were the circumstances under which the Commission left Melbourne in the first instance. The members of the Commission removed, first, from Melbourne to Sydney; secondly, from Sydney to Brisbane; then from Melbourne to Tasmania; and now some of them are on their way to Western Australia, whence it is proposed that they should go to South Australia, and next to Melbourne. We all know that it was in Melbourne where the whole trouble was supposed to exist. It was, I take it, the real or supposed stagnation of the metal and machinery business which caused the Commission to be appointed. Yet this industry, which was supposed to be the one, above all others, which needed inquiring into, has never been touched by the Commission at all. In justice to myself and other members of the Commission, I wish the Minister to ascertain from the Chairman the views which were expressed by the members in connexion with the scene of inquiry, in the first instance, from Melbourne. I do not want to sit on the Commission and to be accused of bad faith to Victoria, or any other State. When such accusations, as contained in this article, are made against members of the Commission, it is to the Prime Minister, I take it, in the name of its members, to take steps to set the truth. From what is pointed out in this article, one would think that no other part of the Commonwealth except Victoria was entitled to consideration; for it is pointed out that in no other part of the Commonwealth have industries been wrecked. But if it is true, as it is, that the people outside of Melbourne and Sydney are entitled to consideration in this inquiry. Surely we are not entitled to consider only the industries in the other States? Surely we ought to give consideration to the men who are engaged in mining, agricultural, pastoral, and other pursuits—an opportunity of giving evidence before the Commission, and giving evidence in support of or rebuttal of the charges which has been made out for certain States? I think that every opportunity ought to be afforded to these States to give what evidence they think fit. One case, which was brought before the Tariff Commission, is illustrative of others. This is a case in which it is stated that the American combine, having copied an Australian invention, is now engaged in the business of strangling the business of local producers by means of a vast capital, and limited powers of production. In connexion with this matter, I am not revealing anything of a confidential character. Yet it is true that an application was made to the Chairman of the Tariff Commission to give the farmers of Victoria an opportunity of giving evidence at the Show Week of giving evidence. It is most important that all people concerned should have a full opportunity of giving their case to the Tariff Commission. I regret having to call attention to this in a paper article, but I felt that I must do so, in justice to the members of the Commission, in order to protect them from slanders of this sort. It is absolutely true that the Tariff Commission is ing time in connexion with the taking evidence with the object of preventing presentation of a report during the life of this Parliament. Every member of the Tariff Commission has sacrificed his time and done his utmost to expedite the business.

But the matters to be dealt with are of great moment, and the results of the report of the Commission will be of a far-reaching character. It is our duty, therefore, to inquire into all the facts, and probe to the very bottom, in order to ascertain the absolute truth. Such a work necessarily means the occupation of a large amount of time, and it is absolutely impossible with any fairness to complete the inquiry. I again ask the Minister, in justice to the Commission, to have a report from the chairman stating the circumstances under which the Commission left Melbourne. I should also like it to be shown that there is no evidence of any bad faith on the part of the Commission in connexion with Victoria. Such a report as I have suggested is necessary to prove the allegation in the newspaper article—to disprove, further, the statement that scandalous delays have taken place in connexion with the proceedings of the Commission. I trust that the Prime Minister will be able to regard this matter from the point of view that I, myself, do. A Tariff Commission of this character is entitled to protection from outrageous statements, such as I have quoted. The newspaper article, referring to matters outside the Tariff Commission, goes on to say that, "as the effects of the Tariff are considered, it is the Victorian industries on which it has worked havoc. I have here a report prepared at the instance of the late Treasurer, the honorable and learned member for Balaclava."

Mr. PAGE.—Havoc has been worked in the sugar factories in Queensland.

Mr. FULLER.—The increased production in Victoria has worked havoc, so far as the revenues of Queensland and Tasmania are concerned. The report to which I refer, shows the effects of the uniform Tariff on trade and manufactures, and the results have been compiled by the collectors of Customs in the various States. The present Minister of Trade and Customs appeared on the floor of the House that this statement was of such importance that it ought to be printed and circulated. I sincerely trust that the report will be printed and so circulated that every person in the Commonwealth may be able to realize that the Victorian manufacturers, and the people of that State generally, have no reason to be dissatisfied with Federation—that, on the contrary, beyond every State on the continent, Victoria has reason to be satisfied, from the point of view of increase of trade and employment.

Mr. RONALD.—Up to the present there has been no protection afforded in Victoria under Federation.

Mr. FULLER.—I know that the Commonwealth Tariff is low, compared with the high protectionist Tariff operating in Victoria in years gone by. Although Victorian industries may have been established, and may have been successful under the old State Tariff, no one engaged in manufacture in Victoria now has reason to be dissatisfied with the results of the Federal Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS.—Is that not rather prejudging the result of the Tariff Commission's inquiry?

Mr. FULLER.—I do not think that what I am now saying has anything to do with the Tariff Commission.

Mr. MAUGER.—What return is it to which the honorable member is referring?

Mr. FULLER.—It is a return which was laid on the table at the instance of the honorable member for Kooyong, by the present Minister of Customs, although it had been compiled at the request of the late Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balaclava. I should be pleased if the honorable member for Melbourne Ports would peruse the report, because I am sure he would thereby receive an "eye-opener" as regards the effect of the Commonwealth Tariff on Victorian industries. Too great publicity cannot be given to this document, and I trust that, in accord with the promise of the present Minister of Trade and Customs, it will be printed and circulated, so that the public generally may be informed as to the results of the uniform Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS.—The sooner we get the report of the Tariff Commission, the sooner we shall have the information in proper form.

Mr. FULLER.—I do not know that it is the duty of the Tariff Commission to compile Inter-State returns of this character. So far as I understand, I, as a member of the Tariff Commission, am commissioned to inquire into the effect of the Tariff on Australian industries generally; and I think I am now perfectly justified in referring to a return laid on the table of the House. In connexion with the transfer of Australian goods between State and State, I desire to draw attention to a comparison between the year 1899, prior to the establishment of Federation, and the years 1903 and 1904. My object is to show the difference between the export of Australian-made goods from Victoria to the other States in the year prior to Federation, and the export in the two years which I have mentioned.

Mr. MAUGER.—But it will be necessary for the honorable and learned member to show how much of her own trade Victoria has lost.

Mr. FULLER. — I wish to show that, as the outcome of the uniform Tariff and Inter-State free-trade, the people of Victoria have benefited so largely that, instead of being the first to complain of the effects of the Tariff they should really be the last. Local manufacturers ought to be amply satisfied with the results shown in the return to which I refer, for it shows that Victoria has established a great trade with the other States. I do not wish to refer to the return to any greater extent than is necessary to give point to my argument in opposition to the statement made by the Age as to the effect of the Tariff on Victorian industries. The first item that I have selected from this return, which shows the exports of Australian-made goods from Victoria to the other States, is that of "Apparel and articles n.e.i." The value of these articles exported from Victoria to the other States in 1899 was £119,929; but in 1903—two years after Federation—it was £336,776, while in 1904, the export of these goods from Victoria to other States had increased in value to £382,383. These figures show that the establishment of Federation has resulted in Victoria securing an increased trade with the other States, so far as these articles are concerned.

Mr. KENNEDY.—In the return to which the honorable and learned member refers, are the goods of local manufacture distinguished from those of foreign?

Mr. FULLER.—Yes; the return makes a distinction between exports of local goods and of oversea imports. One or two of the items relating to the export of oversea imports show that Melbourne—which in this matter represents Victoria—has become a larger distributing centre for Australia than she was prior to the establishment of Federation. I am not in a position to say whether this remark will apply generally to the articles enumerated; but it will be open to honorable members to examine the return for themselves. I am dealing with the exports of Australian-made goods from Victoria to the other States. I come now to the item, "Arms and cartridges," the value of the exports of which from Victoria to other States in 1903 was £29,306 in excess of that for 1899, while the exports for 1904 show an increase of £19,865 over those for 1903.

Mr. MAUGER.—What proportion of those goods was supplied to the order of the Government?

Mr. FULLER.—I cannot say. To my mind it is immaterial whether the goods were sent out to the order of the Government or of private individuals.

Mr. MAUGER.—The point is that, as the industry is practically a national one, the Government have sought to help it by giving orders for supplies for other States. They would have given those orders quite irrespective of the Tariff.

Mr. FULLER.—I am quite willing to give the honorable member the benefit of the doubt. There are many other articles in support of my contention. Take, for instance, the boot and shoe industry, of which we have heard very frequently in this House.

Mr. MAUGER. — No one has ever mentioned the boot and shoe industry as a strangled one.

Mr. FULLER.—I should like to know how we are to determine whether or not an industry has been strangled until we have the evidence before us. In this matter are we to accept the statements of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, the honorable member for Southern Melbourne, or even those of the Age newspaper? I think not. We cannot be expected to accept the statements of representatives of fiscal associations, or of newspapers supporting a particular policy.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member has pronounced judgment, or very nearly so, to-day, on the results of the Tariff.

Mr. FULLER.—I have expressed no judgment in the matter.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member's speech will read very like it.

FULLER.—I have simply requested the Prime Minister to make inquiries as to the accusations made against the Tariff Commission. When the Commission is attacked as it has been by the article in this morning's issue of the Age, it is surely my duty to see that steps are taken to defend the Commission against charges which, in my opinion, are absolutely without foundation. They should be made against it. I have the figures relating to the exportation of Australian-made blankets from Victoria to other States of the Commonwealth. The value of these exports in 1903 was £170 in excess of those for 1899.

HUME COOK.—What was the deficit in tweeds?

FULLER.—So far I have merely asked indiscriminately certain items that are at my contention, but if the Committee say that I shall be prepared to read the returns, although it is a very extensive task, I am sure that honorable members will agree that such articles as apparel, shoes, and blankets relate to very important industries in Victoria.

HUME COOK.—Blankets are the only class of woollen goods the output of which has increased under the Commonwealth.

FULLER.—The honorable member will be correct, and I shall be glad if he is able to prove from these tables that he is. Honorable members opposite, however, will find it difficult to disprove the figures which appear in the returns from which I have derived them.

MAUGER.—There is no necessity to dispute them.

ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member is anticipating his decision on the question of the Tariff.

FULLER.—I am not referring to the Tariff Commission in any shape or form.

I am referring to returns supplied by the Customs Department, at the instance of the late Treasurer. The honorable and learned gentleman cannot show me how they affect the decision of the Tariff Commission.

ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member is pronouncing judgment now.

FULLER.—I am not anticipating judgment of the Tariff Commission in any way. I am referring to these returns now that certain Victorian industries have not been injured as the result of the operation of the present Tariff.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable and learned member is making use of his knowledge as a member of the Tariff Commission, to prejudice the case.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member is making an absolutely untrue accusation against me.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member must withdraw that statement.

Mr. FULLER.—I withdraw the statement, but I say that the accusation is absolutely incorrect, and I suppose that is as far as I shall be allowed to go. It is very unfair of the honorable member to say that I am making use of my knowledge as a member of the Tariff Commission in making these statements.

Mr. RONALD.—“To prejudice the case,” is what I said.

Mr. FULLER.—I am not endeavouring to prejudice the case before the Tariff Commission. I have not expressed any judgment on it. I am directing the attention of the Committee to the results of the operation of the Tariff in connexion with the exportation of goods manufactured in Victoria to other States of the Commonwealth.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable and learned member is making an ex parte statement.

Mr. FULLER.—I am making no ex parte statement. I am referring members of the Committee to a compilation of figures prepared at the instance of the late Treasurer, and signed by the Collectors of Customs of the various States.

Mr. RONALD.—I do not refer to the figures, but to the deductions which the honorable and learned member has made.

Mr. FULLER.—I have made no deductions. I have merely quoted figures dealing with the exports of Victorian manufactures to the various States. I can appeal to the Committee to say that I have not gone beyond that in what I have said in connexion with this matter.

Mr. MAUGER.—But, on the basis of those figures, the honorable and learned member has said that Victorian industries are infinitely prosperous.

Mr. FULLER.—I never used that expression.

Mr. MAUGER.—Well, exceedingly prosperous, or very prosperous.

Mr. FULLER.—I deny that I have used any such expression. What I have said is that, judging by these returns, Victorian manufacturers have no reason to be dissatisfied with the results of the application of a uniform Tariff to Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is the same thing in other words.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member may say so if he pleases, but I object to his putting into my mouth words which I did not use. I take another industry, that of the manufacture of hats and caps. The increase in the value of the exports of this industry in 1903 as compared with 1899 amounts to £31,667, and in 1904 the increase on the figures for 1903 is £4,260. In hats and caps other than felt, I find that the increase in 1903 as compared with the figures for 1899 is £30,541; and the increase in 1904 over 1903 is £3,781. These figures show that this industry in Victoria has not been ruined, or is not in a state of stagnation, as the result of the operation of the uniform Tariff.

Mr. MAUGER.—They prove nothing to the contrary.

Mr. FULLER.—The figures prove that the exports of Victorian manufactures have very largely increased.

Mr. MAUGER.—They do not prove that the imports into Victoria have not also increased.

Mr. FULLER.—I have made no reference to that aspect of the question. When I sit down the honorable member for Melbourne Ports can have the use of these tables, which are the property of honorable members, and he can make what reference he pleases to the figures dealing with oversea imports into Victoria, if he thinks that any such references will affect the position I have been endeavouring to put to the Committee. I take another industry, under the heading of "Implements, machinery, &c.," and I find that the increase in 1903 as compared with the figures for 1899 was £76,207, and the figures for 1904 were £83,666. Those figures clearly show that Victorian manufacturers engaged in this particular industry have made good use—and I commend them for doing so—of the opportunities given them under Federation to get into the markets of other States of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—What does this go to show?

Mr. FULLER.—That since the establishment of Federation the exports of Victorian manufactures into the other States of the Commonwealth have very largely increased.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think the honorable learned member should keep an open mind on the question.

Mr. FULLER.—I have an open mind on the question, but it is surely the interests of everybody that they should know the actual figures which are upon the matter. I desire that these figures shall be put before the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member desires that the verdict shall be given before all the evidence has been heard.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire nothing of the sort.

Mr. MAUGER.—We want a verdict.

Mr. FULLER.—Honorable member, I will, so far as I am concerned, give a verdict as quickly as it can be given to them. I do not propose to attend any proceedings of the Tariff Commission, but I can assure honorable members that the members of the Commission desire to submit their report as quickly as possible, consistently with a proper inquiry into the important matters submitted to them. The Attorney-General asks me to attend, but I intend to prove by these figures that my opinion is correct. I can make a further statement of evidence which will show that, so far as the industries to which I refer are concerned, they are not in the condition which the newspaper article to which I am referring would have people believe. The present is a very opportune time for the appearance of such an article, and I know that the city of Melbourne is full of country people. This article should not be put before them without any qualification, and it is only right that the facts which I am quoting should be made known so that people may have an opportunity of understanding what is the real state of affairs.

Mr. ISAACS.—That article would be read throughout Victoria, whether the people were gathered together in Melbourne or not.

Mr. FULLER.—Unfortunately it is not I think it is not in the interests of the Commonwealth that it should be read without contradiction. In 1904 compared with 1899, there was an increase of £76,207 in the value of agricultural implements and machinery exported from Victoria to the other States, whilst in 1904 the increase amounted to £83,666. Piece-goods and showed an increase of £42,222 in 1904. I wish to draw attention to further statistics which have been compiled by the Government of Victoria, and published in the "Returns of the State for 1904." These figures summarize the manufacturing returns of the State for 1904. They show that the number of factories in that year was 4,208, an increase of fifty-seven over the previous year. The number of hands employed was 55,485 males, an increase of 1,120; and 3,492 females, an increase of 1,938. The wages paid to these operatives amounted to £4,794,365, an increase over the previous year of £220,570. The value of machinery, plant, land, and buildings occupied for manufacturing purposes was £13,668,185, as against £9,788,841 in the previous year. It is pointed out that comparisons with years prior to 1903 cannot be made on account of the new classification adopted by the statistician. I have also a statement showing the number of hands employed, and wages paid in a number of the principal manufacturing industries during 1903 and 1904, to which I desire to direct special attention. In the soap and candle industry, to which special reference has been made, 4,485 hands were employed in 1903, and 4,492 in 1904, or an increase of seven hands. The cement industry showed an increase from 115 to 154 hands. The wire and asbestos industry is one of the five mentioned in a long list which shows a decrease, the number of hands employed in 1903 being 683, and in 1904, 678. The glass-bevelling industry shows an increase from 164 to 171 hands. I propose to mention only a few of the principal industries. The agricultural implement industry shows an increase in the number of hands employed from 1,114 in 1903 to 1,496 in 1904, an addition of 382. The engineering, boiler-making, and iron works employed 4,614 hands in 1903, and 4,676 in 1904. The number of men employed in the sheet-iron and tin industry increased from 788 to 877. The confectionery industry showed an increase from 1,276 to 1,338; the woollen mills, an increase from 1,138 to 1,231; the hat and boot industry, an increase from 1,129 to 1,202; and the boot and shoe industry, an increase from 5,267 to 5,655. In the rest of this list, only five industries, namely, brush and broom, cabinet-making, billiard tables, jams, pickles and sauce, wire, and glass and asbestos show a decrease. The most striking increase is exhibited by the agricultural implement industry, in which there was an increase of 382 in the number of hands employed, and of £51,438 in the wages paid. Honorable members must draw their own conclusions from these figures, which I take this opportunity of placing before them and the country, in order that some conception may be formed of the condition of Victorian industries. There is one other matter to which I desire to refer, namely, the question of increasing our population. No doubt, one of the greatest necessities of Australia at the present time is population. Want of population is a very serious matter in many ways, more particularly in connexion with our necessities for defence. We occupy a country of great extent, having a coast-line extending over 8,000 miles, whilst our population amounts to only 4,000,000. Judging from recent developments in connexion with the various nations of the world, it is clear that the first thing we should do is to look to the defence of the great heritage upon which we have entered. It will be of no use for us to make laws for the establishment of a White Australia and other purposes if we are not in a position to retain this land for ourselves, and to see that such laws are properly enforced. In this connexion, we should all hail with delight the introduction amongst us of the proper class of settlers from the mother country, to which we owe the position we occupy at the present time, and to which we are indebted for our safety from attack. Unfortunately, however, our Immigration Restriction Act has been administered in such a way that a serious stigma now attaches to the Commonwealth, so far as the people of Great Britain are concerned. Recently, a case arose in connexion with a groom who came out here in charge of some horses, and who was informed by the shipping company that he could not land. He was, however, provided with a certificate from the Acting Agent-General of New South Wales, Mr. Coghlan. Upon this matter being made public in the newspapers, the deputy-leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister whether the facts were as reported in the press. In reply, the Prime Minister said—

The report is likely to be correct, because one of the first communications which I received upon entering upon the administration of the Department of External Affairs last month was a letter from the Acting Agent-General for New South Wales, asking for authority to issue that permit. He was at once informed, by my direction, that no certificate of the kind was necessary.

Later on, the honorable and learned member for Wannon asked the honorable and learned gentleman—

Whether he is correctly reported by the press to have said upon Friday last that Britishers coming to Australia under contract do not require exemption certificates.

In reply, the Prime Minister said—

I did not say that they do not require exemption certificates.

It will thus be seen that the Prime Minister denied the statement which he had previously made in answer to a question put by the deputy-leader of the Opposition. The honorable and learned member for Wannon then interjected—

The honorable and learned gentleman is reported to have made that statement.

In reply, the Prime Minister said—

What I was alluding to was this: that exemption certificates are not generally used in connexion with British subjects.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is to say, exemption certificates are not used in connexion with the contract provision at all, and when the Agents-General were asked to issue those certificates, they were informed that it was not intended they should be issued in the case of British subjects.

Mr. FULLER.—In the first instance the Prime Minister affirmed that exemption certificates were not necessary, then he denied that he had made the statement, and finally he admitted that they were necessary but were not generally used.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Only by a very technical legal interpretation can it be urged that the groom to whom the honorable member has referred was under contract to perform manual labour in Australia.

Mr. FULLER.—I would point out that this embargo is not necessary.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is the exemption certificates which are not necessary.

Mr. FULLER.—Those certificates constitute an unnecessary embargo, and consequently should be at once dispensed with. We should extend to persons coming from the old country the fullest opportunity to become part of our population. I am glad to notice that the leader of the Labour Party has definitely declared himself in favour of amending the contract in the Immigration Restriction

Act. I also learn by this morning's papers that the honorable and member for West Sydney has made the following statement in regard to the provision:—

I have no personal objection to an Act confining the operation of the provisions where it is intended to meet instances where it is intended to meet of persons brought here during a strike of the places of other workers. In some of the Department has administered the Act and against the intention of the framers of the measure.

I think that the people of Australia to a man would hail with delight the removal of the restriction to which it is indeed a good sign that the of the Labour Party and one of his lieutenants are in favour of amending the restrictive section of the Act so as to be similar cases to that which I have mentioned. It is only fair that we should extend to the people of Great Britain from whom we have sprung, every opportunity to the freest intercourse with us. I am sure that none of us desire that in time of industrial disputes, men shall be permitted to land here under contract, and to receive less wages than those which are paid to the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Are not such cases illegal?

Mr. FULLER.—They are supposed to be illegal, but we know that they are not. Everybody will welcome the amendment of the Immigration Restriction Act in the direction that I have indicated, so that workmen from Great Britain and other parts of the Empire may be allowed to enter Australia with freedom. Now, the honorable member for Bland, and the honorable and learned member for Sydney have spoken in regard to the matter, it seems to me that the Prime Minister—who is dependent on their support for his position on the Treasury bench—must take action.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Do not put it that way.

Mr. FULLER.—I will put it in that way. In view of the Treasurer's evasions regarding caucus rule and the Government which—as a member of a previous administration—he had to submit to the censure of the Labour Party, I am sure that he should have joined a Government which owes its very existence to the support of the men whom he so strongly denounced. I should have imagined that both he and the Prime Minister—their statements, both here and elsewhere—would have been the last to accept under such conditions. But now the honorable member for Bland and the honorable and learned member for Sydney have given the Prime Minister permission to amend the Immigration Restriction Act in the direction indicated, I am sure that he will seize the opportunity to remove a stigma from our statute-book.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—I do not detain the Committee very long, but for the remarks of the honorable member for Illawarra, I should have spoken at all. However, seeing he has thought it wise to enter on a subject of the Tariff Commission, I feel obliged to say a few words.

Mr. FULLER.—The way in which the Commission has been attacked is disgraceful.

Mr. MAUGER.—It seems to me that the honorable and learned member has made the mistake of showing plainly—though the inquiry is incomplete—that he has arrived at the conclusion that Victorian industries are not suffering in any way. In this connexion he has cited such industries as the manufacture of boots and shoes, and cartridges, apparel, blankets and tents, and hats and caps. It is a very remarkable circumstance that his selection is limited to the very industries which require a reasonable measure of protection. In the request was made that a Commission should be appointed to investigate the working of the Tariff, it was never intended that the inquiry should extend to the whole of the items which it contains.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member has not stated the terms of the Commission?

Mr. MAUGER.—I say that when the Commission was asked for, it was never contemplated that it should investigate the working of the Tariff in regard to the whole of the items which it contains. The honorable and learned member will recollect—he can see it in Hansard—that, time after time, I urged that if the Commission were set up into the effect of the Tariff on the whole of the items which it embraces, years would elapse before we could hope to obtain a complete report. I pointed out that the Tucker Commission and the Mirams Commission each occupied three or four years in dealing with the Victorian Tariff.

Mr. FULLER.—Did the honorable member object to the terms of this Commission as issued?

Mr. MAUGER.—Most decidedly I did, and I urged on the Treasurer and the Minister of Defence, who were sitting at the table when I was speaking, that if Parliament had to wait for a report until the whole Tariff had been inquired into, disaster must result to several industries. We knew that, while from our point of view even apparel and slops were not sufficiently protected, they were better protected than the industries affected by the 12½ per cent. duty on machinery and manufactures of metals, and it was regarding the effect of the Tariff on the trades which we knew were in a bad way, and likely to be strangled, that we wished inquiries to be made. While I admit that the Inter-State trade of Victoria has grown, it is a remarkable thing that last year the value of boots and shoes imported into the Commonwealth was £446,000, and the value of hats so imported £338,000. Yet the honorable member for Denison said last night that the importations had practically ceased, as the result of the Tariff. If that be so, I would like to know what he would call an increase. The Tariff Commission has been blamed, not for the work which it is doing, but because it has not taken into consideration first the industries which are suffering most, and reported on them before dealing with matters of less urgency. It was appointed for that purpose. A general inquiry was not asked for, nor was the Commission appointed to make such an inquiry.

Mr. FULLER. — The honorable member should read the terms of the Commission.

Mr. MAUGER.—I had nothing to do with the framing of the terms of the instrument, though I had a great deal to do with the appointment of the Commission.

Mr. FULLER.—Must not the Commissioners act on the terms of the Commission?

Mr. MAUGER.—They should have been guided by the views expressed in the debates in this House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—By the protectionists?

Mr. MAUGER.—It was urged, first by me, and then by the honorable and learned member for Indi, that a number of industries—notably those connected with the iron trade, several branches of the woollen trade, and the distilling industry—were suffering acutely as the result of the Tariff. We mentioned a dozen industries which were being strangled, and in regard to which we wished the Reid Government to have an investigation made.

Mr. FULLER.—The effect of the Tariff on the distilling industry has been inquired into.

Mr. MAUGER.—But the effect of the Tariff on the iron industry—which is infinitely more important, since it employs men rather than women, and is capable of affording work to thousands more than are now employed—has hardly been touched.

Mr. FULLER.—I object to it being said against me that I, as a member of the Commission, have acted in bad faith in respect to these trades; but that is what is said in the Age.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am not responsible for the statement to which the honorable and learned member refers; but there is a strong feeling among the artisans and people of Victoria that they are not being fairly dealt with.

Mr. FULLER.—I am not responsible for that. I have specially asked the Prime Minister to get a report from the Chairman.

Mr. MAUGER.—Men connected with the engineering and iron trades are now out in the streets looking for work. Victoria was essentially the manufacturing State of the union, and had most to lose by the reduction of duties.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Things are very bad all over Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—They will continue to be bad until we have something like adequate protection for our industries, and put an end to these enormous importations.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What we require is stable government.

Mr. MAUGER.—Honorable members speak of people leaving the country; but the best way to attract population is to enable our people to manufacture the millions of pounds' worth of goods which are now imported. If we find employment for those who are here, we shall soon attract others. I am aware that the Tariff Commission has done an immense amount of work; but their manner of procedure is not what it should have been, so that the outlook is now anything but encouraging, and the feeling of the community, so far as I know it, is expressed in the article which the honorable and learned member for Illawarra has read. He spoke about the importation of arms and cartridges from Victoria to other States; but he must know that these arms and cartridges are manufactured in a semi-Government institution—an establishment with which, first, the State Government, and now the Federal Government, have had large contracts. These contracts have been increased to provide supplies for the other States; that fact is no evidence of a general increase of trade to the other States.

Mr. FULLER.—I said that I would ask the honorable member a present of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. MAUGER.—Unless it can be shown that the Victorian manufacturers of boots and shoes have not only increased their Inter-State trade, but have not lost their State or home trade, there is no force in the argument that they are not suffering under the Tariff. I admit that the Victorian State trade has increased immensely for that increase of business the Victorian manufacturers would have had to contend with.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—In boots and shoes the home trade has also increased.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable and learned member for Illawarra, taking the Victorian statistics, said that the number of men employed now showed an increase over last year. But that year was a very bad one, practically the worst we have had in our commercial life. What we must regard to is the number of men now employed, and the volume of importations. If half of the goods which are now imported were manufactured locally, it would largely decrease the number of people out of work. The honorable and learned member referred to the making of blankets and flannels; but the value of the importations of woollen piece goods has increased by thousands of pounds, and not one wool factory is paying anything like reasonable interest. As a matter of fact, the importations into Victoria, and into Australia, have increased. Does the Treasurer anticipate a falling off in the revenue from duties on apparel and attire? If the duties on manufacture were increasing the Treasurer would not anticipate more revenue from those items in 1905-6, both for Victoria and for New South Wales, than was obtained in 1902-3. His estimate shows that he does not anticipate that the importations will decrease. That is a plain indication that the Tariff is not effective. The importations are likely to increase, and the number of unemployed will increase correspondingly. I sincerely hope that the honorable member for Illawarra will do his best to secure an immediate inquiry into tion of those industries that have been seriously affected, and will lend his aid to have a progress report submitted to Parliament at the earliest moment. I am going to blame him. But I do say complaints as to the condition of the trade come not only from Victoria, but from South Australia, and his own. I feel confident that he will be giving a splendid service to this country if he uses his best efforts to secure an early full inquiry into the condition of that trade especially. I quite agree with my honorable friend, that if the inquiry is to be complete, every State must be visited. The Commission visit every State half-dozen times if it thinks it necessary to do so. But let the inquiry be first concluded as to the principal industries that are suffering; and whilst Parliament is considering the report, the Commission can continue its work. Before I sit down, I wish to make one or two remarks as to some observations which have been made from the honorable member for Hunter. I have launched a tirade of criticism—I will say abuse—as to the physical condition of the occupants of the back-blocks of this country.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some of them.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member said, if I remember rightly—he will correct me if I am mistaken—that there has been a general physical deterioration.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He said they were a race of degenerates.

Mr. MAUGER.—He attributed the deterioration to the mixing of races. I think that is right.

Mr. LIDDELL.—No, it is not.

Mr. MAUGER.—Well, he spoke of it being the result of inter-marriage, and that is pretty much the same. I shall leave it to the honorable member for Moira to denounce the country residents of Victoria from the charge of physical deterioration. The point to which I particularly wish to allude is that which the honorable member made about what he called the factory towns, in which he said the workers were living the life crushed out of them.

Mr. LIDDELL.—So they are.

Mr. MAUGER.—Where are these towns? Has the honorable member ever visited a Victorian factory? Has he been inside a single one of them? He could not have made such a statement had he visited any one of the boot, clothing, or hat factories of this State. I shall have much pleasure in taking him round to look at them if he will accompany me. I assure the honorable member that he makes the greatest possible mistake if he imagines that there is any sign of deterioration as a consequence of our factory life in Victoria.

Mr. KELLY.—I think we ought to have a quorum present. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. MAUGER.—I maintain that for ventilation and cleanliness, and for general healthiness of environment, due largely to the operation of the present splendid Factories Act of this State, there is not a factory to which the slightest objection can be taken. I am sure that the young men and women in our factories will, either from the physical or mental point of view, bear comparison with similar workers in any part of the world.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member did not allude to the Victorian people, but to the bush-whackers.

Mr. MAUGER.—He first made a tirade against the back-blockers, and then said there was a number of boys and girls who were suffering deterioration physically, and were being contaminated by the evil surroundings of factory life.

Mr. PAGE.—He was speaking of the streets of Sydney.

Mr. MAUGER.—He did not say a word about Sydney; though New South Wales has been free-trade for so long that perhaps signs of deterioration may be apparent there. I am talking of the Victorian factories system, of which I know something, and I say that it is a credit to the factory-owners, to our legislation, and to the people employed. If the number of our factories were vastly extended, and we manufactured the whole of the goods that are at present imported, it would be far better for Australia in every way. In conclusion, I say again that I sincerely hope that my honorable friend the member for Illawarra will lend his influence to obtain a report from the Tariff Commission as speedily as possible, because the need is urgent and great.

Mr. HARPER (Mernda).—I propose to say a few words, not so much with regard to the Budget submitted by the Treasurer, as concerning a few general questions connected with the finances of the Commonwealth in which I have taken an interest. Before doing so, I should like to bear out what has been said by my honorable friend who has just spoken about the factories in Victoria. There can be no question about it, so far as my knowledge goes—and I claim that it is considerable—that, speaking generally, the factories of Victoria are second to none anywhere in respect of sanitary and other arrangements. It is a remarkable thing, and within my own knowledge, that young men and women coming into these factories, after a few months, show a marked improvement in health and general condition. Only those who are ignorant of such facts would doubt this. To come to the matters with which I desire to deal, I propose to refer to the difficulties that have arisen in respect to the financial sections of the Constitution. On looking back to the history of the Conventions which formulated our Constitution, I think there can be no doubt that, notwithstanding the great ability shown in drafting its main features, there was an exception in connexion with the financial clauses. Many critics at the time felt profoundly dissatisfied with the manner in which the financial arrangements necessary under the Constitution were settled. The reason why the settlement was unsatisfactory was that the problem with which the Convention had to deal was a difficult and complicated one, and the data upon which its members could form opinions as to the future requirements of the Commonwealth was of so varied and inconclusive a character that it was almost impossible for the Convention to deal satisfactorily with this part of the Federal arrangement. It was unfortunate that it was so, because there can be no question that those who strongly advocated the Federation of the States looked primarily to seeing that savings were made in the cost of government. They looked forward to an amalgamation of the debts so as to enable the borrowers—that is the States—to have the rate of interest on their loans reduced as speedily as possible by acting in concert with and through the Commonwealth. These anticipations formed no inconsiderable portion of the inducement to the States to give up their individuality, to become one great Commonwealth, and intrust their fortunes to a central Parliament. When we, who were elected to deal with these questions, come to face the position, it is found that nearly all the arrangements which were made to enable satisfactory conclusions to be reached have created difficulties which up to the present time no one has been able to. We know that at the Conferences of Ministers, held this year and last, the question was threshed out at very length; but I apprehend that we are much nearer a settlement than we were before those meetings took place. I read with some care the debates on the question of the States debts at the Conference. What struck me most was the fact that, apparently, the State Ministers and Treasurers had scarcely grasped the nature of the problem they had to deal with. They went to the Conference with the full conviction that it was their duty, above everything, to protect themselves against the Commonwealth, and against supposed inroads which it was likely to make on their revenues. It is most fortunate that this feeling of jealous antagonism should be exhibited by occupying leading positions in the States. We ought to remember that, although in our wisdom, or as some people may consider our un-wisdom, we determined to form the Commonwealth, whether sitting in the Parliament of the Commonwealth or in that of a State, all servants of the public of Australia whose interests they represent jointly and severally. That idea seems to be lost of on many occasions when these questions are discussed. The people decide on certain clear and well-defined duties which are cast upon the Commonwealth. Some duties were removed from the States and vested in the Commonwealth alone. The residuum of obligations, duties, and privileges enjoyed by the States were still in their hands without possibility of interference by the Commonwealth. The duty of Governments and Parliaments of the States was to fully protect the interests of their people. The obligation resting upon them was no greater than is that of the members of this Parliament, to carefully protect and maintain the interests which were given in trust to us. If that idea be allowed to fall out of the minds of those who seek to approach the financial questions, with regard to the interests of the Commonwealth and the States are so closely bound up—if that of separate responsibility be not lost sight of—I apprehend that we should be much more likely to reach a reasonable solution of the knotty problems involved. I think I ought, in passing, to allude to the unfortunate habit which some members of the States Parliaments ments—and, I am sorry to say, even members of this House—indulge in continually rating the Commonwealth Government and Parliament for great extravagance. As the right honorable member for Balacava has so often pointed out, Parliament cannot be accused of any like extravagance—in fact, its course is marked rather by penuriousness and too much liberality. We find that in the States whose revenues have increased, notably Tasmania and Queensland, public men have attributed their misfortune, as they consider them, entirely to Federation. In nearly every case, these men have been absolutely without opinion. This Parliament, as representing the people of Australia, has thought fit to impose certain duties, and to repeal others, as, for instance, the duties on tea and opium.

CAMERON.—What about sugar?

HARPER.—I am not dealing with CAMERON.—The honorable member must as well deal with it first as last.

HARPER.—If the honorable member only had patience to listen to my argument, he would have found that I did not bring in the question of the duty on sugar, for the simple reason that I am not dealing with duties which were taken off, but with duties which have been put on.

CAMERON.—The remission of Customs duties and the sugar bonus have increased the revenue of Tasmania.

HARPER.—Tasmania had, I think, a heavier duty on tea than any of the States. This Parliament removed the duty, and, consequently, the revenue of the State suffered to that extent; but of course its people have not had to pay the duty. That is a form of objection to the Federation and its Government which, I think, is almost childish in its futility, because it can be easily shown that it was possible to make a Tariff which would be very State alike, and some States might be able to get the effects of its operation more than others.

CAMERON.—The duty on tea was increased by one vote.

HARPER.—As my honorable member is very insistent about the wrongs of Tasmania, I shall give him a Tasmanian example, to show the want of justification for the duty, at least, of these charges against the Commonwealth. At the Hobart Conference Mr. Evans, the Premier of Tasmania, made the following remarks:—

Sir George Turner said wild statements have been made as regards extravagant expenditure. I will name a few items of extravagant and wasteful expenditure. Take, for instance, the first expenditure on transferred Departments; I am of opinion there has been extravagance displayed there. In Tasmania alone it has increased since Federation to something like £72,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Your own estimates were £140,000, and we expended less than £134,000.

Mr. EVANS.—That £134,000 was not on the transferred Departments.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes it was.

Mr. EVANS.—It does not matter very much whether it was the Commonwealth or the State Parliaments that increased the expenditure—it was owing to Federation.

The Treasurer of Tasmania, Mr. Stewart, when speaking on the same subject, said—

The expenditure on the transferred Departments has largely increased, but it must, in justice to the Federal Treasurer, be pointed out that £22,000 was added to the expenditure of this State by one of my predecessors in office prior to the Departments being transferred, for which the Federal Parliament were in no way responsible. By some process of reasoning, which I am unable to understand, my predecessor seemed to think that a fund existed out of which this additional outlay could be met without affecting the revenue of this State, whereas a little reflection should have convinced him that it would simply be deducted out of the surplus returnable to Tasmania.

A good many people connected with other States Parliaments and Governments made the same mistake—"hence these tears." Those gentlemen omitted to point out that they, in many cases, had themselves created the so-called extravagance with which they charge the Commonwealth, by increasing their expenditure prior to Federation, in the full expectation that the Commonwealth would take the whole burden on its own shoulders.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable member is quite wrong in that.

Mr. HARPER.—I may be wrong, of course, but I am quoting an official report.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member for Mernda is quite right, though Tasmanian representatives will not admit the fact.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What about building the big post-office in Hobart?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The Treasurer of Queensland has made a worse statement than that of the Premier of Tasmania.

Mr. HARPER.—The Premier of Tasmania the other day broke out again with an equally extravagant, or even more extravagant, statement, and a member of the Queensland Ministry, who ought to have known better, also made some extraordinary remarks.

Mr. MAHON.—He ought to be locked up.

Mr. HARPER.—I would not go so far as to suggest that. I merely point out that it is high time members of the Federal Parliament, and no less members of the States Parliaments, recognised that we are all working, or are supposed to be working, for one common interest, namely, the interest of the general body of the taxpayers of Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Will the honorable member show how much Tasmania has lost by the sugar bonus? It would be only fair to do so.

Mr. HARPER.—I did not come here to talk about sugar. My desire is to deal mainly with the States debts, the Braddon section, and the bookkeeping period, and I do not intend to be drawn off to the discussion of other matters with which I am, perhaps, not acquainted. While I do profess to know something of the matters with which I propose to deal, I am not familiar with the ramifications of the Tasmanian sugar business, and shall not attempt to throw any light upon the subject. Under the Constitution, accurate accounts have to be kept of Inter-State trade for five years after the institution of a uniform Tariff, so that each State may obtain the duties from the commodities it consumes irrespective of the place in which the duties are paid. This bookkeeping system, which, I suppose, was inevitable at the time it was adopted, was confessedly one which did not commend itself even to the Federal Convention. It was then pointed out that Federation would never be absolutely complete until we arrived at the point when the revenues collected would be paid back to the States per capita. At that time it was said to be quite impossible to have the per capita arrangement, because of the position of several of the States. This was notably so in the case of Western Australia, whose inhabitants were almost entirely adult men, who consumed largely both stimulants and narcotics, and also other kinds of goods, and the duties, therefore, were enormously greater per capita than were those of any other State. Another difficulty was that, for some reason or other, which I did not understand then, and which

I do not understand now, the duties on the people of Tasmania, and also on the people of Australia, were very much smaller amount than those paid in the three eastern States. The bookkeeping period—while it may have been inevitable at the beginning—expires in 1906, and that before October next year this arrangement will be in a position to make an arrangement by which this system may cease, and we shall have a per capita contribution, not necessarily a uniform per capita in all the States, but on a fair and equitable basis, according to the contributions of the different States shown by the official returns for two or three years of the bookkeeping period. I would suggest that the promise might be so arranged that the difference of payment in some of the States would gradually taper off, like the Tariff for Western Australia, and become inoperative in five or ten years' time. According to the statistics for last year furnished by the Treasurer, the amount contributed by the people of New South Wales, and Queensland contributed to the Commonwealth by way of Customs and Excise duties was £2 os. 10d., £2 os. 2d., and £1 16s. 9d. respectively per head of the population. Those contributed by Tasmania and Western Australia were £1 16s. 9d. and £2d. per head, and the amount contributed by the people of Western Australia exclusive of the special Tariff of the gold was £4 per head of the population at the establishment of Federation. I think that the per capita contribution of Western Australia was something like 16s. per head. As time passes, the condition of affairs in Western Australia will approximate to that of the other States. As the population increases the number of families will increase, and eight years hence its contribution per capita probably not differ very materially from that of the other States. In the circumstances, I do not think that we require the exercise of great wisdom to enable this Parliament to arrive at an arrangement that would be fair to the States individually, and to the Commonwealth, and at the same time would give absolute freedom to the Inter-State exchanges are concerned.

Mr. FISHER.—Would the honorable member differentiate as to the per capita turns?

HARPER.—It would be possible; it would be simply a matter of time. If we find, as I have said, the States contribute to the revenue of Customs and Excise duties ranging between £2 and £2 2s. of the population, that two others from £1 15s. to £1 17s. per head and the remaining one £4 per head, arrive at a fair compromise.

JOHN FORREST.—Would the honormember have no Inter-State adjust-

HARPER.—I would not.

JOHN FORREST.—That is all that be saved.

HARPER.—Quite so, but the saving would be a very important one. The shipping and entry passing which the system involves upon the public is enormous.

MCWILLIAMS.—Hear, hear.

HARPER.—I think that the Tasmanians are the greatest sufferers by the system.

JOHN FORREST.—I believe that an arrangement has been made by Victoria and New South Wales which does away with the difficulty.

HARPER.—They have made a give-and-take arrangement.

JOHN FORREST.—That might be done by other States.

HARPER.—I think it would be to give them the money they contribute on a fair basis. I am a Federalist and am looking to the day when we will arrive at a perfect oneness—when there will be an end to the present difficulty and the necessity to make give-and-take arrangements will no longer exist.
We ought to seek to achieve this object as we reasonably can with justice.
The States—I always postulate that we ought to be justly to the States, as well as the Commonwealth—and until we do we can never be truly federated.

FISHER.—There is a difference of £100 in the case of Queensland.

HARPER.—This is, after all, a matter of accountancy, and a smart man would adjust it in a very short time. The difficulty in the way of making an arrangement as I have suggested, from the inception of Federation, arose from the fact that we had no proper data to go by. We now have complete returns, showing that each State has actually contributed during the last two years; and, on 30th June next, a return for a further period of twelve months will be available.

It seems to me that it will be quite possible, after three years' experience of the contributions which the different States make to the revenue by way of Customs and Excise duties, to arrive at a simple scheme which would substantially give to the States that to which they were entitled, and by gradually tapering off over a series of years would place them all on a common per capita basis. Only then will our Federation be complete. I do not propose to waste the time of the Committee by reciting the advantages that would accrue to Australia from the assumption by the Commonwealth of the States debts. The difficulty is to determine how that task shall be accomplished. We know that it is desirable, but the question is how best to do it. To my mind, the matter has been materially complicated by the fact that at the Hobart Conference, the States Premiers, in their anxiety to make secure the position of the finances of the States, insisted on imposing, as a condition to their doing anything to settle the transfer of debts question, the continuation of the operation of the Braddon section. In reading the report of the debate which took place, one cannot help feeling that there was something almost pathetic in the manner in which the right honorable member for Balaclava, then Treasurer of the Commonwealth, pleaded for the acceptance of the scheme that he had propounded—in a very able paper, which most honorable members have doubtless read—without the imposition of that condition. One can see, from a perusal of the report, that the right honorable member, who had an absolute conception of what he conceived to be right and necessary in the interests of the Commonwealth, was, in his ill-health and weakness, over-borne by the representatives of the States, who insisted that the Braddon section should be continued indefinitely. I say, advisedly, that it would, in my opinion, be an enormous misfortune for Australia if the Parliament were to agree to extend the operation of that provision of the Constitution. I think it is very doubtful that it will do so; but the mere fact that the proposition secured the imprimatur of such a representative body as a Conference of State Premiers, with the representatives of the Federal Government, would in itself have been a misfortune. The continuation of the Braddon section would cripple, to a very serious extent, the usefulness of the Federation. It would possibly have a most detrimental effect on the future of Australia.

Mr. CHANTER.—It would hobble the Commonwealth.

Mr. HARPER.—That is so. What would it mean? The great spending departments have been transferred to the Commonwealth. I refer to the departments by which money has to be expended, and from which little or no revenue is derived, notably the Defence Department, and, to some extent, the Post and Telegraph Department. Honorable members will find that, with the exception of the Customs Department, the departments which must be charged with the carrying out of almost all the powers set forth in what are known as the "thirty-nine articles" of the Constitution are spending departments, whose requirements must increase as the Commonwealth develops. If we take, for instance, the Defence Department, the receipt of a telegram, which we might get any day, concerning European complications might involve a very large Commonwealth expenditure, to be immediately undertaken in the interests, not of any one State, but of the whole of Australia. That, in such circumstances, the Government should be hobbled by an arrangement of this sort, and compelled to raise, by some direct form of taxation, a large sum of money at short notice, would certainly not be a desirable position for it to be placed in. I have spoken of the spending departments, but when we come to consider the revenue-earning department which has been passed over to us, and of which we have exclusive control, it will be found that the revenue to be derived from it is perhaps the most fluctuating of any. I refer to the Customs Department. Honorable members are aware that in the States during lean years we have seen the Customs revenue drop as much as 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. FISHER.—As much as that?

Mr. HARPER.—Yes; in Victoria, on one occasion, the revenue from the Customs dropped nearly 50 per cent., and, instead of the State Treasurer having sufficient money to carry on the administration of affairs, he found himself faced with an enormous deficit.

Mr. KENNEDY.—About £1,000,000.

Mr. HARPER.—I think it amounted to about that. The honorable member for Moira and I had to face such difficulties in the State Parliament of Victoria.

The Federal Parliament is the body vested with exclusive control of the most fluctuating form of revenue. When I point out that, on the one hand, we have charge of all the departments which may be called spending departments, and whose obligations to the Commonwealth will continually increase, and on the other that the revenue department is the one most subject to change, I need say nothing more as to the inadvisability of tying the hands of the Federal Parliament in the way suggested.

Mr. MAUGER.—It was only proposed as a temporary expedient at first.

Mr. HARPER.—It was. Now let us look at the position of the States. It is all human, and it is quite natural that the States Treasurers should say, "We wish to run short of money to meet our State obligations." I think they are entitled to look after the interests of their States; but while they do so, they must remember that, as the Commonwealth Government have taken over many of the services which they have heretofore carried on, and for which they have heretofore to pay out of their States revenues, they must reduce their expenditure in accordance with the saving made. It is precisely the duty that I think my friends in the States Parliaments have recognised. Public opinion at the beginning of Federation was on the right track when it was said, "You have taken over a Federation, the Federal Government take over many of the services and the duties which the States have heretofore carried on and paid for, and we therefore expect you to make trenchant reductions in your State expenditure." Bowing to the mandate, some of the States did reduce their expenditure, but only to a strictly limited extent. They began by reducing the Governors' salaries, and, in some instances, the number of members of Parliament. It should like an examination to be made as to the extent to which the States Parliaments have effected savings in other directions. I think, they should be made aware of the consequence of the services which the Federal authorities have assumed, and of which the States have not to pay. I agree that the States Parliaments are entitled to take care that the Federal Parliament shall not deprive them of their rights, it is their duty, just as it is ours, to remember that whatever money is wasted by the Federal Parliament ates Parliaments, is equally money comes out of the pockets of the tax- and that the obligation to see that onomy is exercised is mutual. When representatives of the States Government at the recent Conference in , it seemed to me that they were ed by a somewhat hostile feeling to the Federal Parliament. Indeed, I t was rather improper that before et the representatives of the Federal ment they should themselves have solemn conclave, and, before hear- e other side, have arrived at certain ions, which were drawn up and pre- almost as an ultimatum to the l representatives. The States ntatives were full of this an- tic feeling, and several of them "We do not want the odium" k honorable members to mark the "of proposing new taxation. Let deral Parliament take the odium." e words which were actually used, say they do not display a proper l spirit, without which we cannot that any arrangement in con- with these matters will be to. The States representatives remember that the Braddon section continue in operation for only ten and that after the expiration of that in 1911, the Federal revenue will rely in the hands of the Federal ment. They must not forget that, justice must be done by this Legis- o the people of Australia, any settle- which may be proposed must re- ne support and confirmation of this ment.

MAUGER.—It will not be a Hobart ence that will settle them.

HARPER.—I would also say that k our friends of the States Parlia- have been unduly frightened. They ot projected their minds into the sufficiently to realize the new psi- chich will be created by the transfer States debts to the Commonwealth, general arrangement of the finances as n the States and the Commonwealth. alk of being unable to meet their ons. They talk of being placed in position that they will not be able t the interest on their loans. If ates debts are transferred to the nwealth they will not have to meet erest on their loans, and the whole a will be changed. I think that gentlemen who have dealt with the matter from the stand-point of the States have not considered that fact sufficiently. If the Commonwealth takes over the debts of the States and pays the interest on those debts the States Governments will unquestionably be in a better position than they are in now, because the obligation which presses upon them as a debt which must be met will be removed from their shoulders. A good deal of the difficulty which has arisen in connexion with the public finances of the States is due to a cause to which I drew attention years ago, when a member of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria. It is this: In all the States the practice has grown up of treating railway income as if it were revenue from Customs, or other ordinary revenue, and looking upon the interest on the railway debt as if it were a public burden similar to the charge for the maintenance of the police, or the expenditure necessary for the carrying on of our educational system. In borrowing money to construct railways, we have done what has not been done in Great Britain, and what has been done in Canada to a limited extent only; but the model upon which we have framed our finance is unquestionably the mode of submitting the public accounts which prevails in Great Britain. In the accounts of Great Britain, there is no item corresponding with our railway item. The nearest approach to it is the receipts and expenditure in connexion with the administration of the Post Office, which appear also in our accounts. In Great Britain practically no great public works are carried on by the Government for the benefit of the people, and consequently the national finance is not swollen on the debit side by interest on loans for railway making, and on the credit side by earnings from the working of the railways. The fact that our finances are so swollen has been a great misfortune to this country, because it has led to the idea abroad, in the minds of those who are not acquainted with our accounts and our system of affairs, that our taxation and expenditure are enormously heavy. But if the figures relating to trading concerns are deducted from our debit and credit accounts, a reasonable basis of comparison with other countries is obtained.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—When reference is made to our statistical records, the facts are clear.

Mr. HARPER.—But who makes such reference?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — The financiers, about whom we hear so much.

Mr. HARPER.—I am not thinking of them. I am speaking of the opinion of the multitude.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — The multitude never hear anything about the matter, except through a financial review.

Mr. HARPER.—I do not propose to discuss that point, and have made these remarks merely by the way. The practice by the States Governments of treating railway income and expenditure as part of the ordinary State revenue has had one peculiar and unfortunate effect. The ordinary working expenses of the railways have to be provided month by month, while the interest on the cost of construction has only to be paid half-yearly. The result is that the proportion of the earnings, which represents the interest charge, gets into the revenue, and may, when a Treasurer is hard pressed, be expended for other purposes. If, therefore, at the end of the financial year, when the interest has to be paid, the Treasurer finds his income short, he has to finance to meet his interest payment, which gives the appearance of being in the position of making default, unless he can procure the money. In my view the income earned by States railways, or other reproductive works, should be earmarked and applied first to the payment of interest on such works, as it is a fixed and inexorable charge, and then wages and other working expenses should be provided by the State out of State finances, and if there is a deficiency in the earnings of the railways to meet their working expenses, that must be met by either reducing expenses, increasing earnings, or by a Government subsidy. On one occasion grave difficulty overtook the Gillies Government from failure to keep money in hand to meet an obligation of this kind. A sum of £600,000 or £700,000 of interest fell due in London on the 1st July, but the Treasurer, in making up his balance-sheet for the financial year ending the 30th June, did not debit himself with that amount. There was nothing illegal in his failure to do so, and he could not be blamed for not doing it. But the collapse of the boom came, and before October he had to break his deposits in the banks to obtain the money with which to carry on, because of this payment of £600,000 or more he had to meet.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We used to our interest monthly in Western Australia.

Mr. HARPER.—Was it paid monthly?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; it was provided for.

Mr. HARPER.—If the money was in reserve that was all right. The trouble of this practice on our accounts is that our finances never get straightened out, and we are always behind, and the community has to see clearly and definitely the loss resulting from the working of the railways, and to discern the fact that the interest charge should be met regularly, as the Treasurer says is done in Western Australia, and the wages and other working expenses weekly or monthly. The idea of allowing the interest bill to accumulate until the day when payment is due, and then having to scuttle about the money to get it together to obtain a loan to carry on, is a very serious matter. I may be asked how it is possible to apply these facts to the present argument. I think the States, for their own sake, should think to provide for the payment of interest as they go along. If they did so, they would very much simplify the problem with which we have to deal. Sir George Turner, in his memorandum upon the question of the Commonwealth taking over the States debts, made it a condition that we should have the right to exercise what would be practically a lien or mortgage on the whole of the revenue derived from the States railways. His idea was right, but I am sorry he is not here, because I have liked to make these remarks in his presence—I do not think that he has grasped the point, because if he had done so, he would have been satisfied with less than he demands. I think that it would be very proper and improper—and I do not think the States would ever consent to it—to take over the gross revenue of the States railways, because we should then become responsible for their management. That is to say, we should have to provide money to carry on the railways—repairs, to pay wages and salaries, and to provide for every contingency. If the States debts were taken over by the Commonwealth, as is proposed, we should propose conditions somewhat upon the lines of those I have not had an opportunity to discuss. I think the matter out, because the great difficulties in the way of a er dealing with such a complicated on, owing to want of access to many documents necessary to enable one me to a sound conclusion. There-what I say to-night is, of course, al-subject to correction in the light of knowledge or increased information.

I suppose, for the sake of argument, the States debts were taken over on ion that the Railways Commissioners ny other governing bodies having con-ver reproductive works, were required
y to the Commonwealth Treasurer, perhaps, to Commissioners appointed e purpose, the interest upon the debts ed in order to carry out such works.
I believe that in order to deal practically the conversion of the States debts, it is necessary to appoint what may be Commonwealth Debts Commissioners, will administer the funds placed in hands in a variety of ways, which I explain later on. If the condition imposed that all the interest money be paid to the Debts Commissioners monthly, what would be the effect on the States? In the first place, they would be brought face to face with their obligations in connexion with the railways and other works. That is to say, they would not wake up to a realization of the obligations of the case only at the time when a financial statement was prepared, but they would know all along what was required of them. The States Treasurers would not have in their hands the large sums which they are now able to manipulate, but would be able to watch their expenditure from the railways and other reproductive works. If they could not make ends meet they could reduce their outlay, or impose increased rates upon the railways, or if they were satisfied that fair rates were already being charged and fair interest were being paid, they could make up the deficiency out of the general revenue.

Such a condition of affairs would be advantageous from the point of view of the States finances, because it would reduce the expenditure much more closely to a cash basis.
It is always wise to adopt this course in dealing with the public finances. On the other hand, the Federal Government would lose the income from these public works which is in their hands for the payment of interest on the debt, and would need other security. All they need is to feel secure that they will be able to meet the interest charges on the debt. The obligations of the States would be provided for to the satisfaction of the Commonwealth, and of the public creditors, in a manner that would render it unnecessary to lower the status of the States or embarrass them in any way. In addition to that, another difficulty which has been foreseen would be overcome. We cannot possibly expect rising States, many of which are only at the beginning of their career, to come, cap in hand, to this Parliament, and ask permission to build a railway. If we took up the position I have suggested we should say to them, "You can build your railway or other reproductive work; that is a matter for you to consider, but, provided we give you the money for that purpose you will have to plank down the interest monthly."

Consequently, the States would be free to make railways where and when they liked.
Of course, I am speaking in general terms, but it must be apparent that some reasonable limit would have to be fixed.
Speaking generally, however, if a State thought it desirable to build a railway which was not expected to return working expenses, in addition to the interest on the outlay, it would have to face the necessity of providing the interest out of its own coffers.

Mr. FISHER.—The States have been doing that all along.

Mr. HARPER.—Of course they have, and therefore no hardship would be involved under my proposal. My object is to leave the States, as far as possible, masters of their own affairs within their own spheres, and, at the same time, to do absolute justice to the Commonwealth by protecting it in regard to its debt obligations.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Does the honorable member think that it would be unsafe to allow the interest to accumulate in the hands of the States?

Mr. HARPER.—I do not think that it would be unsafe, but it would be far more prudent for us to stipulate for the payment of the interest monthly. Under the influence of a pressing demand the States Treasurers might use, for some other purpose, the money which should be devoted to the payment of interest. As a matter of fact, that is exactly what is done in some cases at present. It may be said, "It is all right, the money is there"; but very often the money is not there, and what I am now suggesting must commend itself to any practical business man.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member conveys the impression that some one has suggested that the liberty of the States to construct railways should be interfered with.

Mr. HARPER.—No, I do not suggest that, but I say that any attempt to limit the borrowing powers of the States would necessarily involve an interference with their liberty to construct railways. Suppose, for instance, New South Wales wanted to build a railway, and came to us and said, "We want you to borrow £5,000,000, because we desire to construct a certain railway." Suppose, further, that we said we would not borrow the money. That would be tantamount to telling the State that it could not construct the railway. That would be the result of the line of action suggested in some quarters, and I do not think the States would be justified in tying themselves up in that way. They must be allowed to exercise their full liberties as sovereign States, and to bear their full share of responsibility. They have certain rights of administration which we should respect. Under the plan I have suggested, the States would know exactly what their obligations were. Their position would be brought home to them at once. This consideration brings me back to the Braddon section, and to the suggestion which was made the other night by the Treasurer of a return to the States of a fixed sum. If the States did as I suggest, it would naturally lead to a re-arrangement of the amount to be returned to them. After we had ascertained their exact position, and after arrangements had been made for taking over their debts, we should be able to say to them, "During the next five years we will return you so much, or so much per head." But before we did that, it is only reasonable that we should satisfy ourselves as to the amount which the States Treasurers actually require to carry on the greatly diminished services which they have to perform. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not suggest that there should be any inquisitorial inquiry into the affairs of the States, but, in arriving at an arrangement with them such as I have described, I think that we should be justified in asking them to show, by means of their public documents, the amounts which they had actually been expending prior to Federation upon the various departments which they still retain. For instance, we should be warranted in seeking to ascertain what sums they had been spent on education, the Judiciary, and the Police Department, so that we could determine what were their real requirements. We could then say to them, "These are your reasonable requirements, and we will return you a sufficient sum to cover them, but no more." Of course it is just possible that they may say, "Oh, but this is very inquisitorial." I take it, however, that, as the supreme legislature of Australia, we have a right to say that as far as our influence extends, we will not encourage extravagance on the part of the States or of the Commonwealth. If we arrived at that position, I believe that a reasonable arrangement could be made for the lines which I have suggested would be practicable. Concerning the States themselves, we occupy a very peculiar position. I do not know why the framers of the Constitution, when they authorized this Parliament to take over those debts, limited our power to the debts which were then current.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Because it was expected that the States would borrow more.

Mr. HARPER. — It is immaterial whether the borrowing is done by the States or by the Commonwealth. If the Commonwealth borrows, it must lend to the States. In my judgment fifty years ago the Commonwealth will be the one to borrow. I cannot understand why the framers of our Constitution limited the power of the Commonwealth to take over of the debts existing at the time the Federation was established. They thought that any debts would subsequently be contracted by or on behalf of the States does not seem to have occurred. When the Federation was established these debts amounted to £203,000,000, and since then the States have borrowed an additional £31,000,000. If we merely took over the debts which existed when the Commonwealth was inaugurated, the other debts would be depreciated to a certain extent. The Commonwealth would not possess the same standing as the Federal stock, and it would be difficult for us to create another class of debts from those already in existence. I quite agree that the Commonwealth should take over the whole of the States' debts, because I believe that by so doing we should be enabled to deal with this important question at a very early date.

1906 loans aggregating £2,221,300 due; in 1907, stocks valued at 7,500 will mature, and in 1908 an annual sum of £7,111,000 will require payment. In other words, loans to the value of about £15,000,000 will mature in the next three years. Consequently there is every reason for facing the question at an early date, instead of taking action in regard to it until the moment. As a matter of fact, the rates in which these loans are converted, and the rates at which they are taken over, have a very important influence on the cost of our financial transactions.

HENRY WILLIS.—We cannot take the whole of the States debts without amending the Constitution.

HARPER.—My honorable friend says that the transfer to the Commonwealth of the whole of the debts will necessitate an amendment of the Constitution. That is literally true. But provided that we enter into an amicable arrangement with the States on the lines I have suggested, there is a way of overcoming that difficulty without effecting an amendment of the Constitution. Under paragraph xxxvii. of the Constitution, on 51 we are authorized to deal with the debts referred to the Commonwealth Parliament by the Parliaments of the States. As we came to a mutual arrangement with the States; before it was completed it was necessary for each of the States to pass a Bill authorizing the Federal Parliament to take over its indebtedness and its obligations.

HENRY WILLIS.—There would have been an alteration of the Constitution to that effect.

HARPER.—It might be necessary to amend the Constitution. That would be a complicated process, and if there was a section of the Constitution which would enable the States to fall into such an arrangement as I have sketched it would be infinitely better to follow that course. I am not a lawyer, but it occurred to me that the provision to which I alluded might be taken advantage of to enable the States to hand over those debts that were not in existence at the time of the passing of the Constitution.

HUTCHISON.—What does the honorable member suggest with regard to the borrowings?

HARPER.—I have alluded to that but will mention it again. If the method which I have suggested is not practicable we shall have to alter the Constitution. In answer to the honorable member for Hindmarsh, I say that I would make the arrangement applicable to all future loans. That is to say, a State would apply to the Federal Government, giving reasonable notice, for a loan to build a railway, or for some other purpose, and it would then be the duty of the Commonwealth Government to make arrangements to secure the money in due time. Of course, the State would have to undertake that the interest would be forthcoming. This brings me to a point about which the minds of a great many people are exercised. I refer to the question of how to limit borrowing, and at the same time to prevent clashing. Some honorable members, many of the outside public, and a number of newspapers, say that we ought not to borrow at all. But looking at the past history of any country that can be named, I reply that a country can only be developed by the expenditure of capital; and if we are to wait until that capital is derived from revenue, development will be much delayed, for people will say, "Why should we be taxed to make improvements for posterity?" We must borrow money for reproductive works; and so long as it is borrowed for investments which will develop the country, with a fair prospect of yielding interest and working expenses, that is a sound policy to pursue. A hard-and-fast rule of no borrowing, which so many people advocate, is impracticable. My honorable and learned friend, the member for Northern Melbourne, made some allusion to restricting the borrowing of the States to what they could obtain locally, and said that the Commonwealth Government only should borrow outside the limits of Australia. But that would be no real safeguard. It would attain no object. Because, if I were living in London and had £10,000 to invest, and a loan was being floated in Australia, I could go to my banker, who would give me 10s. on every £100, would land the money in Melbourne, invest it in stock on my behalf, and hold it for me. Therefore it is idle to talk about limiting the States Governments to Commonwealth markets. Under my scheme, however, there would be no borrower except the Commonwealth, which would have the right to borrow within a State or beyond, according to the condition of the money market. If the debts are taken over there ought henceforth to be only one borrower—the Commonwealth. The States would then look to the head of the household, so to speak, for any money they wished to raise on loan. It would be a family arrangement. The amount which New South Wales borrowed through the Commonwealth would be put through the ledger and charged to that State. The amount which Victoria borrowed would be debited to her. It would be like the head of a family lending out money to the different members of his family, and saying to them, "You pay me interest on the amount which I lend to you for your advancement in life." That is the position which the Commonwealth ought to take, though I admit that it will be a long time before it can do so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Borrowers do not like the man from whom they borrow, as a rule.

Mr. HARPER.—If the obligation to pay the interest due every month be met I do not think we need trouble very much about the feelings of the States. They will get accustomed to the arrangement.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We have always been able to pay our interest.

Mr. HARPER.—Yes, but sometimes by obtaining another loan. And that is what I am seeking to prevent. I wish to take away the temptation from the Treasurer of any State to say, "Let us live a jolly life while we have the money; the cash is rolling in, and we will spend it," without having any regard to the day of reckoning. When that day came the State would be in the doldrums, and would have to raise, say, £800,000 by way of overdraft in order to enable it to pay the interest on its debts. The first charge on public works is the interest, and after that the working expenses. These must be met either by making the revenue pay the working expenses, or by openly subsidizing the States railways on public grounds. We are often told that it is far better for the Government of a State to borrow in Australia than to borrow abroad. At first sight, that seems a very sound proposition, but it must always be remembered that the ability to borrow depends on the ability to lend. If you borrow in the country, you are distinctly limited. It is, I take it, almost an axiom that the money which accumulates in a new country like this ought to be applied primarily, not to lending it to the Government at a low rate of interest but to developing its various resource industries. What chance can there be in a new country have of borrowing money outside their own country, when they are huge concerns like the mining industry, and some other comparatively small manufacturing tradesman cannot borrow money in Melbourne but he can borrow money in Melbourne or Sydney, or Brisbane, as the case may be, because those who have the money know what he wishes to use it for and can look after it. I have always viewed with considerable disfavour the money which is fostered in many quarters which is a right thing to lend to the Government the money which is accumulating in the country, and have our industries strangled or kept back from want of it. The Government is the right party to borrow money abroad. With the credit of the whole country at its back, it can borrow on favorable terms; but private concerns cannot do that. So long as the money is borrowed for really reproductive purposes—and the crux of the question is that the works shall pay the interest and the working expenses—then we need not trouble ourselves very much about the amount of the loan, that is, within reasonable limits does not matter in that sense when money is borrowed by the Government it is just as bad for the Government to borrow the money in the country, and spend it, as to throw away money that is borrowed abroad.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Would the honorable member place a limit on the borrowing power of the States?

Mr. HARPER.—I have purpose nothing that indefinite. I am only stating what has been passing through my mind. I desire to provoke discussion. I have thought out a scheme, but I do not wish to tie myself to it in that manner. There might be a necessity to limit borrowing, and if you formulate a principle that the money must only be borrowed for reproductive works, you thereby impose a limitation. My limitation is that henceforth the States should not be allowed to borrow for other than reproductive works.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who would be the judge—the public?

Mr. HARPER.—The Federal Government would have to ascertain the purpose for which the money was sought to be borrowed. I do not wish to discuss details. I find that, speaking generally, when ent question is raised there is a very tendency on the part of critics to upon unimportant issues and not to with the main points.

ISAACS.—But this is vital to the ?

HARPER.—Yes. If the obligation incurred on the terms and conditions I have laid down, I do not think it will need to impose a limit. If the borrowed money through the Comptroller for schemes which entailed a burden of new taxation, that fact would become known to the State taxpayers, they would have to be trusted to see that the unders did not recur. This Parliament cannot take away powers which are vested in the people of the whole country. They will make fools of themselves, all they do is to put them in a position in which they shall not be deceived. If they are guilty of unjustifiable extravagance they come to see that they have been making fools of themselves, and we must trust their common sense to prevent them from continuing to be fools. These are the main points that I intended to bring with. This question seems to me so important that it brooks no delay. It is reproach to either this or any previous Government that it has not yet solved this problem. The inherent difficulties arising from the circumstances in which the Constitution was framed have yet to be overcome. This is not a question which affects the Ministry or the Opposition; it should be treated as an absolutely non-party question. All of us ought to seek to solve the problem to the best of our ability. The parts of the Constitution relating to the Comptroller which are defective or have proved unworkable. The best thing the Government could do would be to consider early date the propriety of appointing a small Commission of qualified men, the smaller the number the better, they do not believe in large Commissions. They make an inquiry from each Comptroller, point, and endeavour to bring up proposals, which, on their face, would be perfectly fair and reasonable to both the Commonwealth and the States. Their report would be a guide to honorable members, and, of course, it might be taken from the scheme I have outlined to-day. But I think that the suggestions made, which I have tried to put in a way that they would appeal to the common sense of honorable members, are entitled to consideration. I suggest to the Government the advisability of remitting this matter to a small Commission of, say, three suitable men, who should be allowed twelve months in which to complete their work. It would possibly take fully that time, if not longer, to obtain absolutely accurate information, and consult legal gentlemen as to what may or may not be done under the Constitution. The recommendations of such a Commission would be useful not only to this Parliament, but to the other Parliaments concerned.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Would a Select Committee of this Parliament not be sufficient?

Mr. HARPER.—I do not think so. It is no reflection on this Parliament to say that this is a highly expert matter, requiring somewhat peculiar knowledge.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable member for Kooyong has a motion on the notice-paper dealing with the matter.

Mr. HARPER.—I to-day pointed out to the honorable member for Kooyong that, according to my view, though I did not give him my reasons in full, his proposal would not answer the purpose. According to the motion of the honorable member for Kooyong, the question would be remitted to gentlemen who had largely to deal with the same matter in the Federal Convention. I do not think it is necessary or advisable to seek the aid of men who have not given special attention to these questions, not only from the political stand-point, but also from the stand-point of the financier or accountant. I should not even like to see this work remitted to an accountant, because the question is one which must be settled to some extent by the exercise of the political instinct. With some knowledge of accounts, I could lay down hard-and-fast lines in order to secure a certain result, but, as practical politicians, we have, in dealing with an important subject of this sort, to consider political possibilities. We have to consider what we may and what we may not do under our Constitution. This is a question, therefore, which has to be settled in a quasi-political and financial way. I do not think that I have omitted any of the points I sketched in my notes; but, if I have, I dare say honorable members will be able to fill in any hiatus there may be in the argument. My opinion is that, ultimately, when this great question of debts conversion comes to be dealt with, commissioners will have to be appointed, whose duty it will be to arrange loans and deal with the interest. I would even go further—and this is a point which will require very great and grave consideration—and intrust them with the command of capital in the shape of bonds or otherwise, up to the amount of, say, £5,000,000, so as to put them in a position to conduct financial operations in the event of any "corner" being established. The misfortune is that nearly two-thirds of our debts fall due at fixed dates. About £40,000,000 of debts can be taken up at any time after a certain period, but, unfortunately, as I say, a large proportion are payable on a certain date; and it would be advisable to place the commissioners in the possession of funds, so that they might be able to meet any combination against conversion. If that suggestion were carried out, the commissioners would be able to say, "Very well; we are prepared to give you Commonwealth bonds at 3 per cent. at par, and if you do not like to take those we will give you your money." The effect of such an arrangement as that would be that the Commonwealth could not be "cornered" in a conversion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—All the Western Australian loans are floated that way.

Mr. HARPER.—I am not dealing with Western Australia. Although that State is a very important one, it is not quite the hub of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What I say is that the term there is twenty years.

Mr. HARPER.—That is simply because Western Australia has only lately come into the market.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are many loans of other States on the same terms.

Mr. HARPER.—That is not so. Out of the £202,000,000 of debts there are, speaking in round numbers, £160,000,000 at fixed dates, the remaining £40,000,000 falling due in a way which is open to negotiation; that is to say, notice may be given at a favorable time. This makes it most important that the Commonwealth commissioners, in the event of undertaking this vast business, should be in possession of capital to enable them to go into the market and offer "new lamps for old," and, if that offer be not accepted, to return the money. The effect of such a plan would be, as I say, to frustrate any attempt to form a "corner." A scheme to convert so vast cannot be carried out at once. public and some honorable members often express the idea that all we have to do is to go to London and say, "We will give you Commonwealth bonds for £100,000,000, and pay you 3 per cent." The lenders are now getting perhaps 5 per cent., and it is quite idle to suppose we can compel anybody to give up their security until the debt falls due. If people do give up their security, they want an equivalent in capital in order to compensate them for the loss of interest; and that would add enormously to our loans, and limit the benefit of conversion. I think that in Western Australia a convertible loan is due from 1916, and that will be the first one on which the Commonwealth will, under the lines I have proposed, be in a position to really test its strength. All the £15,000,000 of debts which fall due in the next five years, are at fixed dates, and must be financed, and the Commonwealth Government ought to have a Debts Commission in a position to finance the conversion and to anticipate and prevent any attempt at boycotting or cornering. I have referred to the three main questions—the conversion, the bookkeeping system, with which I hope we shall be able to deal next session, the transfer of the States debts to the Commonwealth, and also the question of the continuance of the Braddon section. I say, unhesitatingly, that the continuation of that section would be a great misfortune to Australia.

Mr. FISHER.—Has the honorable member anything to suggest in regard to the convertible stock?

Mr. HARPER.—We should have to consider, in the light of London advice, whether it would be the most acceptable form of security. Let us say, for the sake of argument, that we floated loans having a maturity of fifty years, with a provision that after the expiration of fifteen years they would become payable on six or twelve months' notice being given. In that case the stock-holders would know that they would have a security for at least fifteen years, and that at the end of that period they might be repaid, on reasonable notice being given. On the other hand, if the advice received from financial quarters were favorable, we might make our loans interminable; we might make them like the Australian consols; but even those would have to be payable on notice after a specified

It will be necessary for us to have to the future. At the outset, we have to pay 3 per cent., but as time goes on it might be open to us to give only 1 per cent.

JOHN FORREST.—They would be invaluable only so far as one side was concerned.

KING O'MALLEY.—Would the hon. member support the creation of a sinking fund to meet the loans as they fell due?

HARPER.—That goes without saying. The right honorable member for Balakrishnan attaches very great importance to the establishment of a sinking fund, and so does the Government to a certain point. I think that in the case of loans expended on reproductive works, like railways—and railways, if maintained in a proper state of efficiency, do not deteriorate and must necessarily increase in value as population increases and the percentage contribution to a sinking fund would be justifiable. One does not need to make provision to meet a loan where large contributions to a sinking fund when he has an appreciating security. I have, however, that loans amounting to £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 have been spent on unproductive works; and my suggestion is that, instead of making a large annual contribution to a sinking fund to meet loans in respect of railways, we should make but 1 per cent. one, and pay, say, 2 per cent. on a sinking fund to meet loans expended on non-productive works. Such works must deteriorate; but the railways are able to maintain their value, unless they are wholly neglected. Even in the case of railway loans, however, it would be unwise to have a small sinking fund.

HIGGINS.—In connexion with the sinking fund there must be a sinking fund to meet depreciation in rolling stock and machinery.

HARPER.—That is so. If the railways were going to remain stationary, they would depreciate; but this is not the position. The honorable and learned member is quite right in saying that provision must be made for depreciation in machinery. Railway managements and others controlling businesses in which machinery is used, must put aside provision to cover depreciation, unless they are prepared to come to grief. I come now to another point. A good deal has been said about the defamation of Australia. I have had occasion to visit Great Britain more than once, and although I was not there during the recent tempest of misrepresentation, I can say that when I was in London in connexion with the affairs of a certain financial institution, I felt absolutely humiliated, and almost enraged at the manner in which Australia was defamed by people who owed everything they possessed to this country. The Commonwealth has no more dastardly enemies than the gentlemen in the various cities of the Commonwealth—they are not confined to Melbourne or Sydney—who write to the financial journals of the old world articles which, while in a sense true, because it is impossible to meet them with an absolute denial, are absolutely misleading as to the condition of affairs in Australia. Only yesterday, a friend of mine, a leading banker in this city, who regularly reads the Economist, said to me—"In reading this influential journal, I am amazed at the opinion which it entertains of Australia. I know that all it has to say in this regard is utterly untrue. If I believed what it wrote on the subject, I should consider that Australia was absolutely done for—that everything was rotten; but I know, as a banker, that we were never more prosperous than we are to-day." We know that this is so. At the same time I would ask honorable members whether we are altogether blameless? I hold that we are not. Many statements have been made in this House, for mere party reasons, which, if confined to the Chamber, would have been taken at their true value. But unfortunately such statements are taken up by the newspapers. The press gives but little information of what transpires in the Parliament; but any bonne bouche of the kind to which I refer is given undue prominence, and it is telegraphed to the other side of the world where little knowledge prevails as to the position of the Commonwealth. Very often the only statements with regard to Australia which the people of the old world see in the press consist of scandalous misrepresentations. It behoves us, therefore, to remember, when speaking in the House, that we have an audience beyond this country whom it is wise to consider. I would say to my honorable friends of the Labour Party, for whom, as they know, I have every respect, that, in my humble opinion, some of their actions betray even from their own stand-point a short-sighted policy.

am glad to learn that two of the leaders of the party have publicly stated that they wish a section in the Immigration Restriction Act, which, I admit, has been most shamefully misrepresented, to be amended. It is pleasing to know that they take that view of the position. I am convinced that all that the Labour Party desire is merely to prevent an abuse of immigration. They have no wish that an impression should go abroad that we do not want immigrants; and I do not think that any one in the House, or outside of it, believes that in the case of a strike or disagreement between employers and employed in some big industry, the country should be swamped by men, brought in like a foreign army, to interfere with a purely local trade disturbance, that should be settled by ourselves. While on this point, I may say that I think the insertion in the Post and Telegraph Act of the provision prohibiting the employment of black labour on our subsidized mail steamers, was a great tactical blunder. The employment of coloured men on board steamers carrying our mails has, after all, no earthly connexion with the principle of a White Australia. Honorable members may make the regulations to prevent them landing in Australia as strict as they please. But why should we prevent them from working on vessels that carry our mails, and are paid for that service?

Mr. BAMFORD.—Why not address these remarks to the acting leader of the Opposition?

Mr. HARPER.—That honorable member was once leader of the party to which the honorable member for Herbert belongs, but he is not now.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I was never leader of their party.

Mr. HARPER.—I withdraw. I remember many years ago reading a sentiment of the late Mr. Gladstone which made a very great impression on my mind. He was, I think, speaking to public men, and he said, in effect, "The first thing is to be sure that you are right in what you want to do. The next thing, and it is quite as important, is to make it apparent to the public, and those with whom you have to deal, that you are right."

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is far more important.

Mr. HARPER.—I think that it is far more important in our position. I say to honorable members of the Labour Party that, however strongly they may be in favour of the proposal which I have referred, nothing that I do or say will satisfy those with whom the Commonwealth should stand well. It is not a gratuitous act of interference in matters practically outside of our jurisdiction, and to achieve something is not necessary in order to maintain the principle of a White Australia. The proposal is not worth the candle. The Labour Party represent a large body of people in Australia—we are all citizens of no matter what country—and I say that we ought to use the means in our power, whilst upholding principles, and carrying out the legislation, which we think necessary to build up the country, to avoid even the appearance of the savours of dictation or interference with those beyond our own shores, and to do nothing—especially of a trivial character, and which can do no good to the body—that will prejudice against whom we seek to bring to the country our citizens. We should not invite the honorable member to think that it is our desire to keep the country selfishly for ourselves, and to give no consideration whatever for them. In regard to the sugar bounties, the honorable member for Franklin the other night objected to their payment, and spoke of the grievance they were to fruit-growers. One who understands a little about the working of these things, I say that the honorable member has been misled. I have seen it stated by associations of fruit-growers that they are paying a large sum in charges in connexion with sugar, and that they are at a disadvantage. They are not at a disadvantage. It is the consumer who has to pay for the sugar that is used in jams, and the matter affects them in regard to exports. If they wish to export jams to South Africa they must pay a drawback of duty, or they cannot export there with English exporters of jam. The Federal Government gives them a drawback of five-sixths of the duty that is paid on foreign sugar, and on a liberal scale. That is to say, if a jam manufacturer uses 1,000 tons of sugar a year, and he can dispose of 500 tons of it in the manufacture of jam in Australia, and of 500 tons in the manufacture of jam sent to South Africa, he is able to buy 500 tons of foreign sugar, which he pays a duty of £6 per ton, and he can use that sugar in his business. I think that a concession has been granted, for of sugar on which he has paid £6 a duty he is allowed a drawback of 10s. if he exports jam to that extent.

MCWILLIAMS.—That is rough on Queensland grower, because it forces the manufacturer to go outside the Commonwealth for sugar.

HARPER.—The Queensland grower has a very wide field for their operation. They have the benefit of the whole home consumption of Australia, and that is a very big thing. With all respect to the honorable member, I say that I think the proposal made by the honorable member for Gippsland is a reasonable one, and could be carried out on safe lines. I could let the payment of the sugar duties continue for a time, and then taper them off until they entirely disappear.

MAUGER.—The question is, when does the tapering off begin?

HARPER.—Two or three years from the present time. In the history of the country these are small matters. I think to the honorable members that it has been sickening to read in the proceedings of the Conference held at Hobart of all the petty provincialisms that were stated there. I think we should try to inaugurate a day of better things, and to have larger views of public questions. It will be a matter to the Commonwealth to have to continue the payment of sugar bounties for a year, more or less, provided it is agreed that they shall taper off? The thing is not worth arguing about.

MCWILLIAMS.—If the honorable member were a fruit-grower he would not like that.

HARPER.—I am not a fruit-grower; but, as a matter of fact, I would like that if I were a fruit-grower, and it stood my business. Does the honorable member mean to tell me that if I put a tin of jam, the fruit in which costs 1s. and the sugar 1½d., and I sell it for 2s., or whatever the profit charged may be, the consumer does not pay the duty on the sugar?

KING O'MALLEY.—The honorable member represents the biggest fruit-growing district in Victoria.

HARPER.—I do; and I have pointed out to fruit-growers who have complained to me that they have been misled by a grievous fallacy.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why should the payment of the sugar bounties be continued, when they were only intended to operate for a time?

Mr. HARPER.—The honorable member is raising a very different question. I have found the principle of reasonable compromise a very satisfactory principle to adopt in order to get out of a difficulty. When one comes to an impasse between himself and his opponent, he says, "there is no use in our going to law; let us settle the matter. You want something, and I will give you half, or I will give you something to-day and something else next week." If the application of that principle is satisfactory in dealings between private individuals, it is likely to be infinitely more satisfactory when applied to dealings between countries. We should endeavour to take a view of these questions above all petty considerations. I am not saying that the consumer has not to pay in this matter. I say that he has, and not the fruit-grower or the jam manufacturer.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Would the honorable member like to be compelled to pay 40 per cent. on the raw materials of his manufactures?

Mr. PAGE.—If the honorable member did he would pass it on to the consumer.

Mr. HARPER.—I would.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is one against protection.

Mr. HARPER.—Is it against protection? I have never said, in any of my speeches on the subject, that the consumer does not pay a revenue duty; but I do say that it does not follow from that that he has to pay more than he would have to pay if he purchased imported articles. I am in a position to prove that, in the case of many of the articles to which I referred during the discussion on the Tariff, and on which there was a contest, that since the duty was imposed the price has gone down, as I predicted it would, for reasons which it would take me too long to explain now. I am sorry that there are not more of our honorable friends from New South Wales present this evening. I have been a politician for a long time, and when I began political life we were at about the same stage in Victoria as they have now reached in New South Wales. There was then here a strong, irreconcilable, dominating, and domineering body of free-traders, more extreme than Cobden ever was, and we had to fight them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Good free-traders.

Mr. HARPER.—Good free-traders, I admit, but very bad legislators. Until their guns were absolutely spiked by the knowledge supplied to them, they persisted in their efforts to block protection, and some of them to this day like to have a parting kick at the old question. If our friends on the Opposition side of the Chamber only knew the other side of the question, and would allow their minds to be permeated with views which they are not accustomed to read—

Mr. JOHNSON.—Because they know them too well.

Mr. HARPER.—The self-satisfied man is the hardest to convince that he has made a mistake.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member is all right.

Mr. HARPER.—The honorable member says that I am all right. I have been on both sides in this matter, and I will tell the Committee my experience. I am a little older than some of these honorable gentlemen. I was born in the middle of the free-trade controversy, and was brought up amongst, and saturated with free-trade doctrines. I inherited the great free-trade principle as I imbibed my mother's milk. I believed in the free-trade view, though I was never so extreme as some of my honorable friends, because that is not my nature. I was, however, a free-trader, but as I grew older, and perhaps wiser, I had reason to doubt the soundness of the free-trade position. I began to see that there was another side to the question, and I would like my honorable friends here to do the same. I began to discover that things did not exactly work out as they should according to free-trade theory, and I tried to get books to read on the subject of free-trade and protection. I knew John Stuart Mill, and I was aware of his famous exception clause, which, to my mind, breaks down his whole argument. He is free-trade to the hilt, but for that. I had also read all the other free-trade works; but I could not get an English book which would give me information on the other side of the question. I therefore sent to America, and also got books from Germany, and one or two from Italy. I saw that there was a very big field of knowledge, of which I had known nothing. I then read List's book, and I recommend it to my friends here, since I feel convinced, because of their cocksureness, that they have not read it. The result was that I began to doubt the correctness of my views on the fiscal question. In 1887, for the first time for thirty-five years, I returned to Scotland, my native land, and in the country towns which I knew in my school days, where there had been busy mills and cultivated fields, I found the mills abandoned and the fields turned into grazing land, and, most convincing argument of all, I passed on the road a big waggon loaded with bags of flour, marked Minnesota. I began to think that while free-trade may be a good thing for commerce, it is a bad thing for England. They are never, going to alter this state of affairs. Furthermore, I visited the big cities, which are busy manufacturing centres, and I found that the terms which were properly applied to our Victorian age, the other night were quite applicable to many of their factories. I then asked myself the question, Where, in fifty years time, will England get the labour required to carry on her manufactures, the districts having been depopulated by the destruction of the rural industries, the emigration of the people to other countries, and to the big cities? Thus I became a protectionist on the spot; in England, and in this country. If we wish to build up our industries, we must build them up on protectionist lines.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Forty per cent of the population of Victoria resides in the Melbourne bourne.

Mr. HARPER.—And what per cent of the population of New South Wales is to be found in Sydney?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—At all events, protection has not corrected the evil of the Melbourne bourne.

Mr. HARPER.—I wish that my honorable friends would open their minds and talk rationally to those who differ from them on this question, because I am sure that if they did they would get a great deal of light and information. As to the question of the people in the cities, I think that a movement of the age, commerce, free-trade and protectionism, is arising from moral and social reasons, the discussion of which I shall not leave to to-night?

JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has not referred to the fact that on has been leaving Victoria for years past.

HARPER.—I am a native of , and they say that Scotchmen are und everywhere; that they like their untry so little that they go else- I do not agree with the latter state- Many Scotchmen do well in Scotthen Western Australia has achieved great- ness; and why? Because 150,000 Vic- torians have gone there.

Mr. KELLY.—Did they leave Victoria because they were doing well?

Mr. HARPER.—The honorable member asks that question most innocently. I never yet met an enterprising man who had any pluck who was not prepared to go where he could better himself. I know of what is going on now. Men always seek the line of least resistance. Our Victorian farmers, for instance, finding that, owing to the high development which their industry has reached, the good markets which are open to producers, and the benefits of our protectionist Tariff, the land for which they paid £2 is now worth £10 per acre, are parting with their properties and going to New South Wales. A man who has 100 acres of land in Victoria, and finds that he can obtain £1,000 for it, makes up his mind to go to New South Wales or Queensland, where he can obtain 500 acres for the same money. He does not go because he is dissatisfied with his condition in Victoria, but because he thinks he can do better elsewhere.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is a very good thing for New South Wales.

Mr. HARPER.—Perhaps so. The honorable member may depend upon it that the Victorians who are going into New South Wales will shake things up there. I should like to say a word or two with regard to another point. The question of what is to be done with tropical Australia will ere long demand the most serious attention of this Parliament. We cannot play the part of the dog in the manger too long. I think that we shall not be allowed to do so, or, at least, that we shall have great difficulty in retaining our possessions, unless we make good use of them. I admired the poetical rhapsodies of the honorable member for Moreton in describing his State, and I agreed with a great deal that he said. Whilst it may be true that sugar can be grown in certain districts of Northern Queensland by white labour, other very important considerations will have to be dealt with. We shall have to solve the problem of how we can make the best use of that large tract of territory stretching right across the continent from the Queensland coast to the north-west coast of Australia, and lying between the 10th and 25th degrees of south latitude. We shall have to ascertain whether white men can work and thrive there, and it will be the duty of this Parliament to take some steps in that direction. I am not prepared to say how it shall be done, but no solution has been suggested by honorable members who have had experience in those northern latitudes. We find that in the Northern Territory of South Australia there are only 300 or 400 white people, although the settlement there has been in existence for many years. I recently looked at a map of the world, on Mercator's Projection, and followed the 10th and 25th degrees of south latitude to South Africa and South America. In Africa, I found that they enclosed a country which has been the home of the black races from time immemorial, and which, although invaded by northern races, such as the Assyrians, the Egyptians, and the Greeks, to-day bears no traces of any permanent settlement by white men. In the South American territory, between those degrees of latitude, we find the negroes who were imported, and the native Indians, the inhabitants of Portuguese blood being nearly all half-breeds. Whatever may be our views with regard to a White Australia, we cannot ignore these important facts, and steps should be taken as early as possible to solve the problem before us. It might be possible to establish, at different points, a number of settlements of white men, with their wives and children. We might insure good pay for such workmen, and offer them every reasonable facility for establishing their homes under reasonably good conditions. We should then ascertain what they could do, and how climatic influences would operate upon them and their children.

Mr. FISHER.—Croydon has been settled for twenty years.

Mr. HARPER.—I do not know anything about Croydon. It may be exceptionally well situated upon high ground.

Mr. FISHER.—No, its situation is a low one.

Mr. HARPER.—We should take reasonable means to ascertain whether that great tropical belt can be settled by white people. If it can be so settled, we should persist in our efforts to obtain men of the right class. It may be that Italians or Southern Europeans will be able to work there under conditions which would be intolerable to the men of our own race. I think it is due to the Commonwealth that the Government should give attention to this question, and seek to devise means of ascertaining how the country may be worked by white labour, and what the climate will have upon them. I thank the Committee for the kind remarks they have given me, and I trust that everything I have said will be regarded as a good part, as I had no desire to say anything that would hurt any one's feelings.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—As a result of personal explanation, I desire to say that it has been pointed out to me—it appears to me to be a very serious matter—that some remarks I made at an earlier stage of the discussion may be made to have a meaning different from that which I intended to convey. At the time I was speaking a considerable amount of interruption occurred. I am not as experienced a speaker as many of the older members in this Chamber, and one who knows me will understand that I would not for a moment seek to convey such meaning as that which can be placed upon my words. I said

I maintain that in the back-blocks we are bringing a class of people who are little better than blackfellows. They are constantly increasing in number, and as the result of their environment are producing a race of degenerates.

When I used the term "back-blocks" I perhaps did not fully appreciate the meaning which might attach to it. I was referring to our large station properties in the parts of Australia from which the men come—such, for instance, as the parts who went to South Africa. I have in my mind certain isolated districts away from the ranges where the children of the settlers so seldom see strangers, that when they do catch sight of them, they rush away, and hide behind a bush. I know of places where that occurs. I simply used that illustration in support of my argument that these people, as a result of their poverty and inferior environment, produce children who are not mentally as they otherwise would be.

Mr. R. EDWARDS (Oxley).—I wish to make a few remarks upon the Treasurer's Budget, even at the risk of being interrupted with a desire to waste time. I have never been accused of anything of that kind, but Ministerial supporters and charged members of the Opposition have been having adopted "stone-walling" tactics during the whole of the past week. I think it is absolutely no foundation for that statement. There has been no wilful any honorable member on this side of the Chamber. Any waste of time may have occurred has been entirely on the side of the honorable members opposite, and particularly to members of the Government. It is seldom indeed that more than one member is present in the Chamber, and I suppose I should feel highly disappointed, because there are no less than twenty Ministers listening to my remarks. I regret that they were not present to hear some of the very excellent speeches which have been delivered by honorable members on this side of the House—speeches to which no Minister has attempted to reply.

PAGE.—What is there to reply to?

MR. EDWARDS.—It is possible that honorable members opposite do not possess sufficient intelligence to enable them to appreciate an excellent speech when it is delivered. I am sorry to say that all assurances which have been submitted by the Government during the present session bear on their face the hall mark of the House of Deeds Hall. In this connexion I refer to the Commerce Bill and the Customs and Excise Bill. Members of the Opposition are opposed to socialistic legislation, and hence the criticism in which they have indulged, and which I maintain has been constant throughout. I repeat that if the business of Parliament has been defective, the fault rests entirely with Ministers. I contend that they have neglected their duties, and I resent the charge of mismanagement which has been levelled against Ministers of the Opposition. Personally I am very pleased when the Treasurer reports on the population of Australia. The question of how we can increase our population is one of immense importance to us, and when the right honorable gentleman reports that matter I naturally imagined he intended to outline some policy by which the Government hoped to attract to this country people from Great Britain and the Continent. But all that he said in this connexion was very disappointing. He said that since 1862 the flow of population to Australia had come to an abrupt

MR. JOHN FORREST.—I could not alter that.

MR. EDWARDS.—I do not find fault with the right honorable gentleman's report at all. Indeed, upon the whole, I think that his Budget was a very clear and intelligent exposition of our financial position. Referring to the question of population, he said—

On the 31st December, 1904, the population was 3,984,376, while on the 1st January, 1901, when the Commonwealth was established, it was 3,765,813—an increase in the four years of 218,563. But if we take into account the excess of births over deaths during that period, which was 223,009, we find that the departures actually exceeded the arrivals by 4,446. The flow of population into Australia was satisfactory, or fairly so, up to 1892. Then, however, it seems to have come to an abrupt stop, and it has remained practically at a standstill ever since. For the ten years, from 1882 to 1891, the excess of arrivals over departures was 372,832. In 1891 the excess was 28,794, but from 1892 to the end of 1904—a period of thirteen years—the departures exceeded the arrivals by 15,116. During the four years of Federation the departures have exceeded the arrivals, as I have said, by 4,446. Prior to 1881 there were 646,000 persons introduced into Australia wholly or partly at the expense of the various Governments; but State aid, as we all know, has practically ceased in this connexion for the last twenty years.

I believe that that is to a great extent correct. Very little Government assistance has been given to immigrants from the old land in recent years. The Treasurer went on to say that the whole question was a serious one, which we have to face. No doubt every honorable member could give his own reasons why the immigration has been so small. In my opinion the principal reason is the competition of the United States and Canada. I can quite believe that the attractions of Canada have had something to do with preventing emigrants coming to Australia, the distance of this country being so much greater than to Canada. But I do not think that the attraction of the United States has had much influence, because I take it for granted that British people, on removing from the old land, would prefer to go to a country under British rule.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—They go in thousands to the United States. For one emigrant who goes to Canada, 100 go to the United States.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—They are chiefly emigrants from the Continent of Europe.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—A great number go from Great Britain.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—Quite a large number, I freely admit. Australia was never more prosperous than when we had a stream of immigration arriving every three or four months. For the past three or four years we have been expecting the Commonwealth Government to do something to bring out to this country a good class of people to settle amongst us. There is room for them. No one will deny that. I am in accord with the Treasurer when he says that the whole question is serious, and that something ought certainly to be done. I agreed with the right honorable gentleman when he referred to the misrepresentation of Australia. It is most regrettable to hear an Australian decrying his own country. But at the same time the Federal Parliament, by passing such a measure as the Immigration Restriction Act, has done more to disparage the Commonwealth than anything that any individual has said. It is very unfortunate that we have placed upon our statute-book a measure calculated to occasion such incidents as those of the six potters, the six hatters, and the blind gentleman who landed at Hobart a few weeks ago. Since then there has been the case of the groom who secured for himself a ticket-of-leave to make sure that he would be allowed to land at Sydney with his horses.

Mr. BAMFORD. — That is another "Tozer" statement.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—No, Sir Horace Tozer had nothing to do with that incident.

Mr. WEBSTER. — What about Lady Tozer's "slavey"?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The taking out of an exemption certificate in the case of Lady Tozer's maid was simply a precaution on the part of Lady Tozer that there would be no difficulty in landing when she came out.

Mr. CULPIN.—What made Sir Horace Tozer say that the maid was a prohibited immigrant?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I think that, as a matter of fact, the lady has become a permanent resident of Australia, because on the voyage she became attached to a young man on board the steamer, married, and settled here.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Sir Horace Tozer told me that he would not alter the Act as far as concerns men.

Mr. R. EDWARDS. — I have nothing to do with Sir Horace Tozer, but it is certain that such restrictive legislation has not raised Australia in the estimation of any civilized nation. Indeed, we have become the laughing-stock of the whole world. About two years ago, I visited some eastern countries, and, through the kindness of the Japanese Consul at Townsville, I was given a few letters of introduction to public men in Japan, such as may be found in various cities, members of the Japanese Parliament, and one or two Ministers of the Crown. These gentlemen were extremely kind to me, and we became very friendly. At Tokio one day, when speaking to a Minister of the Crown, he said, "Mr. Edwards, you do not want any Japanese in Australia." I replied, "I should like to have some Japanese; I considered them to be a very good class of people." "No," he said, "you do not want any Japanese in Australia." "I said," he said, "your country is small, and you have a very large population, so you do not like 45,000,000. Australia is a small country—as large in area as the States of America—but our population is small, being about 4,000,000. We do not like you to send 5,000,000 or 10,000,000 Japanese to our country to swamp us out of Australia." "Sir," he said, "you do not want Japanese in Australia, but you do not want your own country's people either. What about the six hatters?" In Japan I found that they were quite familiar with the legislation of the Commonwealth Parliament. I discovered that the same was the case in Hong Kong. How can we expect emigrants to come here under those conditions? Is it likely that we can increase our numbers whilst we retain such legislation? What country would believe that? Australia is sincere in her desire to increase her population while such measures are on our statute-book? It is just as well that honorable members should understand that we have become ridiculous in the eyes of the world. It is well that we should know what other countries think of our legislation. Great Britain people are under the impression that no one is allowed to enter Australia without submitting to an aptitude test, and writing a sentence in Chinese words, perhaps in a language of which the immigrant cannot possibly be expected to know anything. I admit that is an error; but it is an impression which prevails in the old country, and therefore we correct that impression by doing away with the contract sections of our Immigration Restriction Act the better it will be. I wish to read a letter in which a educated Japanese gives his views of Australia. He says—

You Australians make great efforts. Your Parliaments borrow large sums of money for the purpose of dredging harbors, harfs, breakwaters, lighthouses, &c. You commercial agents to the East, and then as legislation which deliberately insults people with whom you are making these trade. You give your children pennies into the Sunday-school missionary boxes for the purpose of converting the heathen (and all the coloured races under that catechism, even after they have been converted, regard their presence as a degradation and disgrace, and their creation as a blunder. All the world to-day prays "Thy Kingdom come, and all be done on earth as it is in Heaven!" and all the (many of them coloured men) have their eyes fixed and looked forward to the time when the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord." There is not a professing Christian anywhere but must admit the inclusion of the heathen of every tribe and nation in the plan of salvation, which brings us to the untenable position that the alien may enter the land, but may not enter Australia. Truly, the policy of the wonderful "White Australia" leads us to some strange conclusions. It is enough to dwell for all eternity in Paradise with the Almighty, the Archangels, the Cherubim and Seraphim, the spirits of just men made perfect, the glorious company of the apostles and the noble army of martyrs; but—not enough to dwell on the same Continent with the C. Watson and the Australian Labour as the letter is a little extravagantly but it contains a good deal of truth. It shows what educated persons in the United Kingdom think of the legislation of which some of our members apparently are very

CULPIN.—The honorable member must not pretend that that is true?

R. EDWARDS.—It is perfectly true. If the honorable member knew the facts, he would not question the accuracy of the letter for a moment. I have no doubt that he and others think the Japanese are an uncivilized race; but as a matter of fact, they were civilized before there were any Englishmen, Scotchmen, or Welshmen. They have their Emperors as far back as the time of our Saviour. So far as civilization, science, and education go, we cannot say that we are superior to the Japanese. They come very much nearer home. A very interesting article was published in the Saturday Standard last; in fact, it was one of the best articles which have been published in that newspaper. It contains a great deal of sound common sense, and protests against Australia being fenced in, and a protest against persons coming into the territory. I shall content myself by reading the principal portions of the article—

The Australian Commonwealth is larger than the combined areas of Germany, Austria, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Scandinavia, and the British Islands. A mere sprinkling of people, numbering fewer than 5,000,000—

I think that it should have been under 4,000,000—have marked off for their exclusive use this vast territory, claiming more of the earth's surface than has served the needs of all the white races of Europe, except the Russians; and their main endeavour has been to stock its luxuriant native pastures with cattle and sheep. They have posted up the legend "a White Australia" on the boundaries of a rich continent, and they seem to expect the teeming populations of the yellow races to respect the notices. It may be taken as certain, however, that the surplus population of the 800,000,000 of the crowded East will need more than mere notices to keep them out of an empty Continent lying at their doors. This Continent is empty and adjacent to the swarming East, and any attempt to retain a monopoly of the country by simply fencing it in and running sheep and cattle upon it must ultimately end in failure. The policy of a "White Australia" can only be made successful by filling the country with a large population of white men.

Experience has conclusively proved that such a population cannot be obtained without an effort. The undesirable races will come without being asked, but it is different with Europeans, especially with those classes of Europeans who are most needed for the development of new countries. That stream of agricultural population which for more than a generation has been flowing into the United States, and which is now being partly diverted into Canada, has been promoted and maintained by strenuous and sustained efforts on the part of these countries. The forces which impel the surplus population of the old countries to emigrate are natural, but the destination of the immigrant is determined by artificial conditions; and the history of emigration shows that the agricultural settler especially goes to those countries which press upon him the most tempting inducements. The emigrating agriculturist with large or small capital does not explore the world in search of hidden land in unknown countries, but before he leaves home he knows where he is going, and he has been convinced by agencies maintained for the purpose that he is likely to better his condition.

That is a very sensible article, and some steps should be taken to bring out persons to occupy the immense areas of vacant land that we have. If the tropical and fertile lands of Queensland and South Australia are allowed to remain unoccupied for a number of years, is it not possible to imagine that they may be taken possession of by hordes of persons from some of the Eastern countries? Ten, aye, twenty million persons could easily be brought down from China and Japan. I believe that if they ever take possession of the northern lands of Australia they will make a very good thing out of them. We ought to make an effort to utilize these lands with white labour, as far as we possibly can; and even with the help of a limited number of coloured persons if it cannot be done otherwise. I notice that provision is made in the Estimates for the payment of £120,000 per annum to the Orient Company for a mail service between Sydney and Great Britain. I have no fault to find, except that the contract is for a service between Sydney and Great Britain. Why was not Brisbane included in the contract?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The contract was made by the late Ministry.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The present Government took over the responsibilities of their predecessors. We cannot call the late Government to account for anything they did, and we are justified in falling back upon the present Government. If Ministers found out that their predecessors did not do what was right to any State it was their duty to rectify the mistake. I hope that some step in that direction will yet be taken. This is not a mail contract entirely. It is just as much a service for the carrying of produce as it is a mail service, for provision was made in the form of tender that the steamers should provide refrigerating chambers, and make a fixed charge for carrying cargo. Had it been a mail service which ended at Adelaide. I do not think that Queensland could have offered any objection. It is a cargo service as much as it is a mail service; and, on that ground, I maintain that Brisbane should have been included as a port of call when tenders were invited. In my opinion, it was a mistake to call for alternative tenders, and I cannot understand how it was that Brisbane was not included in the first instance. Honorable members will have observed that since then the Premier of Queensland has been able to make arrangements with the Orient Company to run their boats to Brisbane once a fortnight, in return for an annual payment of £26,000.

Mr. BAMFORD.—What Queensland wants is a Torres Straits service.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I wish that the Premier of Queensland, instead of offering a subsidy of £26,000, had offered to pay £40,000 or £50,000 for a direct service from Brisbane, along the northern coast to Java, and across the Indian Ocean, such as there was some years ago. For double the amount which Queensland has now to pav, I think that State could have had a service of first-class steamers independently of the Commonwealth Government. Having regard to the late may I ask that progress be reported, and that I may be permitted to resume my remarks to-morrow.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at 11.3 p.m.

House of Representatives

Thursday, 7 September, 1900.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK presented a petition from the Executive Committee of the Fruitgrowers' Union of New South Wales, praying the House to amend the Commerce Bill, to prevent injury being done to the trade in perishable produce.

Petition received.

KALGOORLIE TO PORT AUGUSTA RAILWAY.

Mr. MAHON.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister a question without delay. Has his attention been directed to the discussion in the South Australian Parliament reported in this morning's news wherein doubt is expressed as to whether a pledge had been given by South Australia prior to the Federation that the Commonwealth would permit the construction of the continental railway through its territory? In view of the defective memory of certain South Australian politicians, would the Prime Minister draw the attention of the Premier of the State to a letter, dated 1900, by the then Premier of South Australia to the then Premier of Western Australia, in the following terms:—

Premier's Office,
Adelaide, 1st February,

Sir,

Following our conversation as to the blocking of a construction of railway line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta by the Commonwealth, authority, by South Australia refusing to consent rendered necessary by section 34 of the Constitution of the Commonwealth Bill to the construction of the line through her territory, I regret the withholding of consent as a most important thing; in fact, quite out of the question.

To assure you of our attitude in the matter, I will undertake, as soon as the Federation ished, West and South Australia both being of the Commonwealth, to introduce a Bill giving the assent of this province to construction of the line by the Federal authority and to pass it stage by stage simultaneously with the passage of a similar Bill in your Parliament.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. W. HOLDER.

DEAKIN.—I well recollect the now that it has been read, and feel that when the Premier of South Australia consults the papers necessary for the consideration of this matter, he will have more him.

MAHON.—He appeared to know of it last night.

DEAKIN.—It might suggest a of acquaintance on his part with the of his predecessor, if he were asked.

MAHON.—His own words suggest lack of acquaintance.

DEAKIN.—I have no doubt that honorable member's action in putting question, and reading the letter, on the being telegraphed to South Australia will achieve the end he has in view.

PROFESSIONAL REGISTRATION AND EDUCATION.

WILSON.—I wish to know if the on of the Prime Minister has been ad to an address, given by Mr. Syme, Adelaide Medical Congress, on the ation and education of medical men, whether he will consider the advisa- of taking steps, by preparing an ment of the Constitution, or in some way, to bring about a uniform sys- registration and education for medi- and the members of the legal and learned professions throughout the onwealth? It seems to me eminently ole to do so.

DEAKIN.—The question is one upon as a layman, I feel incompetent to s an opinion; but if the Congress e medical profession throughout the onwealth prefer a request on the sub- will receive the grave consideration it will require.

LIFE INSURANCE.

CROUCH.—Has the attention of ime Minister been directed to state- in the English newspapers which sworn statements made in New to the effect that an American life ce society, whose name I do not wish to give, doing a large business in the Commonwealth, is practically insolvent? Is he further aware that the German Imperial Government have taken steps to impound the assets of that company, in order to protect German policy-holders? Has the honorable and learned gentleman given the matter consideration, in the interests of Australian policy-holders?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I had not gathered that the statements were as serious as the honorable and learned member indicates. The Commonwealth Parliament has not yet legislated in regard to insurance, but an honorable member has given notice of his intention to introduce a measure.

Mr. CROUCH.—No; a notice of motion affirming the advisability of legislation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The matter will receive consideration when that motion is dealt with, and in anticipation of the discussion I shall have the necessary information collected.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The German Government is adverse to all American insurance companies.

TRADE DESIGNS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Whether the Government intend this session to introduce a measure dealing with trade designs?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If time permits.

STATE-OWNED STEAMERS.

Debate resumed from 24th August (vide page 1451), on motion by Mr. SPENCE, for Mr. THOMAS—

1. That a Select Committee of both Houses of Parliament be appointed to make full inquiry as to the advisability of the Federal Government owning and controlling a fleet of steamers for the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom. The Committee, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, to consist of Mr. Glynn, Mr. Mahon, Mr. McDonald, Mr. McWilliams, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Webster, and the mover, and to have power to send for persons, papers, and records. Four to be the quorum.

2. That the foregoing resolution be transmitted by message to the Senate and their concurrence requested in the appointment of the Committee, and asking them to appoint members to serve thereon.

Upon which Mr. DEAKIN had moved, by way of amendment—

That the words "of both Houses of Parliament," lines 1 and 2; "the advisability of the Federal Government owning and controlling a fleet of steamers for," lines 3 and 4; "so far as the House of Representatives is concerned," lines 7 and 8; and paragraph 2, be left out.

And upon which had been moved, by way of further amendment,

By Mr. ROBINSON—

That the words "Mr. Robinson" be left out.

By Mr. THOMAS—

That the words "Mr. Glynn" and "Mr. Webster" be left out with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "Mr. Chanter" and "Mr. Gibb"; and that the words "Mr. Storrer" be inserted.

By Mr. BATCHELOR—

That the words "Mr. McWilliams" be left out with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "Mr. Henry Willis."

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—I thank the House for having given me permission to continue my remarks on this motion to-day; but I do not intend to occupy much time in doing so. When I last spoke, I referred to the need for some such inquiry as is asked for, and said that the report of the Commission appointed in Western Australia to deal with these very matters, as they affect that State, will be useful to the Commonwealth Committee, if it be appointed, as I hope it will be. I also mentioned the fact that it had transpired that on account of the existence of a certain shipping ring, or ring of shipping brokers, freights to Australia were very much higher, and that there appeared to be no means of dealing with the combination, whose operations were tending to increase the prices of commodities to the Australian consumer. I desire to make one further reference to the report of the Commission for the benefit of honorable members opposite, who are evidently inclined to cavil at the appointment of the proposed Committee. Among other things, the Commission state, "A large number of importers gave evidence in support of Government intervention." I should like to commend those few words to the attention of honorable members opposite, who are supposed to represent importing and commercial interests in particular. It is clearly shown that the importers of Western Australia have got into the grip of the shipping combine to such an extent that, even with all their objections to Government intervention, they are compelled to state publicly that they see no other way of dealing with the evil. I could point out how the Government of Western Australia has been mulcted of thousands of pounds per annum through the operations of the shipping ring, but as that subject will fall within the scope of the work of the Committee, it is not now necessary to refer to it, and as I believe that the evil which exists in Western Australia is to be found in greater degree throughout the Commonwealth, I think the best thing that can be done is to arrange for a full inquiry.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I wish to add a few words in support of the motion. The Queensland Government have taken certain steps with regard to this matter, and I wish to quote from a letter recently written by Mr. T. C. Beirne, of Brisbane, who is now in London, to Mr. Frank McDonnell, a member of the State Legislature, describing the conditions under which he endeavored to bring about an improvement in the arrangements of the shipping combine. It has been preventing certain shipping companies from taking cargo from London to Brisbane. Under present arrangements, certain steamers are obliged to discharge their Brisbane cargo at Sydney, and then to come to Brisbane empty in order to load cargo for London. Mr. Beirne calls this a "great evil." Mr. Hughes, and he describes the position as follows:—

"We called on Mr. Hughes, who knows the land well, and is well known there by name, is, or was, chairman of Geddes, Birt, and Co., of South Brisbane. When Mr. Dobree inquired of him, and shortly stated the object I had in view, in calling on him, he said, 'What have you to do with the Aberdeen steamers—what have you to do with the Queenslanders for Queensland or for Queenslanders? I hate the Queenslanders; I hate it. I hate the people; it is unjust and unfair.'"

Mr. WATSON.—That was said by the chairman of the ring.

Mr. CULPIN.—Yes. Mr. Beirne says further:—

"I helped to open up your country, and I have got steamers. I was not satisfied with the result, so I still further help you. I invested £10,000 in building refrigerating and cold storage works, and what return or what thanks have I got for it? You? My steamers always paid their harbor dues, and are paying them now. I have got no rebate or consideration from you or your Government; but directly a new steamer comes along you receive him with open arms and free docks. Is that right? Is that fair? Is that honest? And now I hear that you Queensland Government are going to stop the refrigerating works and cold storage of goods at Pinkenba."

This shows the shamefully unfair position taken up by the ring, and I trust that the inquiry will be conducted by a select committee, with some satisfactory results.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I shall support the motion. I cannot see that any harm can result from the proposed inquiry; but, on the other hand, I conceive that much good may be done.

the time I was in charge of the administration of postal matters, I experienced a good deal of trouble with the mail carrying companies, and had great difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory arrangement with regard to the English mail service. Honorable members know full well how the Government were treated. Ten years before the English mail service had been taken over the late Government took no but no satisfactory response was given and we were eventually compelled to enter into a contract for a service at £100 per annum, although we considered that we should have secured what was required for a considerably smaller sum. In view of the fact that the present contract expires in about two years—on January, 1908—it will be well for the committee to inquire as to what steps should be taken by the Government in relation to mail services in the future. It is necessary for the Postmaster-General to give notice two years before the expiration of the contract. I had no objection to that condition, because we could give notice of our intention to determine the contract without in any way prejudicing our position, in the event of our subsequently deciding to continue the arrangement. It is unfortunate that negotiations for a new contract of this service should have been delayed until the last possible moment. Honorable members are aware, tenders for the existing English mail service were received for only about three months prior to the expiry of the old contract. It was practically impossible for the late Government to conclude a satisfactory arrangement for the carriage of our mails, and they were forced to limit their negotiations to one company. If they had had a couple of years in which to make arrangements, I believe it is quite possible that they might have entered into a better contract from the stand-point of the Commonwealth. That remark applies, not only to the service for the carriage of our English mails, but to other services. Honorable members will recollect that the contract for the Vancouver mail service expired about the same time as that with the Oceanic Company. The late Government experienced some trouble with the Oceanic Steam-ship Company. These three contracts had practically to be renewed at the last moment. It is not fair, either to the Government or to the Parliament, that negotiations for fresh mail contracts should be deferred until within a few months of the expiration of existing contracts. I believe that there is a great deal to be said in favour of the Vancouver service. I recognise that the chief difficulty experienced in connexion with that service is the period that is occupied in delivering the mails. But as trade increases we shall doubtless be able to obtain a quicker service. At any rate, the Vancouver service is very much more likely to be free from complications than is that via Suez. I believe that if a Select Committee be appointed to investigate this matter its members will acquire a fund of information which will prove of material assistance to the Government in dealing with our mail services in the future. At present we have no contract with the Oceanic Steam-ship Company. That company carries our mails upon the poundage system, and we have experienced a lot of trouble with its directors, who think that they should receive a higher sum than that which it is at present being paid. I am of opinion that the proposed committee would be able to elicit from the shipping companies very valuable information, which it is impossible for any Government to secure. Consequently I welcome this proposal. No possible harm can accrue from the appointment of a committee, and I think that much good ought to result from its inquiries. Such an investigation should result in the acquisition of valuable information which will be of material assistance to any Government in calling for fresh tenders for our mail services generally.

Mr. WILSON (Corangamite).—If it were intended to appoint the proposed committee for the purpose indicated by the honorable member for Macquarie, there might be something to be said in favour of the motion. But I would point out that its mover has expressed his desire to proceed with the inquiry only on condition that the advisability or otherwise of the Federal Government owning and controlling a fleet of steamers for the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom, be also investigated.

Mr. SPENCE.—The amendments proposed by the Prime Minister have been accepted.

Mr. WILSON.—I quite understand that. But the honorable member for Barrier has distinctly stated that he would not persist in his motion unless the matter to which I have referred was also to be inquired into.

Mr. SPENCE.—Would the honorable member exclude an inquiry of that kind?

Mr. WILSON.—Yes; I think that it is altogether undesirable.

Mr. WATSON.—One of the leading merchants of Melbourne recently declared that it was necessary to establish a line of State-owned steamers, in order to give the merchants a chance.

Mr. WILSON.—I am glad to learn that the honorable member for Bland is winning over to his side the leading merchants of Melbourne.

Mr. WATSON.—They are coming over gradually.

Mr. WILSON.—I congratulate the honorable member upon his conquest. Another objection to this motion is that it is inadvisable to appoint so many Select Committees and Royal Commissions. One of the most serious errors into which our States Parliaments fell some years ago was that of appointing Select Committees and Royal Commissions to inquire into almost every conceivable subject under the sun.

Mr. STORRER.—They did good work.

Mr. WILSON.—The fact remains that in many cases the result of their exhaustive inquiries is buried in the archives of the House.

Mr. SPENCE.—Did not the Butter Commission accomplish good work?

Mr. WILSON.—I do not say that some Select Committees and Royal Commissions have not achieved great results. I admit that the Butter Commission did admirable work, and that those who are interested in the dairying industry rejoice in its finding. We rejoice that the result of that inquiry was to expose the roguery which has been carried on in the trade. Those who are connected with the industry at its source were glad to have themselves cleared from all imputations of dishonesty.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Then why not be consistent, and vote for this motion?

Mr. WILSON.—To my mind the proposed committee would be a frivolous one. It would merely mean an increased expenditure on behalf of this Parliament, and therefore I protest against it.

Amendments agreed to.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

Resolved—

That a Select Committee be appointed to make full inquiry as to the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom. The Committee to consist of Mahon, Mr. McDonald, Mr. Henry Willis,

Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Gibb, Mr. Storrer, and the mover have power to send for persons, papers, and records. Four to be the quorum.

SEA CARRIAGE OF GOODS

Motion by Mr. DEAKIN (CAMERON) agreed to—

That a return be laid on the table of showing the amount of trade in periodicals between the Commonwealth and during the three years before the Sea of Goods Act came into operation, the items to be specified, and to show for the quantity and value of each item; and particulars since the Act came into operation.

SLANDERS ON AUSTRALIA

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I

1. That the persistent misrepresentation of the legislative and administrative machinery of the Commonwealth reflects unjustly on the character of the Australian people, and operates prejudicially to the progress of the Commonwealth by checking immigration and impairing the confidence of the States in the estimation of British foreign investors.

2. That, it being expedient to remove erroneous and injurious impressions created by misrepresentation, this House requests the Minister, pending the appointment of a Commissioner for the Commonwealth—

(a) To confer with the Agents-General of the States in devising a more effective method of periodically placing before the people of the United Kingdom unbiased particulars of the legislation, administrative machinery, and sources of Australia (or) and

(b) To invite the leading newspaper associations of the United Kingdom to jointly nominate three representatives to visit Australia; conveying to them an invitation and assurance that the facilities required would be afforded by gentlemen to conduct such a mission as they might deem fit to represent the position of Australia, and place it into the charge that our legislative and administrative policy unduly restricts the incoming of reputable workmen and grants suitable for the work of the nation.

This motion is certainly one of the most importance; but as I did not anticipate the failure of other honorable members to proceed with motions on this paper having precedence of my own, I am not prepared to speak to it just now. In these circumstances, I would request the Prime Minister to consent to the motion being discussed on a day set apart for Government business. Unless he is prepared to grant my request, I shall have to ask that the adjourned debate on the order of the day for 10th October next be in view of the importance of the subject.

fact that the legislation and administration of the Commonwealth is constantly being subjected to misrepresentation, I think that the Prime Minister should endeavour to set apart an afternoon for discussion at an early date.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Rather than do that, we are so pressed for time, I should be happy to accept the motion now, if the honorable member would agree to omit paragraph b and to slightly modify paragraph a. I think that in the form I have indicated the motion would express all that we desire.

Mr. MAHON.—I submitted paragraphs a and b as alternative proposals, and am prepared to abide by the decision of the House in regard to them. I recognise that the Prime Minister has already done much in the direction suggested in paragraph a; the alternative proposal is worthy of the attention of the Government. It practically extends an invitation to the newspapers that have been libelling Australia to send representatives here to investigate the position of the Commonwealth, and to inquire more particularly into the effect of our legislative and administrative policies. The passing of the motion will prove that Australia has nothing to hide, and that we are conducting an impartial investigation. If the invitation were accepted, it would be a magnificent advertisement for the Commonwealth. While I feel grateful to the Prime Minister for the offer he has made, I certainly cannot consent to eliminate paragraph b from the motion, since it is, in my mind, the more important of the two propositions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It contains contentious matter, which would be argued, while paragraph a does not.

Mr. MAHON.—That being the view of the Prime Minister, I ask leave to continue my speech at a future date.

Leave granted; debate adjourned.

COMMONWEALTH NAVAL EXPENDITURE.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I move—

That whereas the command of the seas in time of war is essential to the security of the Empire's interests on, and beyond, the seas; and whereas this command cannot be assured by separate squadrons acting independently on behalf of each section of the Empire; and whereas the United Kingdom, which has hitherto borne practically unassisted the burden of Imperial naval defence, will sooner or later be unable to continue to make sufficient provision against the rapidly increasing naval armaments of foreign powers, this House is of opinion—

1. That all naval expenditure by the Commonwealth of Australia should be towards an Imperial Navy, on the efficiency and adequacy of which in time of war will depend her security from serious danger; and
2. That the Commonwealth of Australia's contribution to the Imperial Navy should be doubled.

At the outset I express my regret that it has fallen to the lot of a private member to move a motion of such importance as that which I now have the honour to submit. It is the more regrettable, because, unfortunately throughout the country, and in certain sections of the press, the importance of a motion is gauged, not so much by the arguments used in support of it, as by the source from which those arguments have emanated. I do not wish to refer further to this phase of the question, except to again express my regret that it should have fallen to my lot to move such a motion. As I hold these views, I may be asked, "Then why move the motion?" But, the fact of the matter is, that such a crusade of activity on behalf of the false principle of a separate Australian Navy has been inaugurated throughout the Commonwealth, in the course of the last few months, that it is absolutely essential that the other side—the truly national side—should be put, no matter how ineffectively, at the first opportunity.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member's motion means that he has no confidence in Australia.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member will see before I resume my seat that I have every confidence that Australia can, and will, do her duty.

Mr. CARPENTER.—This motion says the opposite.

Mr. KELLY.—It certainly does not.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I say that it does.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member for Fremantle will have an opportunity to speak later on.

Mr. KELLY.—My honorable friend perhaps knows so much about this subject that he may be able to decide what is in my mind, and what is not. If he will only remain quiet, he will hear that I have founded this motion on views which have been acceptable in all ages to military opinion, and are not likely to be upset on the mere ipse dixit of the honorable member for Fremantle. The motion does not attempt to deal with the question of what share Australia should bear in the obligation of Imperial defence; it merely lays down the principle that all naval contributions must be to one central authority.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The second sub-paragraph goes further.

Mr. KELLY.—It goes further, for a reason that I shall state towards the conclusion of my speech. I am not particular about that in the least. The main point is contained in the first sub-paragraph—that all naval expenditure should be made to one central authority, which should be made responsible for the protection of every member of the British family. Honorable members will see that one of the reasons given in this motion as to why Imperial naval defence is essential is the vast interests of the Empire, both on and beyond the seas. I shall first put very briefly the position of the Empire to-day, in relation to the interests it has on the seas, and in keeping command of them in order to be able to render help to various sections as occasion may arise. Our Empire has sprung from one parent stem, which, though geographically speaking, the smallest section, is still by far the most powerful section of the Empire. From that parent stem seedlings of the race to which we are all so proud to belong have gone over seas to every corner of the world, and wherever friendly fruitful territory has been offered have implanted themselves. Just as the British people have been able to make their Empire by the mastery of the seas, so they have developed it under the same protection. It is only through this command of the seas that we in Australia have been free hitherto to devote ourselves to the development of our territories without consideration of the graver problems of national existence. If this national security is guaranteed for another generation, or for a couple of generations, there are no bounds to the possibilities of development in our great Empire. At the present time the United Kingdom, with an area of only 121,000 square miles, is able to carry a population of 42,000,000, and, including specie and bullion, an external trade of over £1,000,000,000. The self-governing Colonies—and these are the main buttresses of the Empire, and must be the first parts of it to accept their full obligations of partnership—have an area of over 7,000,000 square miles, with a population of less than 14,000,000, and have reached an oversea trade of over £290,000,000. It is obvious to honorable members that immense development may easily be made by the Empire if the essential for present security and future expansion—the command of the seas—is maintained. The question is whether this security is likely to be maintained for the Empire on the basis on which it now rests. The very existence of the self-governing Colonies, the high seas, and on which they depend for national prosperity, must make them pay a considerable price thereon. But, if this were not the case, the very existence of all our scattered peoples would demand that the seas be kept open in time of war, since otherwise it would be possible for whomsoever he wished to take the control of the seas, to concentrate his forces, on whatever section he wished to crush it. The principle that should govern every section of the Empire in dealing with these matters is first to insure a united front being put forward by every branch of the British peoples, if one section is no longer able to maintain unassisted its task, powerful enough to insure the fulfilment of this first supreme duty which is the duty of the governments of these different sections—to their peoples—the maintenance of the control of the seas in time of war must be faithfully carried out. This consideration especially affects Australia. At the present time throughout our territories there are persons who are either regarding the fact that Great Britain will not continue for all time to discharge her great Imperial responsibility, or are regarding the fact that the defence of an island continent must be by sea. These people—and a league was formed in Sydney only the other day—were proposing some system of manhood citizenship. But it is obvious that such a system, although a splendid one in well-populated countries, could be of no use in a sparsely populated country like Australia. It is obvious that this citizen soldiery could not be concentrated on the points threatened, could not, for instance, be moved to the defence of Western Australia or Port Phillip.

Mr. MAHON.—Not without the railway.

Mr. KELLY.—Not without the railway, or even with the railway.

Mr. MAHON.—Give us the railway, and we will take the risk.

Mr. KELLY.—Now our partnership of free peoples with the mother country, which is the of the whole Imperial fabric, six self-governing States, of which the Commonwealth is one, the great Possession India, with its dependencies, eleven important Possessions with partial self-government, eighteen Crown Colonies, two territories administered under charter, and seven protectorates. That is the reserve which we should be able to draw for our defence. Certain sections of that reserve, however, are obviously outside our control. But after the mother country has hitherto borne this high responsibility, there is not the slightest doubt that the six great self-governing Colonies have the biggest interest in the maintenance of our Empire and our individual freedom, and also the big capacity to contribute to the general defence. The great majority of all these Possessions have extensive sea-boards. All of them are faced by the ocean, and certainly to an invader be most accessible from that quarter if it were not for our Imperial control of the seas. It is clear, then, that any hostile expedition against any one section of the Empire can be attacked on the sea either at its point of departure or at the point of arrival. It is clear that if Australia, relying upon our navy "for defence only," were attacked, the attack would be in vain, resisted by the navies "for defence only" of Canada or South Africa. It is consequently, clear that if the Empire fails to present a united front to attack, each section will be taken piecemeal and destroyed at the enemy's leisure. It is obvious, then, that our only hope of defence is to attack the enemy when he is at his own bases; and the only chance to make such an attack fairly likely to succeed is by all sections of the British Empire combining together, contributing to a common navy under one control—a navy capable of blockading the coasts of whatever enemy or combination of enemies may threaten the existence or the integrity of our Empire. This fact has been acknowledged, and made clear by one who has studied the subject. The advocates of an Australian Navy recognise the essentiality of making the Australian coastline our frontier in time of war. It is admitted, further, as Captain Jellicoe says, that—

The great end of a war fleet is not to chase, but to control the seas. When speed, power, is a reliance, destruction may be postponed, but can be escaped only by remaining in port. . . . Not speed, but power of offensive action, is the dominant factor in war.

This very self-evident truth has led to a classification of all war fleets into—first, ships destined to act in common, which are called battleships by every people; ships that sacrifice speed to offensive and defensive power within their own units.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Speed is very necessary in the case of an attack by submarines.

Mr. KELLY.—Not very necessary, because no submarine has been able to exceed ten knots, and even battleships steam nineteen. It is the necessity for "controlling" the seas which has led to the designing of certain ships which are destined to act in common. It is admitted that those ships are the vessels which will decide the command of the sea. In addition to those, are other ships which are required to act as eyes and ears of the fleet, as may be necessary. Then other ships are required to protect our scattered floating commerce from the enemy's commerce destroyers. The class of ships, however, upon which the control of the sea depends, is the battleships class—ships destined to act in common. It is universally admitted that only an Imperial effort can furnish us with battleships sufficiently effective to maintain the control of the sea. It has been recognised, however, that these Imperial battleships, that will in time of war make it their objective at once to move on the enemy's bases and lock up his vessels in port, may be evaded by fast cruisers of the enemy slipping through this blockade with a view to afterwards preying upon our commerce. The Admiralty proposes to meet this contingency by an especially large construction of cruisers of different classes. It admits that an enemy's ships will occasionally be able to get through, and that, therefore, it is necessary to protect our floating trade and the different naval bases of the Empire throughout the world; but it also says that these raiding ships will play the part of the hunted more than that of hunters. They will be kept constantly on the move. For every cruiser of a possible enemy we are to have three or four—presuming that we have only one enemy—doing the work of hunting them down. It is obvious then that the enemy's cruisers would not be able to hold their own for more than a very brief period in any part of the world. Our own fleets are allotted so that an enemy's ships can be marked off and tracked down the moment war breaks out; wherever they appear word will be sent, and England's ships will be despatched after them. Therefore, the only thing that is necessary for us—this is the idea of the Imperial Navy School of to-day—is to make safe harbors of refuge throughout the world, wherein on the advent of such raiding cruisers, and during the brief periods of their visits, our own merchant shipping may shelter for the time being. I should like to give the House a few figures to show that the Imperial authorities have not been uncognizant of their responsibilities in this regard. The United Kingdom has building and built at the present time, 42 first-class cruisers, as compared with 33 by the next three naval powers combined, namely, France, Germany, and the United States. Great Britain has building and built 38 second-class cruisers, as contrasted with 24 second-class cruisers by the next three powers combined. Great Britain has 69 third-class cruisers—these being the eyes and ears of the fleet—as contrasted with 68 by the other three powers combined. So that, as far as cruiser strength goes, Great Britain has made the most generous allowance for the protection of her floating commerce in time of war.

MR. JOHNSON.—They are cruisers built for speed, and for the special purpose of protecting commerce?

MR. KELLY.—The cruisers that will be mainly used in this business of hunting down commerce destroyers, are first-class cruisers specially built for that purpose.

MR. JOHNSON.—I presume that that number does not include mail steamers, which may be used in time of war?

MR. KELLY.—No. Other powers may also use converted mail steamers. The point which I wish to make clear is that a great preponderance, as compared with the strength of other powers, has been maintained by Great Britain, in respect of cruisers which would be employed upon the duty of hunting down raiding ships. England has now no less than 42 first-class cruisers, whilst Germany has 6, France 14, and the United States 13. From this it is clear that the Imperial authorities are discharging their responsibilities in this regard in a way that is highly creditable. The Empire's main objective, however, is not to seek to evade the pin-pricks of passing raiding cruisers, but to secure inviolability from invasion of the different sections of the Empire throughout the world. That can be maintained only by battle fleets does not matter how many cruisers there are on the high seas, because, wherever fleets appear, cruisers have to leave. It is clear at once to honorable members if we attempt to keep up communication means of cruisers, without the aid of battle fleets, any battle fleet of the enemy, upon the ports of destination, will be able to intercept all our commerce. That is interference in passing to the absolute necessity for battle fleets, on which the Empire inevitably rests. Having the objectives of the Empire, it is reasonable to concentrate all our forces on those objectives, so that the Empire's interests may be fairly secure when the crisis arises. Captain Mahan has said in this connexion:—

War cannot be made without running the gauntlet. When you have chosen your field for action, you must concentrate on it, letting your interests take their chance.

Then he goes on to justify the proposition in the following words:—

To do this, however, men must have courage, and conviction must rest upon knowledge, or else ignorant clamour and contagion will sweep away every reasonable test of military experience.

That is the position briefly, and it is not to be feared, rather ineffectively put, from the point of view of the Imperial Navy School. What do the Australian advocates recommend? And if they do they depart from the principles laid down? All Australian Navy advocates admit the essentiality of the control of the seas in time of war; and they admit that that control can only be maintained by an Imperial, or, as they say, a British, fleet acting off the coast of the enemy. They appear to think that this naval control can be assured by the land acting alone in the future, just as it has been assured and maintained in the past. Is that presumption fair?

MR. CARPENTER.—The honorable member is the first one I have heard of making a presumption.

MR. KELLY.—The honorable member is reading must, I think, have been a little more meagre. If he had taken the trouble to read, first of all, the series of lectures written by the chief exponent of the Australian naval system, Senator Mahan, he would have seen that pres-roughout. And, further, the honorable member will find the same presumption in every report of Captain Creswell. I can only attribute the interjection to want of knowledge of the facts. What I ask now is whether this presumption is a true one. We know that the potentialities of naval armament depend on the commercial capacity of the people maintaining that armament. We know that England, all through the last century, enjoyed a trade security and confidence, first of all, through having possession of the seas, and, secondly, through not being subject to the wars, rumours of wars, revolutions, and invasions which harassed enterprise on the Continent from 1515 to 1870. Since 1870, however, foreign powers have been catching up by leaps and bounds the great lead which England obtained through enjoying local commercial security at the beginning of the steam age, when the great expansion of commercial enterprise in the world commenced. The immense advance recently made in this connexion by Germany and the United States has been the subject of very keen, and almost bitter, controversy in England during the last few years. It is not possible for England, with her small area of only 120,000 square miles, and her comparatively small population of some 42,000,000, to be always in a position to be richer than any two or three powers combined. How can England, with her small area and population, hope to be always in a better position commercially—and, therefore, materially and militarily so far as potentialities go—than Germany, with 211,000 square miles, and a population of 56,000,000, or the United States, with over 3,000,000 square miles, and a population that is possible of almost unlimited expansion? It is only a question of time when foreign powers will find it possible to outvie England for the command of the seas. What is the actual position of England's naval efforts, as contrasted with the efforts of foreign powers? The estimated expenditure for the years 1894-5, 1899-1900, and 1904-5—these are quinquennial periods, but the expenditure applies, of course, only to the single years—on the part of Great Britain, Germany, and the United States, are as follows:—The total estimated expenditure in Great Britain in 1894-5 was over £17,360,000, as contrasted with an estimated expenditure in Germany of £4,137,000, and in the United States of £5,577,000; the estimated expenditure in Great Britain in 1899 had increased to £26,594,000, as contrasted with £6,485,000 in Germany, and £9,678,000 in the United States; and in 1904-5 the estimated expenditure in Great Britain had increased to no less a burden than £36,889,000, as contrasted with £11,059,000 in Germany, and the extraordinary increase in the United States to £21,137,000. In the ten years, while the naval expenditure of Great Britain increased from £17,366,000 to £36,889,000, the increase in Germany was from £4,137,000 to £11,059,000, and in the United States it was from £5,577,000 to £21,137,000. These figures show that England is being very rapidly caught up in the race for naval supremacy. Perhaps the figures are more significant if the contrast be made with the expenditure of the two great powers combined. While in 1894 the expenditure of Great Britain was £17,366,000, that of the two powers was £9,714,000; in 1899, while the expenditure in Great Britain was £26,594,000, that of the two powers was £16,163,000; and in 1904-5, while the expenditure of Great Britain was £36,889,000, that of the two powers was £32,197,000. It is very clear, from those simple figures, that foreign armaments are rapidly catching up the British armament; and unless Great Britain is assisted in some way, the command of the seas must inevitably be wrested from the British Empire. In the matter of new construction, the figures will be found to vary in somewhat similar proportions. In 1894-5 Great Britain spent £4,814,000 on new construction, whilst the two Powers just referred to spent just over £3,177,000. In 1904-5 Great Britain spent £12,098,000, and the two Powers £10,922,102. In this there is a further indication that England's supremacy is by no means as assured as some honorable members seem to think. Now, how has Great Britain maintained her position in the matter of actual ships? I have already shown the House that superiority in battle-ships is the only test of actual power to control the seas. How has England maintained her position in this regard? England now has no less than 41 battle-ships, as compared with 41 battle-ships possessed by the next three Powers combined—France, Germany, and the United States. In 1905, therefore, the power of Great Britain in respect of battle-ships is equal with that of the next three Powers combined.

year, 1906, Great Britain will have 45 battle-ships, as contrasted with 50 battle-ships possessed by the next three Powers. She will, therefore, by that time, have dropped out of the running when opposed to a combination of the next three Powers. In 1907 the position will be still more alarming, because England will then have only 48 battle-ships, as contrasted with 63 battle-ships possessed by the next three Powers, and she will in that year have lost any hope of successfully coping with a combination of those three Powers. But ship for ship, she will be almost unable to cope with the next two Powers combined. Between them, in 1907, they will possess 46 battle-ships, whilst England will possess only 48. When honorable members recognise that it has been definitely laid down that it requires, generally speaking, at least six battle-ships to blockade four, it will be obvious to them that in 1907 it will be impossible for the United Kingdom to maintain that blockade of the foreign ports of two combining Powers which is essential to the protection of the sea-carried wealth of the whole Empire.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member's statements show what nonsense that doctrine is, when it is analysed.

Mr. KELLY.—That may be the honorable member's opinion. I now come to deal with what will probably concern the honorable member for Fremantle. If the facts to which I have been referring were not in themselves worthy of our serious consideration, we have, in this part of the world, a new problem to consider in dealing with the defence of Australia. We are now within striking distance of one of the world's great naval Powers. Before the late war the naval armaments of Russia and Japan could not well be withdrawn from the far East from fear of the consequences to either of those Powers resulting from the absence of its navy from those waters. But now Japan has a very powerful fleet, and as it has no other fleet to watch in the Eastern waters, it can be sent anywhere, and it is capable of doing very much, far more than we in Australia could ever hope to cope with. I hope that such a thing will never come to pass; but let us suppose, for argument's sake, that England and Japan, instead of being allied, will, in 1907, be at war. I select 1907, because that is a fixed date at which we are in a position to calculate the number and power of the vessels which each of these nations will have. Let us suppose that in 1907 England is at war with Japan, and that there are complications ensuing with several other Powers. England will have 48 battleships, as opposed to 39 by France and Germany. It is hard to conceive that, on such a set of circumstances arising as would promote hostilities between Great Britain and two Powers, it would be impossible for any of England's ships to be withdrawn from their supreme duty of watching the movements of the fleets of the other Powers, so that on any outbreak of hostilities occurring, they may be unable to speak, to catch the needle—before it gets into the haystack of the open ocean. In such a contingency, if we have supposed, England would be unable to send sufficient, if any, of her ships into Eastern waters, and therefore, so, it must be obvious that Australia would be absolutely at the mercy of the Eastern Power. Australia would not know, as indeed she knows now, that she has not the slightest possible hope of coping with Japan unaided. We know that 4,000,000 of people cannot control a fleet of the magnitude and power of that possessed by Japan.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then it is a fact that we can beat the world?

Mr. KELLY.—I am proving that we cannot, and that it is now necessary that the Empire as a whole should provide for its defence, and that this supreme duty cannot be left entirely to the United Kingdom. The people of the Australian Commonwealth know well that they must take, and should long ago have taken, a hand in securing Imperial defence, and their naval contribution is a proof of their recognition of this position. Great Britain, I have said, is becoming year by year less and less dominant from a naval point of view. We have shown that the United Kingdom cannot continue to bear unassisted the responsibility of Imperial protection, and that the moment Imperial protection lapses the Commonwealth of Australia collapses with it. Without looking to the East for possible enemies, we know that there are earth-hungry nations in the old world. One of them, Europe, is hungrily looking for the expansion of her overcrowded empire. We know that that Power at d to Southern Brazil for an area for expansion. We know, also, that the United States of America put into operation the Monroe doctrine, and in order to carry it out it has within the last few years built up a fleet that may now be safely reckoned to be as the second fleet in the world. Any, the European Power I refer to, has necessarily turned her view from Southern Brazil, and is now looking to the Dutch Colonies in the East for the acquisition of territory she requires. We know that if the opportunity offered, the European Power would have no hesitation in taking such territory of this Commonwealth as it suited it to take. Knowing that we could do would prevent us, therefore, we in Australia have to turn ourselves, not only with the eyes of the East, but also with the eyes of the old world. We have an immense territory which is sparsely populated and practically undeveloped. Australia is waiting for population, and such territory would be taken possession of to-morrow by foreign powers if it were not for the Imperial protection which we enjoy. In view of all these circumstances, it is obviously our duty to ourselves, as well as our duty to the Empire, to assist the United Kingdom in her Imperial responsibilities. Australia must take her true place in the Imperial partnership. Honorable members in the corner, who proudly assert the possibility of creating a local navy, can hardly deny that we are in a position to contribute our quota to Imperial defence, and can be proved to our interest, and be in accordance with our wish, to do so. The value of Australia at the present time amounts to almost £33,000,000, and her commerce trade, which is protected only by the Imperial Navy, to £86,000,000.

CULPIN.—Does the honorable member include the railway revenue?

KELLY.—Certainly; the whole value. The honorable member must remark that England has her public debt contracted, not for her own development, but to maintain the security of the whole Empire, a debt which at the present moment is only just short of £800,000,000; and when she has to pay interest, just as we have to pay interest on our debt. Therefore it would be unworthy of us to add—as an argument why we should refuse to shoulder our proper obligations, that we should not pay interest on our public debt—not contracted solely in the development of our own resources. Australia, if she so wishes, can pay her fair share towards the defence of the Empire. But I hope that before anything is done in that direction, an effort will be made by the Commonwealth Government to bring about the adoption of a proper Imperial basis for contributions to naval defence, a basis upon which each of the self-governing sections of the Empire can play its part. The Prime Minister, at the commencement of my remarks, asked, in effect, "Why does your motion propose that our naval contribution be increased, if you do not particularly wish it to be done?" I have moved in this direction because I think it very necessary that the attention of Australia should be at once directed to her obligations in this regard, and also to the new factor in defence considerations which has arisen by reason of the creation of a new first-class naval power in the East—a factor which makes us more than ever dependent on the Imperial Navy. I hold that the only way in which we can effectively direct the attention of our people to these matters is to make some such proposal as that of doubling the naval subsidy. The doubling of the subsidy would not appreciably increase the battle power of the British Empire, but the fact that some members of this House think it necessary to double the contribution will convince the public that there is a definite reason for considering anew the whole question of Imperial and naval defence. I have not the slightest fear that, when the people of Australia have had both sides of the naval defence question put to them, they will prove their common sense by having nothing to do with a system under which our naval defence will be controlled by two authorities. I wish now to say a few words about the arguments of the various advocates of an Australian Navy, who may be divided into two schools of thought. One of these is in no way irreconcilable with the general principles I have put forward as those which should govern the naval defence of the Empire. The other school seems more concerned in attempting to provide work for the excellent officers whom we have already in our employ than in establishing a local coastal defence. I will deal with these two schools of thought consecutively. The adherents of the first school, while recognising the need for the protection of the Imperial Navy, wish to establish local naval auxiliaries for coastal and harbor defence, as, for instance, torpedo boats or destroyers for use in waters such as the passage within the Barrier Reef, where, no doubt, they would be very useful if, indeed, the occasion ever arose for taking advantage of their services. These gentlemen also wish to establish a body of Australian trained seamen, who would be of use afterwards in connexion with Imperial defence.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is not that a good thing?

Mr. KELLY.—It is an excellent thing, as I shall show later on. In dealing first with the proposition that naval auxiliaries should be created for harbor defence, I wish to quote the following conclusive sentence from page 287 of Captain Mahan's Lessons of the War with Spain:—

For mere harbor defence, fortifications are decisively superior to ships, except where peculiar local conditions are found.

The peculiar local conditions referred to are the existence of entrances too wide to enable harbors to be properly defended by mine-fields. Captain Mahan concludes that fortifications are superior to ships for these reasons: It is the duty of a ship, he says, to go wherever she may be wanted to go. The first consideration in connexion with a vessel is her mobility—I do not mean her speed, but her power to go wherever she may be required—consistent with offensive power. At harbor mouths, however, where the enemy's vessels must come to you, you can pile up an infinitely greater defensive power on land than it would be possible to provide on the sea. A ship has only a certain floating power. Her armour, for instance, must not be of more than a certain thickness if she is to float at all; whereas, on shore, fortifications may be constructed of any strength that may be desired. Therefore, Captain Mahan concludes—and his conclusion is obviously founded upon common sense—that, for harbor defence, fortifications on land are superior to defences at sea, which have not a sufficient radius of action to make them truly naval in their operations, nor sufficient strength to make them equal to fixed land defences. Practically all that is required to bring that school of thought which desires the creation of an Australian Navy as an adjunct only to harbor and coastal defences into line with the Imperial naval school, is the recognition of the principle of "undivided control of naval effort" is absolutely essential to the success of that principle. I think this fact will be readily recognized when it is remembered that absolute command of the sea by a single class of vessel so rapidly becomes obsolete, or requires such a highly-trained personnel, as that which is proposed for this purpose of naval defence, namely, torpedo boats, torpedo boat-destroyers, or submarines. The latter, of course, would be of no use for defence, but merely for the purpose of attack.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are told that the best way of defending ourselves is by being first.

Mr. KELLY.—The Prime Minister understands me. The submarines are now being built for France and intended to be used in attacking the ports in the Channel.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Or for attacking the vessels that might attempt a blockade.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes, but I would point out that if ever any hostile fleet is able to blockade our Australian ports, it is not that command of the sea has been lost, and that the whole of our defences must collapse. If an enemy ever came here in sufficient strength to blockade our ports, he must have previously attained command of the sea; the moment he succeeded in that, he could occupy our territory and do what else he willed. He could do whatever he liked with us if the Navy once lost command of the sea. It is admitted that Australian torpedo-destroyers or vessels of that class would very rapidly deteriorate in efficiency if they were allowed to remain isolated for a long period. It is well known that the British Navy—and we could select a better force for the purpose of comparison—that isolated ships are never so efficient as ships of similar class on immediate stations. For instance, the Imperial fleet in these waters is not so efficient in discipline, or in any of the elements of attack, as a fighting force, as are ships of similar power belonging to the Channel fleet or attached to the Mediterranean station.

Mr. FISHER.—How does the hon. member account for that?

Mr. KELLY.—For the obvious reason that where a large number of ships are gathered together keen competition exists between the various officers and crew ger esprit de corps characterizes each. Consequently, each ship becomes in the highest degree efficient. Where, however, a ship is shut off from all others, and spirit of emulation is not encouraged, the vessel must lose in general efficiency.

SALMON.—Would that not be to some degree due to the great distance from central control?

KELLY.—No, because the central of a fleet is vested in the Admiral's station. For instance, the Admiral of the Australian station has the control of the squadron, and is responsible for its efficiency. The efficiency of the Australian station, although very high, is not quite what it is as the efficiency of the Channel and Mediterranean squadrons, owing solely to the fact that there is not the same scope for a strong spirit of emulation between a few ships composing the squadron. Emulation is immensely strong in its effect upon efficiency. The view that I am putting forward would be supported by every executive officer on the Australian station.

SALMON.—Would not the officers in putting forward that view be excusing themselves?

KELLY.—No. Those officers, if transferred to the Channel or Mediterranean squadron—and they are consequently being relieved in order to insure general efficiency—would, in a very short time, bring themselves up to that standard which is maintained among officers who are now with the squadrons mentioned. I am merely stating the value of experience in connexion with isolated vessels, which have no opportunity of manoeuvring in company.

HENRY WILLIS.—Did not Kipling say that during the week that he was with the British squadron on the coast of Canada, very keen competition existed amongst the crews?

KELLY.—There is keen competition among the men under any circumstances, but there is a difference in degree. Where you have very few ships upon a station the competition cannot be so keen as where there are a large number. On the Australian station, for instance, we have only one first-class cruiser, and there is no other ship for her to pit herself against. On the Mediterranean station there would probably be a number of first-class cruisers of different types, and therefore great scope for the influence of the spirit of emulation.

Mr. SALMON.—Do the men fire against each other?

Mr. KELLY.—They fire against each other in the sense that competitions are held. The science of war, whether it be on sea or land, is one of the most progressive, and I think that honorable members will recognise that the only way in which we can maintain high efficiency is by constantly exchanging the officers of such forces as the advocates of an Australian Navy propose, for other officers of the Imperial Navy, drawn from all parts of the world. In other words, the officers of the Australian Navy, whether that navy be designed for coastal defence, or any other purpose—and I am sure it will never be of use for anything but harbor defence—must be officers of the Imperial Navy. We should be able to bring new men out every couple of years, and send those of our men who had become slack to the centres of naval activity, so that they might be brought back in due course in a state of the highest efficiency. That is the policy adopted in the Imperial Navy. The men are transferred from station to station, so that they shall not become slack owing to their remaining too long in one place.

Mr. STORRER.—That is not saying very much for the officers.

Mr. KELLY. — That is no reflection upon the officers, but upon human nature. The principle that has been adopted by the British Admiralty to insure efficiency all over the world must be followed by us, and we must have Imperial officers to man our ships, if we are to have a navy as an adjunct to our coastal defence. If the advocate of the coastal defence school which I have been mentioning once recognises this he will readily become reconciled to the idea of one control for naval effort in whatever part of the Empire it may be. I shall now deal with the type of Australian Navy advocate who wishes, I fear, to start an Australian Navy as a kind of asylum for his friends. I do not wish to say anything invidious or anything reflecting seriously upon persons who during the past six months or so have certainly shown themselves excellent political propagandists; but I propose to deal first with one who has taken it upon himself to become the mouth-piece of this particular school of Australian Navy advocacy. I refer to a gentleman who has not even hesitated to lift up his voice in London in defence of the principles which he advocates. I allude to Senator Matheson. That gentleman has not scrupled to make all naval authorities his own, irrespective of whether they believe in the principles which he has laid down, or whether they do not. In this connexion I propose to read a quotation by Senator Matheson from a passage by Captain Mahan. I shall give the quotation in conjunction with its context, and I shall leave honorable members to decide whether or not that quotation was honestly made. I shall then ask the House to say whether a good cause would require to be bolstered up by the adoption of such methods. Senator Matheson, in a paper which he read some years ago, before the Royal Colonial Institute—so the matter was well considered—in advocating the establishment of a fleet of sea-going cruisers for use around the Australian coast, spoke as follows:—

If local defence is desirable at home and for the mother country—

Local defence of the type the senator wants for Australia is not desirable at home and for the mother country, and nobody knows that better than does Senator Matheson—why should it be condemned when Australia is concerned? Why, what does Captain Mahan himself say on the question?

Senator Matheson then quotes Captain Mahan as follows:—

San Francisco and Puget Sound, owing to the width and great depth of the entrance, cannot be effectually protected by torpedoes, and, consequently, as fleets can always pass batteries through an unobstructed channel, they cannot obtain perfect security by means of fortifications only. Valuable as such works will be to them, they must be further garrisoned by coast defence ships, whose part in repelling an enemy will be co-ordinated with that of the batteries. The sphere of action of such ships should not be permitted to extend far beyond the port to which they are allotted—

Of what use would they be in Port Darwin, which is one of the places that Senator Matheson desires to protect? Captain Mahan, it will be seen, was talking about a local vessel, which might be of service, perhaps, in Port Phillip Bay, if it could not be defended by mines. The quotation continues:— and of whose defence they form an important part, but within that sweep they will always be a powerful reinforcement to a sea-going navy when the strategic conditions of the war cause hostilities to centre round their port. By sacrificing power to go long distances, the coast defence ship gains proportionate weight of guns—that is, of defensive and offensive. It further adds an element of unique value to the fleet with which it for the time acts.

That is to say if the fleet is to act immediately round the mouth of the harbor these ships are designed to do so. Senator Matheson asks, what does Captain Mahan himself say about the use of sea-going cruisers to be used in or around harbor mouths, or around the coast of Australia, which extends for about 8,850 miles, and which constitutes as big a radius as any sea-going vessel is usually given. The context shows, the quotation given by Senator Matheson shows, that Captain Mahan was intended to be used to localized defence, which was used only in conjunction with the land forces. Yet Senator Matheson wishes it to be used in connexion with the defence of the country. We all know that in Australia there are very few ports, if any, which can be defended by mine fields, so that the quotation from Captain Mahan is applicable to any port in the Commonwealth. It is a curious commentary upon the statement of Senator Matheson that Captain Mahan himself had occasion to protest against this type of misrepresentation. In his Fallacies Upon Naval Subjects, he says as follows:—

So far does this (misrepresentation) go that I have had the experience of the present writer that on the most reputable journals in the country (the States), in order to establish a certain position, quoted my opinion in one paragraph while omitting to give the carefully qualified qualification expressed in the very next paragraph; whereby was conveyed, by implication, the endorsement of the extreme position advocated, which the present writer has never held.

We all know that certain senators representing Western Australia, who are not of the ranks of the Labour Party, are compelled by the exigencies of their position to prove to their constituents how essential are they to the Commonwealth at large because of their advocacy, particularly of some particular academic subject. That State cannot very well do without them at the next election. Senator Matheson chosen an Australian navy as the basis of his special advocacy. I ask honorable members if he is to be allowed to put every naval authority his own, to use them without giving the context, to misrepresent the opinions expressed by writers upon naval subjects? I think that my words are a bit too strong when I consider the effect which the from Captain Mahan, the great naval authority of the past century, is likely to be upon the minds of people who, in the absence of its context.

HENRY WILLIS.—Captain Mahan made his views upon the defence of Australia very clear in another book.

KELLY.—Of course he has. I am merely dealing with the quotation which is made from that authority by Senator Matheson. Here is an opinion by Captain Mahan which is especially applicable to Australia at the present time. Honourable members are aware that for a time the United States went in for building coast defence monitors—vessels with a short range but possessed of comparatively great gun power and armour capacity. These vessels, Captain Mahan says—

"the opinion of the writer that no more of these should be built, except as an accessory defence of those harbors where submarine attack cannot be depended upon—as at San Francisco and Puget Sound. It should be added that the monitor at sea rolls twice as rapidly as the battleship, which injuriously affects accuracy of fire, and is, offensive power."

The type of vessel which Captain Creswell recommends is one which would have great gun power as would make her unseaworthy in a heavy sea. Captain Mahan says—

"The general principle of the decisive superiority of offensive power over defensive is applicable throughout—to the operations of a war, to the design of a battle-ship, to the scheme of organizing a whole navy. It is to the erroneous notion of mere defence that we owe much of the existence of the monitor, and some of the insistence upon heavy armour; while the cry that went up for a more powerful naval defence along our coast—is the policy that we hear in Australia—

"The Empire was threatened in the spring of 1898—and the war with Spain—

"an ignorance of the first principles of naval warfare, which, if not resisted, would have left the Empire in a perilous position even before Spain."

It is the opinion, in unmistakable terms, of the authority quoted by Senator Matheson, in support of his contention that these vessels should be scattered round the coast of Australia on the very principle which Captain Mahan himself so scathingly criticised when applied to his own coun-

HENRY WILLIS.— Captain Mahan referring to the deficiency in battle-ships in America.

Mr. KELLY. — Exactly. I have already shown that the Empire will shortly be deficient in battle-ships, and explained the necessity which therefore exists for all sections of the Empire to take a hand in securing battle-ship strength. So much for the mouthpiece in another place of the Australian Navy project. But we need not go further than the report to the Senate of the Naval Director, Captain Creswell, to show how absolutely fallacious is the principle of an Australian Navy for local defence. I do not like to say anything about a member of the Commonwealth service who, in the past, has proved himself a good officer. Such an officer has naturally much difficulty in replying; but the misrepresentations put forward by the advocates of an Australian Navy are so extensive that I feel I must deal with the question in a straight-out, direct way, as directly as if Captain Creswell were present in the House to reply to my contentions. I deeply regret that he is not, because I welcome nothing so much as a complete elucidation of all these matters. In his report to the Senate, dated 7th February, 1902, Captain Creswell writes as follows:—

"From the Imperial stand-point the case is equally strong. The life of the Empire depends on the fleet; any strengthening of the fleet adds to the security of the Empire. Australia is the only considerable dependency that is . . . in a position to concentrate her attention on sea forces and add to the fleet strength of Empire."

And yet Captain Creswell knows as well as does any man that the few miserable cruisers, costing £300,000 each, which he suggests for local defence, could not add one iota to the fleet strength of the Empire, and would not benefit it in the slightest degree. That being so, why should he include such a statement in a report to the Senate? Captain Creswell also knows, as well as does any man, the necessity that exists for homogeneity in the construction of fleets; he is undoubtedly aware that that is a principle which has been followed to the very letter by every naval power. He knows also that the creation of a separate Australian Force, while opposed to the opinions of all naval authorities at the present day, must inevitably lead to a want of homogeneity, and consequent depreciation in efficiency, in the Empire's defence, which he himself admits seriously needs augmenting. As a proof of the seriousness of the arguments which Captain Creswell adduced in this report, I propose to make a further quotation, showing the test which he gives of the efficiency of the force which he now has under his command. I do not wish for a moment to impugn the efficiency of that force, because, if it be in any way lacking in that respect, it is not from want of enthusiasm on the part of those composing it. But this is the proof which Captain Creswell gives of the efficiency of the force he already commands—

The Protector, under this system—

The system which he proposed for an Australian Navy—was manned and ready to leave for China in three days. On arrival in China, the Commander-in-Chief reported that the Protector was most useful, being an efficient and well-kept man-of-war, reflecting credit on captain, officers, and men.

He goes on to say—

Her engine-room staff, largely made up of reserve men, steamed her 16,000 miles in four months—

That is exactly what the China Navigation Steam-ship Company's vessels do all the year round without bragging about it—and she returned without defects. The system of reduced permanent crews and reserve has thus been fairly tested.

That may be very valuable information to embody in a report on this question, but to my mind all that it proves is that the Protector paid a visit to foreign waters, asked for an opinion, and was naturally complimented. It would be just as idle to treat that expression of opinion on the part of the British officer as a serious one as it would be absurd for a woman to boast, on returning from a visit to a chatty friend, that she had been told, in answer to an inquiry, that she was "looking perfectly lovely, my dear"—or something to that effect. The opinion quoted by Captain Creswell in regard to the Protector can be of no real value as showing the efficiency of his force when compared with that of other powers. As Captain Creswell has told one story of the visit of the Protector to eastern waters, I think it will not be inappropriate to tell another. When that vessel was in port at, I think, Hong Kong, the captain of one of the British ships there accepted an invitation to dine with Captain Creswell. When he came alongside the Protector, however, he found that there was no one to receive him. There was no one on duty, but after boarding the vessel, and seeking for some time to locate the skipper, he at last discovered some one who directed him to where he was to be found. Captain Creswell, naturally very distressed on learning the not too courteous treatment of his guest, apologised in profuse terms. His guest, however, was in a generous mood, contented himself with saying, "Well, well, why worry about a thing like that? It is not as if your ship were a real war."

Mr. HUME COOK.—Who is the able member's authority for that statement?

Mr. KELLY.—I have told the hon. Captain Creswell, and he does not doubt its accuracy. When I mentioned it, he entered upon an extensive recitation. It happened that there was no one on duty and no one to receive the British officer, but he did not deny the main facts of the further incident in the history of the Protector. The next proposal in this connection by the Naval Director is to increase the gun power of these vessels at the expense of their radius. He says—

Service in Australian waters would be at any great distance from a base.

Surely that is a very curious statement to be made by that officer? He might as well say, "I will move the ships, according to another proposal, to the advocate of an Australian Navy, round Darwin, or to Western Australia at the Government's notice! If he had to take the ships to those points, he would have to travel at least 3,000 or 4,000 miles. Should we find that this short service in Australia "would not be at any great distance from a base"? Three or four thousand miles as great as the normal coal capacity of most of our smaller cruisers. Yet Captain Creswell proposes to curtail the radius of his proposed vessels because they "would not be required at any great distance from a base." Which of these arguments is the correct one? Is this to operate in Western Australia or in Darwin, or is it to operate in the neighbourhood of Sydney and Melbourne, and not more than a stone's throw therefrom? We have one definite statement made by the hon. member, that the ships are to be used round Sydney and Melbourne, we have the authority of the best naval expert extant against the proposal. And if the ships are to be based at Port Darwin and Western Australia, it is obvious, on Captain Creswell's own showing, that they could not go there in the emergency arose. In the same way he says—

Any future naval war, it is certain, would be waged against a combination of naval is most unlikely that any single power will undertake the task. Great and powerful as the British Fleet is, it will be taxed to the uttermost to cover and protect a world-wide commerce, which is the life of the nation—have already shown that the Empire is making adequate preparations to protect its commerce on the seas—

at the same time to carry on the heavy work of the major operations of war in Europe. The needs of powers that have little or no commerce to defend, and maintained for purely aggressive purposes, are rapidly increasing. Absolute and complete dependence by Australia upon the British Navy, situated as we are at the extremity of the Empire, will add to that strain.

That argument could be better put, not as supporting a local navy—which could be of no use if the Imperial Navy failed to do its object, and which could be of no help to the Imperial Navy if it did not fail to do its object—what better argument could be put forward, not that Australia should have such a navy, but that it should forthwith take up her share of the responsibility of Imperial defence? As if that statement in itself were not sufficient to damn the whole scheme, we find that in the same report the Naval Director proposes that at the time of war this Australian Navy should be put under the control of the Imperial Admiral on the Australian station. Why does he advise this? Because he realises, as every sane man must, that confusion of command in war time breeds, as no other thing can breed, inefficiency. The nature of war, especially naval war, is action. Confusion of command entails inaction. Therefore, Captain Creswell advises putting the Australian Navy, which he wants to see established in peace time, under Australian officers and Australian control, at the time of war under the control of the Imperial Admiral of the station. But if divided control in peace time is a good thing, why not in war? Are not our forces in peace time supposed to be preparing for the stern realities of war? If unity of effort in action is deemed to be essential for success, why not unity of effort also essential in the preparation for that action? Certainly, Captain Creswell's proposals would not seem to be based on logical considerations. And, again, the Australian Navy, which, in its preparation for war, would be under the control of some Australian—shall we say?—Admiral, would be responsible for its discipline and general efficiency to him, and he would be for it to the Commonwealth. Now, discipline and efficiency spell capacity for action, and we all know that every commander, to be successful, must know intimately the capabilities of the force committed to his charge. Want of knowledge of the potential limitations of the forces under his command cramps a commander. Over-estimation thereof precedes disaster in action; under-estimation induces inaction—an alternative rendered equally disastrous by the exigencies of our naval position. Generally speaking, the man who should be in the best position in time of war to direct the operations of the Australian Navy would be the man who had supervised its preparation for war—and yet Captain Creswell advises otherwise. He recognises, as every one must recognise, that in war, as in everything else, too many cooks spoil the broth. I shall leave the House to form its own opinion as to why he does not think that too many cooks—or Admirals—would spoil the preparation of that broth. Before I leave the question of dual control, I should like to give an instance of the danger which might result from the operation of that principle. Immediately after the unfortunate outrage on the Dogger Bank, at which time the Challenger happened to be at Port Melbourne, instructions were wired to the British Fleets, wherever stationed, as a matter of ordinary course, to be in readiness for all eventualities.

MR. GROOM.—When was that made public?

MR. KELLY.—I am stating it now on my own responsibility; and, privately, I shall tell the Minister my authority, which he will not refute.

MR. PAGE.—Are not the warships on the station always supposed to be prepared for eventualities?

MR. KELLY.—There are some things which the honorable member will see, on reflection, have to be done. For instance, there is a certain amount of top-hamper which has to be taken off a week or two prior to hostilities beginning.

MR. PAGE.—That would take a very short while.

MR. KELLY.—That is one of the things they were instructed to be prepared to do. By a curious combination of circumstances, within a few hours of the commander of the Challenger receiving that message, a torpedo boat was seen to approach the mouth of the Yarra. He at once signalled to the torpedo boat to stand off. She was flying no colours to show what she really was, and the warship had not been long enough on the station to identify her. In spite of that signal from the Imperial ship, the torpedo boat stood on. Whether she did not understand the Imperial signal, or was keeping no watch or look out, I do not know. But whatever the explanation may be, she stood on, and if it had not been for the common sense of the British commander, she might have been blown out of the water. His orders were definite—to be prepared for all eventualities. But he recognised, I dare say from the fact that his signals did not make much impression upon this local torpedo boat, that she must be a vessel belonging to the Australian service. Whatever the explanation was, he did not fire upon her. It is rather an absurd incident, which should not have happened, but having happened, I think it is the best proof that this House could have of the absolute folly of having dual control in naval matters, either in the preparation for action, or in action itself.

Mr. HUME COOK.—There should be no dual control in Australian waters.

Mr. KELLY.—Then who should control?

Mr. HUME COOK.—The Admiral on the station, I suppose.

Mr. KELLY.—If the Admiral on the station is responsible for the forces under his command, should he not be responsible for the discipline of the forces? That is very clear.

Mr. PAGE.—One would expect that.

Mr. KELLY.—One would certainly expect it. But that apparently is what Captain Creswell did not expect that this House would have the intelligence to perceive.

Mr. PAGE.—That is too severe.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not wish to take up much further time, but I should like to mention, before I sit down, that an Australian Navy argument has recently been founded on the withdrawal of the British battle fleet from the China station. That fact has been used to support the creation of a few small cruisers on the coasts of Australia. It has been represented as though the English battle-ships were withdrawn from the China station because, at the present time, Great Britain had no hope of coping with the power of Japan. I think that the people who put forward that argument must know full well that the reason why British battle-ships have been withdrawn from Eastern waters, is that it is now in European waters that they are required to visit the fleets which may in future menace the interests of the Empire. Japan is an enemy of Great Britain—and I think that the people in Australia ardently hope that they will always remain our ally—and therefore consequently no fleet in Eastern waters. That the Russian fleet has been destroyed for these British battle-ships to visit. Therefore, they have been withdrawn to other stations to which they have been allotted, so that they may, when the time comes, be brought into action at once against the forces with which they will be called upon to fight.

Mr. PAGE.—The French Government still has a China squadron.

Mr. KELLY.—The British cruise the China seas are quite capable of coping with the French or any other squadron in those waters.

Mr. McCAY.—The British Admiralty has simply taken some British ships away.

Mr. KELLY.—There are no battleships to watch, but there are cruisers to watch and therefore the Admiralty has left the cruisers to watch them, and the cruisers are thoroughly capable of carrying out that duty.

Mr. PAGE.—Vessels on which the British flag flies are generally capable.

Mr. KELLY.—Exactly. Therefore the argument for creating four small cruisers because England cannot protect us against Japan, is simply ridiculous.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Where was the argument seriously put forward?

Mr. KELLY.—It was seriously put forward in Sydney by a brilliant exponent of the idea of the establishment of an Australian Navy, namely, Mr. F. J. O'Sullivan, who, I understand, sees a magnificent prospect of large loan being expended as the result of such an effort.

Mr. HUME COOK.—One might have thought that it was a Sydney opinion.

Mr. KELLY.—I only wish to say, in regard to this phase of the question, that the Imperial Government cannot protect Australia, certainly an Australian Government cannot protect her. Great Britain, at the present time, has, built and building, 11 first-class battleships, 11 second-class battleships, 6 third-class battleships—in all, 65. She has, built and building, 42 first-class cruisers, and other cruisers making a total of 149. She has 31 torpedo boats, 144 destroyers, and 189 torpedo craft of different classes. If Great Britain, with that immense armament, cannot maintain command of the seas, it is of use trying to create such a force here as can compete with the forces that will have ousted it from her, when they afterwards attack these waters.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Why should we pay a greater amount unless there is to be water protection?

Mr. KELLY.—There is greater protection. Every ship that is added to the Imperial Navy adds to the protection of Australia.

Mr. HUME COOK.—What is the difference between adding ships in English waters and adding them here?

Mr. KELLY.—The difference is, that we have them here we have them where they are not wanted. If the Imperial Navy is overwhelmingly successful, absolutely no hostile ship will be able to come to port, and there will be no ship in the waters for an Australian Navy to get away from. That is one position.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable member misses the point.

Mr. KELLY.—Take the other position. Suppose that some of the enemy's cruisers are able to get away from the British Fleet, and say that those cruisers do not care to come to the coasts of Australia. Suppose that, from their own bases, they interfere in our commerce along its trade routes. What use for rooting out those hostile ships would be an Australian Navy, limited to the Australian seas? It is Australian trade which would have to be protected, and the Australian Navy could not be utilized to protect it. Take it that the commerce destroyer of an enemy has been successful in raiding the British Fleets, and makes a landing on the coast of Australia—I have already told the House that England has made preparation to meet such contingencies, and that, owing to the immensely preponderating strength of British cruiser strength, no enemy's ship would be able to stay more than a very short time in any particular place. It would not be able to stay for any time whatever on the Australian station—qua Australian station. It would have to keep moving constantly.

The honorable members consider that British first-class cruisers will number in 1917 forty-two ships, as opposed to the thirty-three of the next three naval Powers. We leave out of the reckoning the United States—with which country I hope we shall never be at war—Great Britain has twenty-two cruisers over the strength of France and Germany—a preponderating strength of over two to one. There is not the slightest doubt that British ships would be able to hunt down every one of the enemy's vessels which might get through the blockade. But I would go further and say that if we are not satisfied with that preponderating strength, should we not try to add to it, instead of trying to bring about an isolated new division which would be limited to Australian waters, and which could not, by its meagre radius, be utilized wherever Australian interests might be threatened?

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable member misses my point. If Australia is protected by ships she will be less liable to attack than if unprotected by ships.

Mr. KELLY.—The whole course of my speech has gone to show that England cannot go on bearing, unassisted, the whole burden of Imperial defence. I have shown that whereas at the present day England is as strong in battleships as are the next three powers, she will, in 1907—only two years hence—have but forty-eight such vessels as compared with sixty-three owned by those powers. If England were able to bear, unassisted, the whole burden of Imperial defence, the question would merely be whether we are small or mean enough to allow her to continue to do so. But I have proved that England is not able to go on bearing the burden alone; and, that being so, the self-governing Colonies, wealthy as they are, and with their vast interests, must come to her assistance, prepared to take part in a new scheme for Imperial naval defence. I do not wish for "contributions without representation" or anything of that sort, but simply urge that the whole matter requires readjusting. My desire is that we should meet the mother country half-way, and say that we are prepared to consider the question of Imperial defence in the new light now shed upon it.

Mr. HUME COOK.—But the honorable member proposes a money contribution.

Mr. KELLY.—I have already explained that I propose to double our money contribution in order to force attention to the subject. It does not matter whether we contribute £200,000 or £400,000, seeing that the naval expenditure of the United Kingdom is £36,000,000. Our contribution of £200,000 is no more than the price of a third-class cruiser! My desire is, as I say, to force attention to a subject which is of supreme national importance to the Commonwealth. I much regret that I have occupied so much time, but honorable members will recognise that this is a subject which cannot easily be dealt with briefly. There are so many sides to consider that, if each point were comprehensively urged, I am afraid I should never finish. If I have been rather stilted in my method, it is only because I recognised that if I dealt with the matter fully, I should require almost as many adjournments of the debate as the honorable member for Lang did on another occasion. I hope I have shown the necessity there is for Imperial defence, and that England cannot unassisted bear the burden. I deeply regret that a more capable person did not take up the work of pointing out Australia's duty to herself. However, the matter has been touched upon by the honorable and learned member for East Sydney and others, all of whom have expressed much the same view that I have laid before honorable members to-day. The honorable and learned member for East Sydney has said:—

I cannot wonder that the people of the mother country look to their children for further help. Some persons seem to think that this £200,000 a year we give the British Navy is a magnificent display of Australian generosity. I say, we are bound to look more squarely in the face our responsibilities to the British Empire.

And not only responsibility to the British Empire; but responsibility to the people intrusted to our charge! The honorable member for Gippsland has said:—

The stupendous struggle in the East must awaken the people of Australia to the fact that we have been living in a fool's paradise when we have assumed that our great distance from the military nations of the earth gave us immunity from foreign invasion. We know that some of the great military nations are within a few days of us. Japan has astonished the world. If her example awakens China to adopt modern civilization we shall have hundreds of millions within a short distance of our shores. That shows the necessity of contributing to the British Navy, and of consolidating and strengthening the Empire by every means in our power.

Surely there is food for thought for the people of these vast empty lands! The Prime Minister may cut off the proposed increase if he likes; all I wish him to do now is to take the first step towards a discussion of Imperial necessities, and of the Imperial adequacy of the preparation that has been made to meet them by those who now bear the whole responsibility. The Minister has spoken on this question as he could speak. In his presidential address delivered to the Imperial Federation League of Victoria, the Prime Minister said—

Shall we be opposed in our own community? Certainly. At the very outset, we suppose another demand on a community, many of whose members neglect to exercise the political leges they have. One would not willingly make another claim upon them except on the ground of imperious necessity, but the necessity is increasing. While it is hoped that the member of the League—and I think the Prime Minister would say also, every member of the community continues to be a zealous ratepayer in his municipality, and an active elector in State and Commonwealth, we are obliged to remind him of the guarantee of his retention of each of these privileges, and of their free exercise, his children, very largely depends upon the maintenance of the Empire.

The Prime Minister, in a newspaper interview, which has since been printed, articulated, further said—

But the march of events during the last few years has revealed the striking growth of new naval powers—the United States, Germany, and Japan. The condition of their fleets, and the condition of those fleets which were previously in existence, oblige us to review the whole question in the light of the possibilities now presented.

Those words are sufficient justification for moving in the matter. I cannot conclude without again expressing my regret that it should have fallen to the lot of a private member, whose political experience by no means fits him for a task so important, to submit this motion. I hope, however, that now the question has been introduced, it will be debated in a fair and open way, and not, as some might expect of an Australian Navy wish to debate it, namely, by misrepresentation and the use of quotations without context. I hope that we shall endeavour in any way to arrive at the best solution of the problem. If honorable members address themselves to the question in the spirit I have indicated, I have no doubt that the position I have presented to-day will be deemed the only reasonable position in the interests, not only of the Empire, but of that section of it committed to our charge.

Debate (on motion by Mr. McCauley) adjourned.

BUDGET.

Committee of Supply: (Consideration ended from 6th September, vide page on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST—the item, “President, £1,100,” be agreed

R. EDWARDS (Oxley).—Just before the House adjourned last night I was going to the remarks of the Treasurer with respect to the practice for some time followed by writers in the press of the old policy of disparaging and misrepresenting Australia. I was pointing out that some of the restrictive legislation passed by this Parliament had, in my opinion, more than anything else to disparage the Commonwealth in the estimation of the people of other countries. I referred more particularly to the contract section of the Immigration Restriction Act. I think that that section should be amended without any further delay, and if it were possible it should be amended during next week.

PAGE.—Why did not the honorable member move the late Government to do something in the matter?

R. EDWARDS. — I may tell the honorable member for Maranoa that when the Immigration Restriction Bill was under consideration in this House, about four months ago, I voted for the contract clause, on the belief that it would be applied only to a company or employers proposed to employ a number of men at a low rate of wages to take the place of men on strike, in order to prevent those men from getting redress of their grievances.

PAGE.—Does the honorable member believe in that?

R. EDWARDS.—I do, and I still believe in the provision to that extent. But I do not possibly support a measure which would prevent many of my own countrymen from coming out here, under engagement for perhaps, two or three years, at a rate of wages as high as the highest rate ruling in Australia. The provision to which I refer was submitted by the leader of the Labour Party, and I remember that the honorable member for Northern Melbourne was very anxious indeed to find out whether the proposed clause would apply to men ordinarily coming out under engagement for two or three years, at the highest rate of wages. It was distinctly understood at the time that the clause was to apply in such cases, but to men coming out here for political purposes, at a lower rate of wages than those ruling in Australia, and to take the place of men on strike.

Mr. MAUGER.—That might have been understood in some quarters, but it was not generally understood.

Mr. R. EDWARDS. — That was distinctly understood to be the object of the clause when it was submitted. I say that to put any other interpretation upon it is to place too much power in the hands of any person. I am afraid that if one or two Bills which are now before the House are passed as they at present stand, we shall find similar difficulties arising in connexion with them.

Mr. MAUGER.—There has been a good deal of slander and talk, but what harm has been done by the section to which the honorable member refers?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—There has been a very great deal of misunderstanding. As I said last night, there is an impression even amongst our own country people in Great Britain that no one is allowed to land in Australia unless he is able to write at dictation a sentence of fifty words in some European language, and that apparently the Customs officers always take good care that a man desiring to enter the Commonwealth shall not be asked to write a sentence in his own language.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member knows that that is not true.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I know that quite well, but I speak of the impression prevailing in the old country.

Mr. GROOM.—An amendment of the contract section will not correct that impression.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—In my opinion, it is the duty of the Government to amend that section, and to make it known in the old country that we in Australia are prepared to receive people from Great Britain and from the Continent of Europe with open arms. The provision to which I refer is paragraph a of section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act, which provides that—

Any person who, when asked to do so by an officer, fails to write out at dictation, and sign in the presence of the officer, a passage of fifty words in length in a European language directed by the officer—shall be held to be a prohibited immigrant. It is ridiculous and contemptible that we should propose to prohibit people of our own race from coming into this country.

Mr. WATSON.—Why did not the honorable member vote for my proposal to bar coloured aliens and leave others alone?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The honorable gentleman will allow me to say that when I voted for this proposal I never imagined for a moment that it would be used to prevent or to place obstacles in the way of our own people emigrating under a contract to Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—Has it prevented them?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—There have been difficulties placed in the way of some persons, and the provision has been the means of disparaging the Commonwealth. The very idea that people will be required to pass an examination in an European language has created a bad impression. Honorable members can scarcely be conscious that there is more than English spoken, even in Great Britain. Small as the country is, there are people in Great Britain who have very little knowledge of English.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Welsh, for instance.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Just so. Would they be asked to write a sentence of fifty words in their own language? I ask honorable members to imagine the case of an Irishman, speaking and writing the Irish language, being asked to write a sentence of fifty words in the Italian or Greek language.

Mr. PAGE.—It is my experience that a man who could write a sentence in Gaelic could write it in Italian or in Greek.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I am afraid that the honorable member is acquainted only with the English language. I have had to learn more than one language, and a smattering of more than two or three, though I am sorry to say that I do not know one of them very well. However, I have no wish to find fault with what has been done, but rather to ask the Government to remedy the difficulty.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member mean to say that any one from Great Britain has been stopped from entering the Commonwealth under the section to which he refers?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I will not say that any one has absolutely been stopped, but the honorable gentleman must know very well that difficulties have been placed in the way of the landing in Australia of some of our own country people.

Mr. WATSON.—Not under that section.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I remind honorable members of what happened the other day in Hobart. A gentleman who was fortunately blind, was chased from his to his hotel, and from the hotel to the again, and the agents of the steam company were obliged to give a guarantee that this gentleman did not intend to remain for any length of time in our beautiful country.

Mr. WATSON.—That was under the administration of the last Government.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The authorities appear to have been afraid that this gentleman might have his eyes opened in our beautiful country and might decide to remain amongst us. He was said to be a well-to-do man on a tour with his daughter. We ought not to have on our statute-book a measure which may be interpreted in such a way as to produce such incidents.

Mr. STORRER.—That case was no fault of the law.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—It was the fault of the law.

Mr. GROOM.—That gentleman was detained, I presume, not under the paragraph to which the honorable member is referring, but under that which prohibits immigration of persons likely to become a burden on the Commonwealth.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The people in the old country have good reason to regret the law as I have said it can be interpreted, and to fear that difficulties may be placed in the way of their landing if it comes to Australia. Only the other day a groom who brought out horses from the old land had to obtain a ticket of exemption.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Prime Minister said that that was not necessary.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I can understand the people in the old country regarding the provision in such a way as to make it doubtful as to whether they would be allowed to land in Australia after getting a ticket. This man obtained a ticket of exemption through the shipping agents, to make it appear that he would be allowed to land with his horses; but it provided that he could remain here longer than six months.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Prime Minister said that he can remain here as long as he likes.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I still maintain that people in the old country have good reason to believe that difficulties may be put in the way of their landing here, and want these difficulties removed from the statute-book. I think the world knows that we are prepared to in Australia, with open arms, white persons of good repute. I received a letter not very long ago from a person who asked about the advisability of coming here, and I had to reply to him, "I cannot speak English, French, or German, and the language which you do speak may not be that in which the test will be applied to you, so that you may be refused upon as a prohibited immigrant."

GROOM.—Of what nationality was the honorable member's correspondent?

R. EDWARDS.—He was an intelligent man of the same nationality as myself—a Welshman.

WATSON.—Then the honorable member misled him.

R. EDWARDS.—I am sorry that I had to discourage him, but I was perfectly right in doing so, in view of the facts. After our experience in connexion with the six hatters, and the Charters Towers bricklayers—

WATSON.—That was an invention of the Charters Towers bricklayers. A number of bricklayers were available.

JOSEPH COOK.—Is the corner party to take possession of the Committee?

WATSON.—It is time that we had more than one member of the Opposition [Quorum formed.]

R. EDWARDS.—I have admitted that it was not the intention of paragraph 3 of the Act to prevent our people from coming here, but the words of that provision justifies the conclusion that difficulties may be put in the way of immigrants. In the Argus of Friday a leading article was published on this subject, part of which I wish to read to the Committee. It is as follows:—

What is the law with respect to the exclusion of Australia of labourers under contract? A question is raised by the case of the groom who came out with horses to New South Wales on an exemption certificate covering six months, by the action of Mr. Coghlan, Agent-General for New South Wales, in granting that certificate, and by the confused and contradictory references to the matter made during the week by the Prime Minister. Section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act includes amongst prohibited immigrants—

"Any persons under a contract or agreement to perform manual labour within the Commonwealth: provided that this paragraph shall not apply to workmen exempted by the Minister for special skill required in Australia."

Coghlan, an officer of Australian reputation, sent to London as Agent-General for the special purpose of answering criticisms and refuting misstatements made respecting Australia, interpreted that provision to mean that William Gooderham, the groom in question, would probably be denied admittance unless he had an exemption certificate as authorized by regulations under the Act. He issued one accordingly, for six months, with an intimation that any person guilty of offence under the regulations is liable to a fine of £50, or, in default, imprisonment. William Gooderham may therefore be excused if he has gathered the impression that the one striking fact to an English workman respecting Australia is that he must obtain a special permit to enter it, and he must not remain in it more than six months on pain of fine or imprisonment. If Sir John Forrest should assert that in stating this much we are amongst those who, faring sumptuously every day, slander Australia, we must refer him to Mr. Coghlan, who, faring sumptuously—we may hope—in London, is the author of the slander. . . .

Surely nothing can disparage and discredit Australia so much as a provision of this sort, which skilled officials cannot interpret rightly, and respecting which the Prime Minister is evidently in a state of confusion. None of Mr. Deakin's oracular refinements can do away with the impression which the experiences of that groom will make in Great Britain. Mr. Cope-land, when Agent-General, reported that the man-in-the-street in England was talking about the six hatters case with strong resentment, and implored the Commonwealth to repeal the section which sanctioned such treatment as they received. Now the whole of that bad impression will be renewed and intensified. From various utterances made by Mr. Deakin we may conclude that he was willing to favorably consider an amendment of the section, making it correspond to the purpose of Parliament in passing it. That purpose was to prevent the importation of labourers to overpower Australian workmen in case of strikes arising out of industrial disputes. We have now Wages Boards, State Arbitration Acts, and a Federal Arbitration Act. Strikes should now, if we can believe the promoters of those Acts, be things of the past. Then why not boldly repeal the obnoxious and mischievous restriction altogether, since if there are to be no more strikes it will not be required? If Mr. Deakin has not courage enough to propose that course, he might at least amend the clause in the spirit of the suggestions which have been made, that the prohibition shall not apply to immigrants who are not hired to take the place of workmen on strike or engaged in defending what they may consider to be their rights. When the provision was inserted, on the motion of Mr. Watson, it was intended to apply to such cases only. It has been extended in operation in a most injurious way. If it is to remain in the Act no time should be lost before inserting words to restrict it to its original purpose.

Last night I quoted from a leading article published in the Age, and I am pleased to say that the Argus and the Age are very much in accord in this matter. The sooner we repeal the section to which I have referred, the better it will be for Australia. I am very glad indeed that the leader of the Labour Party has expressed his willingness—and I take it that he speaks for his party—to modify the contract section. I regret that the honorable member for Bland is not sitting on this side of the Chamber. I am sure that he could do better work here than upon the Ministerial benches. He is a liberal-minded man, and if he were as free as I am he would be able to exercise a beneficial influence upon our legislation.

Mr. WATSON.—I would not misrepresent the laws of the country.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—It was through the honorable member's influence with the Barton Government that that contract section was adopted, and I am very glad that the honorable member now sees the error of his ways.

Mr. WATKINS.—Did not the honorable member support the Barton Government?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Yes; and I supported the very section to which I have been referring. It was then understood that it was only to be applied to the purpose of excluding men whom it was desired to bring here under contract, at low rates of wages, to replace workmen who were on strike. I never imagined for a moment that men like the honorable member for Newcastle and myself would have obstacles placed in the way of their landing here.

Mr. WATKINS.—That is not the fact.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The honorable member knows that obstacles have been placed in the way of men landing here, and I need only cite the case of the six hatters, who were kept on board ship for a week before they were permitted to set foot on shore.

Mr. WATKINS.—They kept themselves there.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Then I might mention the case of a certain blind gentleman, who was refused permission to land at Hobart.

Mr. GROOM.—That was not under the contract section.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—That gentleman was refused permission to land, although he could have bought and sold the whole of Hobart. Judging from his case and others, there is very little liberty in this land of ours, and I think the contract section of the Immigration Restriction Act should be repealed without delay.

Mr. WATSON.—If it is to be misrepresented in the way the honorable member is misrepresenting it, it had better be repealed.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—A very impression has been created, not only in foreign countries, but in our own land, and it is generally thought that an Englishman, Irishman, or Scotchman can land here only after experiencing considerable difficulty.

Mr. FISHER.—That misrepresentation has been made to a large extent by those who are paid to properly represent the States.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The gentleman to whom reference has been made will come to England and tell his own story, which will create a most unfavorable impression. If I were not interested in the welfare of Australia I should not bother myself to discuss this matter. I have been here for forty-two years, and I wish to remain as much longer as I can, and do everything possible to promote the prosperity of the country, which has treated me so well. Fortunately, when I came in 1862, there was no Labour Party, no Immigration Restriction Act, no contract section, and I was permitted to go and work out my own destiny.

Mr. FISHER.—The inference to be drawn from the honorable member's remarks is that that could not be done now. It is not fair.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The honorable member knows that difficulties have been placed in the way of persons desiring to land here, and I think we should endeavor to clear away any wrong impression that has been formed. We should not have any law capable of such an interpretation as would prevent legitimate immigration from coming in here freely. The States already have an immense population.

Mr. WATSON.—They are receiving more immigrants than any other country in the world, notwithstanding the provisions that have been made against the introduction of persons under contract.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Yes; but the United States did not endeavour to prevent any one from entering the United States when the population of that country numbered only 5,000,000.

Mr. WATSON.—It was because of their experience then that they subsequently placed restrictions upon immigration.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I can remember that when I was a schoolboy a man came round to the parish in which I was living and induced half the population to go to America. The children of so immigrants are now amongst the most intelligent men in America. We should encourage people to come here from the old country, instead of placing difficulties in their way. I would impress upon the Government the desirability of removing all existing obstacles at as early a date as possible, and of making it known in the old country that we are ready to receive white immigrants from Great Britain and the Continent with open arms. I notice that provision is made upon the Estimates for a payment of £120,000 to the Orient Steamship Company for the carriage of English mails. I very much regret that in the new mail contract Brisbane was excluded as a port of call.

MR. FISHER.—The honorable member reported the Government which entered into that contract.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—Had that Government remained in power until the question of the mail subsidy came up for consideration, it might have been the means of dissolving it.

MR. WATSON.—The honorable member was for the late Government after the contract had been completed.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—The right honorable member for East Sydney knew perfectly well the treatment he might expect from me when the English mail contract came up for consideration in this House. I could have liked him to continue in office until that question was discussed, because I should have been glad of the opportunity to show honorable members opposite that, although I supported the right honorable member when I considered that he was doing what was right, I was prepared to condemn him when the occasion required that action.

MR. BAMFORD.—Would the honorable member have ousted the late Ministry upon this question?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—I do not care to enter into such a direct question as that, but I could have acted as I thought the occasion warranted me in acting. The present Government having taken over the responsibilities of the late Ministry, I ask them to do justice to Queensland in this matter. I appeal to them to place that State upon the same footing as the other States. I do not seek any favour for Queensland. If I did so, I am sure that the people of that State would promptly resent my action.

Even if the Prime Minister is not fully aware of it, it is a fact that the Queensland Government have entered into an arrangement with the Orient Company, under which that company has agreed to send its mail steamers to Brisbane every fortnight in return for a payment of £26,000 annually. I ask the honorable and learned gentleman to seriously consider whether the Commonwealth cannot take over that liability, so that it may be charged to the States upon a population basis. The existing contract with the Orient Company does not apply to the carriage of mails alone, but also to that of cargo. If the present service ended at Adelaide, Queensland would raise no objections. But the mails for the eastern States have to be brought on from Adelaide by arrangement.

MR. FISHER.—The honorable member means that the contract should be for the carriage of mails from the United Kingdom to Adelaide?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—Exactly. Of the subsidy of £120,000 which is paid to the Orient Company, Queensland contributes, roughly speaking, about £16,000, for which she obtains practically no value. Why should she not enjoy the same advantages as are conferred upon the other States? The existing contract stipulates that the mail steamers must be fitted with refrigerating chambers, and must call at Melbourne and Sydney. That, I contend, is unfair.

MR. KELLY.—At how many ports in Queensland does the honorable member suggest the mail steamers should call?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—At only one. The first steamer belonging to the Orient Company reached Brisbane on Thursday last, and loaded with butter upon the following day. Upon her arrival some jollification took place, and the vessel left again upon Saturday.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The mail steamers visit Sydney to suit their own convenience.

MR. FISHER.—The contract distinctly provides that they must call there.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—The present contract expressly stipulates that the steamers must call at Melbourne and Sydney. I would not object to that, if they were paid only for the conveyance of mails to Adelaide; but the carriage of mails from Brisbane to Adelaide by rail involves Queensland in an additional expenditure of about £1,000 a year.

MR. CROUCH.—Would the honorable member deprive Sydney of the advantage of being the terminus of the mail service?

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I merely desire all the States to be placed upon the same footing. I had intended to deal with the question of the transfer of the States debts, but in view of the very able speech which was delivered by the honorable member for Mernda last evening, I do not think I should be justified in occupying further time by discussing that important matter. Consequently, I shall content myself with urging upon the Government the necessity of taking some definite action with a view to the solution of that difficult problem at as early a date as possible. This afternoon, I was very pleased to hear the honorable member for Kooyong give notice of a motion in favour of the appointment of a Select Committee to formulate a scheme for the transfer of those debts. We are all aware that that subject was one upon which the advocates of Federation were accustomed to lay especial emphasis. It was urged that the Commonwealth would take over the States debts, and that a very material saving in the annual interest bill would thus be effected. That was offered to the people as an inducement to accept Federation. I remember availing myself of this point at the first general election, and pointing out that a saving of considerably more than £1,000,000 a year was likely to be effected by the Commonwealth taking over the whole of the debts of the States. I told the electors that instead of the States having to pay, as at present, £8,300,000 a year, by way of interest on their loans, the transfer of the debts to the Commonwealth would mean a reduction of the interest bill to £7,000,000, and I ventured to hope that the saving thus secured would be devoted to a Commonwealth system of old-age pensions. Nothing has yet been done to this end, but I trust that action will be taken in the near future. I desire now to refer briefly to the question of the sugar bounty, which, honorable members must admit, is one of great importance to Queensland. Last year, the value of the sugar produced in that State was a little over £2,000,000, and there is every reason to expect that this year the output will be of even greater magnitude. I was pleased to learn that the Government had decided to extend the period for the operation of the bounty. In referring to this matter the Treasurer said—

In this connexion it is proposed to introduce Bills extending the bounty for five years after the expiration of the present time—that is, end of 1911—upon the same terms as contained in the existing Act.

Like those who are thankful for every mercies, Queensland will not be other than grateful for this slight measure of consideration, but I honestly believe the policy of the present Government have been to extend the bounty for not less than ten years. Even if they are not prepared to grant a ten years' extension on the present terms, they might well agree to an extension of the bounty, as at present, for five years, and to its continuation on a graduated basis during a second five years' period. I think a proposition would be generally acceptable to the representatives of Queensland. I may say that, upon the whole, the opinion of the representatives of that State are unanimous in favour of this question.

Mr. FISHER.—There is a difference of opinion as to the method of continuing the bounty.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—That may be. Sugar is not grown in some of the territories; but, upon the whole, I think the representatives of Queensland are working together to secure to that State to which, in our opinion, she is fairly entitled. It should be borne in mind that the sugar industry of Queensland was established and built up by the assistance of coloured labour, and that but for that labour it would not be in existence. The Parliament has decided that the territories shall be deprived of kanaka labour at the end of next year, but it has not made any provision to supply them with other labour to take its place. In these circumstances, I feel that I shall be justified in asking the Parliament, at the present time, to extend the bounty for another ten years. Referring for a moment to the issue, I believe there is considerable discussion as to whether the Commonwealth has the power to deport kanakas. This is a question of law with which I cannot deal definitively. I would point out, however, that the kanakas came into Queensland under contract to work on the sugar plantations for three years, and that at the end of that period they were free to enter their contract for a further period of three years. No agreement was made between the Government of Queensland and the planters and kanakas for the retention of the latter to their islands, and in these circumstances some members of the profession are of opinion that Commonwealth Government, powerful as it has not the authority to deport coloured labourers. I have only to direct my attention to another subject that the sugar industry is of great importance, not only to Queensland but to the Commonwealth, and that those who have built it up deserve every consideration at the hands of this Parliament. They do not seek permission to employ coloured labour for all time, but fail to extend the bonus for ten years. It would not be unreasonable to give the kanakas at present in Queensland to remain, say, for five years longer.

MR. PAGE.—Was not that the cry raised by the planters in 1885—"Give us the labour for another ten years, and we will then be prepared to let them go"?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—I think that the honorable member for Maranoa will admit that we have not the labour to take the place of that of the 7,000 kanakas who, it is said, will be deported at the end of the year.

MR. FRAZER.—To what extent have the planters endeavoured to obtain labour in Queensland for that of the coloured labourers?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—It is unlikely that the planters would seek to secure labour beyond Australia in view of the fact that it would be a breach of the contract for bringing men into the Commonwealth.

MR. HUMPHREY COOK.—Have they sought labour within Australia?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—I believe that a large number of the planters have endeavoured to carry out the Commonwealth legislation bearing upon the immigration of labour.

MR. McDONALD.—I think that they have done exactly the reverse.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—I would remind the honorable member for Kennedy that the difference between the wages of the kanakas and those paid to the white worker is slight.

MR. WILKINSON.—The planters desire labour to work for kanakas' wages.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—I repeat that there is but a slight difference between the wages paid to kanakas and white workers in the sugar industry. It may be said that the kanaka is simple-minded, but as a rule he is fairly wide awake. He has to serve his employer with docility, and for the first twelve years is not of great value to his employer.

MR. McDONALD.—But what about the conditions under which he is prepared to work?

MR. R. EDWARDS.—My only desire is to point out that the difficulty in regard to the substitution of white for coloured labour does not relate solely to pecuniary considerations. I regret to say—and I make this statement without desiring in any way to be offensive—that the white worker is sometimes unreliable.

MR. BAMFORD.—The planters are afraid that he will be too reliable at the ballot-box.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—The white worker in the sugar industry sometimes forgets on Monday morning to return to his work. I repeat that I have no desire to hurt the feelings of the white workers, but, according to the evidence of the planters, the kanaka has been found more reliable.

MR. BAMFORD.—An Act was passed specially to prevent the kanaka from obtaining strong drink.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—It would be a good thing if there were an Act to prevent many others besides kanakas from obtaining strong drink. I hold that it would not be unreasonable to allow the kanakas in Queensland to remain for a further period of five years, and long before that time, I hope we shall have a regular migration of reliable farm labourers to our shores. If the sugar planters could indent farm labourers for, say, three years, they would go to the expense of getting them—naturally, as many as possible, from Australia, but otherwise from other countries. The result would be that the men who came out and worked with the planters for three years would be learning the business of sugar-growing, and at the end of the period the majority of them would take up land, and become planters. In this way the planters would become immigration agents, and introduce persons at no expense to the Commonwealth.

MR. McDONALD.—It did not turn out in that way when the Italians were introduced. Within three months they all left the plantations.

MR. R. EDWARDS.—I do not think our experience of the Italians is of much value in this connexion. If the payment of the bounty were stopped, the sugar industry would pass into the hands of Chinese and other aliens. Already a large number of Chinese are sugar-growers. Even with the aid of the present bounty, the planters will have hard work to compete with other countries, where cheap labour is in abundance. To give an idea of the alien population in the northern portion of Queensland, let me quote a small paragraph—

The number of Asiatics, including Japanese, Chinese, Hindoos, and Cingalese, in the State is estimated as being over 14,000. A large proportion of these are engaged in tropical agriculture. The Chinese are not satisfactory labourers in the cane-fields when working for farmers. They prefer working on their own account, and for this reason are always on the alert for a piece of land to cultivate for themselves. Hence a large number of these aliens are renting land from white farmers. They work well while interested in the land; but as time goes on, and when the kanaka has gone, it will evidently be difficult for white farmers to hold the land, because when the Chinese find themselves masters of the labour situation they will not be slow in exacting to the fullest extent the value of their work, either as determined by the rent they pay the farmer, or as labourers in the cane-fields. This would be a very undesirable position to create. Therefore, if the farmers cannot get white labour, and are not permitted to use Polynesian or New Guinea labour, the Chinese element must, in the natural order of things, become a menacing factor in the maintenance of a White Australia. Chinamen are continually arriving in the northern agricultural districts, and the people generally are wondering where so many strange Chinamen are coming from. They are not arriving by sea, and it is concluded that they are making their way overland from Port Darwin.

So that in that respect Queensland has to receive the refuse of other States. After the passing of the Pacific Island Labourers Act, hordes of Cingalese, Assyrians, and other aliens went up to North Queensland. These are far more objectionable than the islanders, because they compete with white men to a greater extent than do the kanakas. They become shopkeepers, and before their arrival they were tradesmen, many of them being quite equal to the tradesmen of our own country. These are the men whom white workers have to be afraid of.

Mr. FRAZER.—Would the honorable member, in order to put them at a greater disadvantage, be willing to increase the Excise duty, and also the bounty?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I should be willing to restrain these men from doing the same work as our own countrymen. The fault I found with the Pacific Island Labourers Bill was that it imposed no restraint upon them. I remember telling the Prime Minister that if the Government would only include in its operation, Asiatics such as those I have named, so that they might be deported, like the kanakas, I support the measure. I suppose it will not be done. We can restrict the action of the people of any alien race, but we have not the power, I think, to restrict the Hindoos and Cingalese, though they are to be sent away. Occasionally, however, our honorable friends in the labour corner make error of their ways, and the time is coming when I think they will be crying for the re-admission of the kanaka, which was done in Queensland some fifteen years ago, even by the labouring men themselves.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is not so.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The labouring men found out that their occupation was becoming nil, and, therefore, they presented freely to the re-admission of the kanaka.

Mr. CULPIN.—It was the re-admission of the kanaka to Queensland which brought the Labour Party into existence there.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—They were in existence before that time.

Mr. McDONALD.—No; I was in existence after the re-admission of the kanaka.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Within a few days' sail from Queensland there are a number of countries in which sugar is very largely produced. In Java, which is only a few weeks' steam from Thursday Island, rice, coffee, and other tropical products are grown to a very large extent. The Government deal with the planters in a very liberal way. There is abundance of labour—Malays and Javanese—and the cost to the planters is, I think, a quarter of a guilder per day, which, in our money, would mean 5d. The planters receive no encouragement from the Government to lease, but not purchase, the best land for ninety-nine years at a nominal rent. During the first five years the rent is expected to be paid. This concession is given for the purpose of enabling the planters to get in a crop and reap the benefit. Fiji, which is still nearer to Queensland, there is no restriction on the employment of coloured labour. Although it is not the case in the British Colony, still kanakas and Indians are employed on the sugar plantations.

Mr. GROOM.—It is chiefly Hindoos who are employed.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I think so. It is not very far from Queensland is the island of Formosa, which, after the war between China and Japan, was the property of the latter country. Immediately after its transfer, steps to turn the island into a vast sugar plantation. In the near future, we shall have a large quantity of sugar brought to Australia from Formosa, and also from Java. I ask honorable members to keep all this in mind, and to give every consideration to the great industry of the island. If it is destroyed, or if it is damaged, so far as not to be able to supply the requirements of the Commonwealth, we shall have to import sugar. It has been grown and manufactured in far more servile labour than ever in Queensland. The industry in the island is unable to secure a supply of the white labour. If we take away the kanakas at the end of next year, will the men to take their places come from? The industry gives employment to a very large number of men. When the Pacific Island Labourers Bill was before the House, I pointed out that directly and indirectly it provided a living for no less than 50,000 men, women and children in Queensland, and Sir William McMillan declared, "Not less than 100,000." I am speaking of Queensland only, and I quite believe that he was right, if he was that in New South Wales and the island about 100,000 persons are dependent upon the sugar industry for a living. I am sure that included the planters, their families and children, and the men employed on the plantations, as well as those engaged in the shipping, on the wharves, and in cart-

BAMFORD.—The most liberal estimate ever heard was 20,000.

R. EDWARDS.—There are 20,000 plantations alone, but I included indirectly employed in connexion with the industry. We must also include the men who supply horse feed to the plantations in North Queensland, because though they have plenty of land, they usually purchase their maize. The sugar industry is in its infancy, and if it receives reasonable encouragement, it will grow to ten times its present magnitude, and give employment to many thousands of our own people.

MCDONALD.—What percentage goes to the sugar?

R. EDWARDS.—I am not prepared to say, though I may be able to make a remark or two on that subject later. I know that some people for various reasons are opposed to the extension of the sugar industry. But if they look at the matter in a broad, liberal-minded manner, I am sure, come to the conclusion that Queensland is not asking for anything unreasonable. I hold in my hand a copy of a leading article which contains an effective reply to some of the arguments used by the honorable member for South Sydney. It was published in the Brisbane Courier, of Wednesday, 30th August, and is headed "Queensland Traducers."—

It would seem to require Sydney Smith's surgical operation to enable some of the Southern legislators to understand the real facts relating to the sugar industry and the bonus paid on the product of white labour. Thus in yesterday's debate on the Budget in the House of Representatives Mr. Edwards, of New South Wales, made a pathetic reference to the alleged burden which the other States have to bear on behalf of Queensland. He declared that the people of Australia were now paying £1,022,000 more for their sugar than they would if there were no sugar bounties, excise, or bonus. He also urged that if the sugar bonus were extended the greatest care must be taken not to injure other industries. Sugar was a raw material in other industries, and if six industries were to be perpetually injured to assist one it would be a very dangerous departure. The premises of this argument and the conclusion drawn from them are equally indefensible. It would have been more to the purpose if Mr. Edwards had taken the trouble to compare the Customs revenue derived from sugar prior to Federation with that paid under the conditions determined by Commonwealth legislation. If he had done so he would have found that in the case of the whole of Australia there has been an actual decrease of whatever burden was due to a duty of any kind on sugar. What has free sugar to do with the sugar bonus? Long before Federation was made a question of practical politics the whole of the States had imposed sugar duties, and even in Mr. Edwards' own State the free-trade Premier, Mr. G. H. Reid, was compelled to pause in carrying out his own policy of reducing the Customs duty on sugar to the vanishing point. Yet the New South Wales sugar industry was only a fraction compared with that which has hitherto found an abiding-place in Queensland, and the labour difficulties of the south were trifling as compared with our own. When the sugar bonus has been added, it can be shown by comparison of facts that the adjoining State carries no heavier burden than was borne without complaint in the years when the triumphant boast was made about her being the only free-trade colony in the Empire. What industries have suffered from the payment of a bonus to revolutionize the labour conditions of a great national industry? Can Mr. Edwards give any specific reply, and, if he can, would he be able to show that the injury done to any small industry was at all proportionate to the injury which would be done by the destruction of an established industry which represents more to Queensland than the mining industry to New South Wales, wheat-growing to South Australia, and the dairying industry to Victoria? Would Mr. Edwards be prepared to sacrifice all the mining industries of his own State if such depended on the imposition of a Tariff which theoretically was not in accordance with the principles of free-trade? Yet this is the very thing he asks the Federal Parliament to do in the case of Queensland. Every petty industry in Sydney and Melbourne, employing, perhaps, a score of hands, is to be given protection, while an exception is to be made in the case of one of the greatest industries in the Commonwealth. It is a distortion of fact to say that Queensland is being paid for carrying out a policy decided upon prior to Federation. The payment so far has been nothing, and the policy now in force is solely that of the Commonwealth Parliament, which scorned even inquiry into subjects about which it was totally ignorant.

That is quite true. What we are asking for in the form of a bonus to sugar produced by white people, is simply protection similar to that which has been granted to some of the manufacturing industries. It will be remembered that this Parliament positively refused to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the sugar industry and the conditions of labour connected with it. Even now I think that it has a claim for an inquiry, just as much as had those industries which were able to use enough influence to cause the appointment of a Royal Commission to investigate the operation of the Tariff. So far, only a small portion of the fertile lands of tropical Queensland have been utilized. There is an immense area that has not been touched. North of Port Douglas, right up to Cape Yorke, there are thousands of acres which could be cultivated for sugar production, and for the growth of coffee, rice, and other tropical products. That land will not be allowed to remain idle for all time. Within a few days' steam, there are millions of people who could, if permitted, make good use, not only of the fertile lands of tropical Queensland, but also of the Northern Territory. Australia will have great difficulty in keeping clear of them. It is our duty, as white men, to settle as many white people as we possibly can on these lands. We ought to take possession of the lands and utilize them, and not act the dog in the manger. If it be necessary to employ a limited number of black labourers, I can see no objection to such a course, which, in my opinion, would not prevent the realization of the desire of everyone to have a White Australia—our own people for Australia.

Mr. WATKINS.—We do not know what may happen after that letter which was written by the honorable member to his friend in Wales.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—If the honorable member desires information, he had better ask a few questions on the subject. I should like to give the Committee the views of some men who have had many years' practical experience in Queensland—the Melbourne Argus of the 26th of this year, there appeared, under the heading "Sugar Growing: Queensland Views," an account of an interesting interview with a planter, who said—

The rate of pay in our district to fr—Chinese, Japanese, and Hindoos—is 26s. per week without rations. The ind kanakas cost 18s. to 20s. per week with and as there are only certain kinds of we can employ them at, we only get about months' effective service.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member say that kanakas are paid 18s. with rations?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Yes.

Mr. WATSON.—That is not true.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I am not sure what was stated in the interview.

Mr. WATSON.—Surely the honorable member knows that the statement is correct?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The statement is correct in so far that some kanakas under engagement in Queensland have resided there for twenty years.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member mean to say that kanakas are paid a week, with rations?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Yes.

Mr. WATSON.—We never heard of wages when the parliamentary member was in Queensland.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—No doubt kanakas are as good as, or better, than the honorable member and myself would do such work.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable member could not produce half-a-dozen kanakas who are being paid such a wage.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Twelve shillings a week is the highest wage paid to kanakas.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—It must be admitted that some of the kanakas have been working for years on the plantations; they do just as good work as any white man could do.

Mr. WATSON.—We never heard of wages, anyhow.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The question I am reading I only came across to-day. I hope I shall be allowed to complete it.

For the remainder of the year we have employed them at work we could often do so that alien labour is by no means cheap; it is reliable; that is the great point there when it is wanted, and will do as much as Of all alien labourers the Japanese is the most intelligent—quite equal in his adaptability to the white man. What I am afraid will inevitably happen when the kanakas of Queensland (about 6,500) are deported

6, will be that gradually cane sugar-growers in North Queensland will fall into the hands of free aliens who are there—Chinese, Japanese and Hindoos. Gradually the cane-fields are leased to them, and as long as the labour sugar will be grown by them, but the industry will not expand as it might do under wiser management and the white growers will become less in number.

There is a strong outcry on the part of the fruit-growers about the cost to them of producing white-grown sugar. We want no bonus for reasonable freedom be given to our enterprise. The two great natural industries of Australia are to be the necessary complement of each other.

North Queensland has been fitted by nature to produce for consumer and manufacturer, a cheap home in the land, and for every fruit-grower cheap sugar, and plenty of it. You cannot, however, introduce unnatural and unwise reasons to bolster up one industry without hurting another. No one wishes to see the pre-eminence of the white race in Australia ended in the least degree.

The complaint is that proper precautions could not be taken to avoid this without putting in force legislation based on an imperfect knowledge of the conditions which govern production. The fruit-grower and the sugar-grower have common interests against legislation which has hit fruit-growing badly, and will not advance, but in the end will destroy cane-sugar production in tropical Queensland.

WATSON.—A tissue of misrepresentation!

R. EDWARDS. — These are the facts. I presume, of some sugar planter who happened to be on a visit to Melbourne.

WILKINSON.—Is the name of the planter given?

R. EDWARDS.—I do not see the name of the planter in the report, but no doubt it could easily be ascertained.

WATSON.—Dr. Maxwell is the best authority on that matter.

R. EDWARDS.—Dr. Maxwell has recently stated that north of Mackay the sugar industry will perish if coloured labour is driven away.

WATSON. — Dr. Maxwell does not say that.

R. EDWARDS.—I shall produce Dr. Maxwell's words at another time.

WATSON. — Dr. Maxwell said it would be more costly to grow sugar by coloured labour than by coloured labour, but I did not say anything about the industry being unprofitable.

R. EDWARDS.—From the 15th to the 20th May of this year, a conference of sugar tourists was held at Cairns, and some very interesting papers were read on that occasion.

WATSON.—Even Mr. Draper addressed the meeting at Cairns, in the presence of the honorable member, that sugar can be grown by white labour.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I admit the truth of what the honorable member says. The papers read at the conference to which I have referred contained the opinions of practical cane-growers, and I think some notice ought to be taken of their utterances. One of the papers on the subject, "White Australia, and the Sugar Industry in the Tropics," by Mr. Edwin S. Waller, manager, of Herbert River, contained the following:—

Being a sugar-planter, and having lived for thirty-four years on the Herbert River, North Queensland, which is a truly tropical climate, I think I may justly claim to have had considerable experience of the climate, and that I should know something about its suitability for white labour for field work.

As this is a very critical time for the sugar industry in North Queensland, it behoves us to consider the matter seriously. I am anxious to place before this conference some of my views, and bring forward a resolution which, I trust, will be carried unanimously.

The important question at the present time (which concerns all interested in the sugar industry, especially in North Queensland), is:—"Is this industry to be allowed to die out?"

Sugar in this State last year was worth £2,000,000.

The people who live in the Southern States, New South Wales, Victoria, and even in South Queensland, have a totally different climate to live in, and, therefore, cannot understand what effect a very hot and moist atmosphere has on the European constitution. Those who, like myself, have lived here for a number of years, and do know, will tell you that malarial fever is at times very prevalent, the climate is extremely enervating, especially to women and girls, who are compelled to make periodical visits to southern and cooler climates in order to restore their health. The effect on the men is similar; they must have occasional changes and spells. If the question were asked of medical men who have lived for a number of years in the tropics—"What is the effect of the climate on a European constitution?" I believe that five out of six would say that the race would in time degenerate.

Mr. Waller does not say that the race would degenerate in a year, but that it would degenerate in time.

White men are able to do all the mechanical and skilled work, also the horse driving required for cultivation, but for other field work I have found them unreliable, and I maintain that white labour for field work in North Queensland has been fairly tried and proved unsuccessful. If the cane-growers in North Queensland are debarred from using coloured labour for field work, the sugar industry must collapse, or, as an alternative, the Chinese and Japanese will come and take the place of the European farmers. I ask, "Will this benefit the White Australian cause?" I would point out that in no other tropical part of the world is sugar grown without the aid of coloured labour; and, this being so, why should the Commonwealth Parliament try to go against the laws of nature, and expect Europeans to do the work they are not suited for?

What is the answer to the questions:—"Why are all tropical countries peopled with coloured races?" "Can the Creator have made a mistake?" The answer is plain enough. They are adapted to the climate, and they were created accordingly. Then why on earth should they not be allowed to help us to open the country and develop its resources?

This gentleman appears to have some doubt as to whether the Creator has not made a mistake. All I can suggest is that the Creator may have failed to consult the leader of the Labour Party in Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—Did the Creator consult the honorable member for Oxley as to this little matter?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—No.

Mr. WATSON.—That is an unfortunate oversight.

Mr. WILKINSON.—What conference is the honorable member referring to?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The conference held at Cairns.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I have here the report of a conference held on the 20th February, at Townsville, at which quite the opposite opinion was expressed.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The honorable member is aware that Cairns is about 100 miles further north than Townsville.

Mr. WILKINSON.—There were delegates at the Townsville conference from the Johnstone and Mossman Rivers.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The climatic conditions vary in different parts of the State. I have no doubt that in southern Queensland, sugar-growing could be carried on as a flourishing industry by white labour; but the sugar-cane suffers from frost in the southern districts. If we go further north to Childers and Bundaberg we shall find that it is not a very hard matter to carry on sugar-growing with white labour in those districts. But when we get as far north as Mackay, the climate is very much warmer, and there are some persons who say that it is impossible to carry on the industry in that part of the State with white labour alone. When we get as far north as Cairns, we find that it is very much hotter than at Mackay, and Port Douglas, another sugar district, is still further north.

Mr. McDONALD.—I do not think it is hotter at Cairns than at Mackay.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Bundaberg has the record for the highest temperature in Queens-

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I do not think the honorable member can say that is surely reasonable to suppose that it is very much greater at Cairns than at Bundaberg, seeing that Cairns is several hundred miles further north, and is within the tropics.

Mr. WILKINSON.—The honorable member will admit that there may be other conditions which will affect the climate.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—There may be certain places, but I am justified in saying that the climate is very much hotter in the Cairns district than it is in any of the districts south of Cairns.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member think that coloured labour should be imported for the sugar plantations?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—No, by no means, but I think that kanaka labour should be allowed until the period fixed for the payment of the sugar bounties has expired.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member's argument is that the industry should be allowed to die then?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—No. I think it is possible that before the end of the time we might have a stream of farm labourers coming to our shores from Great Britain, or from some European country, who would take the place of the kanakas.

Mr. WILKINSON.—The honorable member admits that white labourers could do the work if we could get them.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Do not let the honorable friends contend that white labour can do this work?

Mr. WILKINSON.—The honorable member has quoted a statement which they cannot.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—That is not the point. It is only fair that the views of both sides of the question should be put forward. The views of a man like the gentleman to whom I have quoted should be of great value to us, though we may not swerve from what he has to say. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the sugar industry is one of immense importance. The value of the sugar produced in Queensland last year amounted to over £2,000,000, and this year it is likely to amount to much more. We ought not to do anything which will interfere with the prosperity of so great an industry. I have here another interesting paper, from which I should like to make some extracts. The paper on "The Continuation of the Bonus," by Mr. R. S. Aiken, cil of Agriculture, at Bundaberg, the r says—

introducing this subject of the bonus, at the I wish it to be clearly understood that, sense of the word, have I any desire to into a controversy, whether cane be grown nite labour or not, and I hope subsequent ers will adopt the same policy. The law present time is, that the bonus will expire end of 1906. That is the bald fact. This as you are aware, is paid, in the first in-by the manufacturer, that is to say, there Excise duty of £3 a ton on all sugar manufactured; £2 of that is supposed to be repaid to cane-grower in the shape of a bonus; £1 retained by the Federal Treasurer for the pur-of paying the cost of administration. Last there were 145,000 tons of sugar manufac-in Queensland, which yielded an Excise of £1,000; £85,000 was refunded in bonuses, leaving a balance retained by the Federal Treasurer of £350,000. I maintain this: That either excise duty should be lowered; or else the amount of that £435,000 should be paid to the growers in increased bonus. We had to pay a rate of 6s. a ton on our cane towards the Government, and we get 4s. 4d. returned. North of Bundaberg it is 5s., south of Bundaberg we get 4s.
If we pay 6s. we get 4s. 4d. returned. I think the whole of the money that is paid in the bonus should be repaid to the growers of cane, and the Excise should be lowered from £3 a ton to £2, as the case may be. This money, £435,000, is retained by the Federal Treasurer, is distributed amongst the State Treasurers, according to population, under the assumption that the Federal Government finds this £435,000; but I do not agree with that. It may strike the consumer that he finds it; but, in the event of the industry being snuffed out, is there anything to show that the consumers will be able to obtain their sugar at a lesser price than they now pay for it? The maintenance of the sugar industry is, in fact, the only safeguard that the consumer has that he will get his sugar as cheaply as he can now. There are a number of resolutions being brought before this conference, which will endeavour to have another say, but I would like to say now that I sincerely hope that the reason for the extension of the bonus will be determined unanimously by this conference, more particularly when we have heard that in Melbourne a gentleman of the name of Peacock is advocating the abolition of the bonus. He is appealing to the fruit-growers of Victoria that if the bonus is done away with, he will be able to get the fruit-growers a higher price for their fruit. Is this the spirit we expected when we went upon Federation? Here we have a man advocating the killing of an industry in Queensland, which is one of the principal industries of the whole Commonwealth. We have this man advocating to destroy this industry, in order to build up the fruit industry of Victoria. He says we are large consumers of the article and he makes. I sincerely hope that we will settle this bonus question, because, in its wisdom, the Federal Parliament has expressed a willingness to pay a price for a White Australia. To be consistent, when the bonus expires in 1906, let the Government re-enact it, and act as men to those who were induced to enter into the Federal Union. In this connexion, I have also been induced to bring up the matter of the unrestricted registration for cane grown by white labour. At the present time, if the cane-farmer has planted his cane with black labour, and wishes to sell or lease that land, the lessee or the buyer of that particular land would not be able to claim the bonus, simply because the cane was planted with black labour. I take it, if we want this white-labour policy to be a success, that we should open the door as widely as possible, so that every man who desires to grow cane by white labour may do so. At the present time, many of the restrictions regarding the bonus hinder a man from employing white labour. If cane had been planted by black labour, and it was only a plant cane crop, then the owner would require to plough it out, and re-plant by white labour before he could claim the bonus.

I now propose to read the resolution moved by Mr. E. Swayne, of Mackay, who said—

I desire to move—"That in view of the feeling of great doubt and unrest which exists as to the continuance of the bounty, the Federal Government be requested to introduce at once a Bill to extend the provisions of the Sugar Bounty Act of 1903 for a further period of ten years at least." Mr. Aiken has spoken fully on the subject of the bonus, but I may point out, in addition, that this bounty, which was given us as a partial recompense for the labour taken away, does not really meet the increased cost of production. The resolution, therefore, contains no extravagant request.

I shall not read any of the speeches that were delivered in support of the resolution, which was carried unanimously, except that of Mr. G. A. Ball, of Killarney, who belongs to Southern Queensland, and cannot possibly have any interest in the sugar industry. He spoke as follows:—

I quite agree with Mr. Cameron, that it is very necessary that we should ask for a definite time, say, ten years at least. The financial aspect of the question must be looked at, and I happen to know that already a number of farmers propose approaching you, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of the erection of a central mill for them.
As a reasonable business man, however, I do not think you will invest the funds of the Queensland Government in a venture which may only have a life of two or three years. If you put your money out, you will want a reasonable security, and I do not think this conference would be asking a day too long if it asked for an extension of the bonus for another ten years.

The chairman referred to was the Hon.
D. F. Denham, Minister of Agriculture of Queensland. I hope that honorable members on both sides of the Chamber will consent to the extension of the sugar bonus for another ten years. I am sorry to say that Queensland has not benefited to any great extent as the result of Federation.
No consideration is extended to that State, even in regard to the mail steamers.
Queensland has lost £2,180,000 through the operation of the Federal Tariff, whereas Western Australia has benefited by the addition of £1,500,000 to her revenue.

Therefore, I consider that Queensland, with her great sugar industry, is deserving of every consideration. I would ask honorable members to bear in mind that this industry was built up by means of a peculiar class of labour, and that but for such labour the industry would not have been established. We must have sugar, and, as we know that that product is grown in other countries by employing black labour, I see no great objection to our utilizing that class of labour in our own cane-fields.

Mr. POYNTON.—The sugar industry was built up in New South Wales without the aid of coloured labour.

Mr. R. EDWARDS. — New South Wales would not be able to grow a sufficient quantity of sugar to meet all the requirements of the Commonwealth. If we have lands suitable for the growth of tropical products, we should put them to the uses to which they are specially adapted, even though we may have to employ a limited number of black labourers. What harm have the kanakas done to Australia?

Mr. PAGE.—We do not complain so much of the kanakas as of other coloured aliens.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—And yet the kanakas are being sent away from Australia, whilst no attempt is being made to get rid of the more objectionable class of coloured aliens, or to restrict them in their employment.

Mr. TUDOR.—We tried very hard to restrict their introduction by means of the Immigration Restriction Act.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Then that Act has apparently not been a success. As I have said, the people of Queensland have lost a very large sum through the operation of the Tariff.

Mr. PAGE.—The people of Queensland have not lost that money, but the Treasury has lost it.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The Treasurer told us the other night that the money was not lost, but was in the pockets of the people. But I would point out that whatever has been lost to the Queensland Treasury through the operation of the Tariff, has had to be made up through the medium of other taxes which have been imposed upon the people. I am sorry to say that the residents of Queensland have, speaking generally, had to put up with much reduced incomes during the last four or five years, whereas their expenditure has been increased by 50 per cent. owing to the additional taxation imposed upon them. I do not propose to detain honorable members any longer, but I hope that they have made up their minds to extend the bonus for another ten years.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable is asking too much.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I do not so, because the industry is well worth serving. It will be a disgrace to the Parliament if we do anything to interfere with the prosperity of the sugar industry.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then the honorable member must induce the members of the Opposition to vote for an extension of bounty.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The honorable gentleman was not present this noon when I pointed out that the members of the Labour Party are beginning to make the error of their ways. The Immigration Restriction Act would never have been passed without their aid. Occasionally, however, they overreach themselves, and then they are obliged to retract their steps.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Every State of the Commonwealth, through its Premier, has promised to submit to its Parliament a migration Restriction Bill, and did so in some of the States it was not. In New South Wales and Western Australia, however, the Bill became law.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I will be Treasurer if the Immigration Restriction Act, which was operative in Western Australia, applied to such men as the honorable member hatters?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think it did.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—That is not the case. I also hold in my hand two letters from Mr. Hertzberg, one of the leading merchants of Brisbane, and a gentleman who has made a particular study of the sugar industry, to the effect that the ship of the sugar bounty, to the benefit of that industry. I venture to say that the honorable members who have made up their minds to vote against an extension of bounty, would do well to read what Mr. Hertzberg has to say in this connection. The sugar industry is of so much importance to the Commonwealth that it is abundantly justified in having recourse to the patience of honorable members to the extent that I have.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moira).—I agree with those who claim that the time has been devoted to this debate has been entirely wasted, although I admit the Estimates nor the Budget containing very novel or startling. It is that in the Treasurer's statement some Scriptural injunctions are used with copious extracts from various statistics. We have also various dissertations from members of the Opposition, who, by their frequently conspicuous by their speeches from the Chamber, regarding matters which should govern the conduct of the business. They are particularly desirous that the present Government should receive directions from them, as to the way in which the business of the House should be conducted. I venture to say that some of the speeches delivered during the course of the debate will well repay perusal on the part of anybody who takes an interest in the welfare of the Commonwealth. I am desiring to make any invidious distinction in this connexion, I may be said to refer to the speeches of the honorable member for Mernda, the honorable member for Denison, and the honorable member for Corinella. I have listened attentively to those debates, and particularly to the eloquent address of the honorable member for Corinella, I have been led to the conclusion that the Estimates, as they are presented, are practically those of the Government, and that they involve no question of policy, apart from the proposal to continue the sugar bounty for a further term of five years. I can quite understand the representatives of Queensland being particularly concerned in that matter. When an industry has assumed such vast proportions, it is incumbent upon us to see that by our action we do not jeopardise its existence. At the same time, we must also protect the interests of the consumers. I have heard and read from time to time, there appears to be grave reason for doubt as to whether the cane-growers in Queensland get the full benefit of the bounty which the Commonwealth Parliament intended that they should have. I am, however, purpose to deal at the same time with the sugar question in detail, because I realize that, no matter what is said now, the whole matter will be discussed again in connexion with the Estimates. Coming to the question of the interest of the States debts, which is of great importance, I would point out that the ex-Treasurer has devoted a considerable amount of attention to it, and the Premiers of the States have met in conference to discuss it, we have had nothing further than mere abstract debating. We all know, especially those of us who have had experience in State politics, that our position in regard to the States is rather an unfortunate one, while it is also unfortunate for the Governments of the States that they should be dependent on the Commonwealth Government for a very considerable proportion of the revenue necessary for the conduct of their affairs. As was very ably pointed out last night by the honorable member for Mernda, the Customs and Excise revenue fluctuates considerably from year to year, because of unforeseen causes, and by way of illustration he recalled an experience of Victoria some years ago, when, in one year, the receipts from that source were diminished to a very material extent. I think, therefore, that it is incumbent upon this Parliament to insist, no matter what Ministry may be in power, on the settlement of the debts question at an early date. Instead of the Governments of the States being dependent on the Commonwealth as they are now, from year to year, for a considerable portion of their revenue, we should take over so much of their debts as would be equivalent to what they are entitled to receive from us. That might be a rough and ready way of dealing with the question, but I think that it would be more satisfactory to both the States and the Commonwealth than the present condition of affairs. With regard to the arrangement of details, the honorable member made a very valuable suggestion. We want the best advice on the subject that we can get. It is years since we were told by the leader of the Government of the day that an expert financier in Great Britain had been appointed to deal with this question. I do not know if the same fate has overtaken him as overtakes many who start out with a noble object in view, but for the last twelve months we have heard nothing further about the matter.

Mr. HUME COOK.—He is unpaid.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We cannot expect much from him if that is so. I was particularly pleased last night with the exhortation of the honorable member for Mernda to honorable members and the people outside not to slander Australia or Australian institutions, and I was delighted to see the effect which his eloquent appeal had upon a speaker who had preceded him in the afternoon. It produced a feeling of astonishment in me to hear, within the walls of this Chamber, an honorable member seriously insist upon the absolute necessity of holding out inducements to people to come to these shores to settle on our rural land, to populate our cities, and to assist in production, and, in the same breath, say that no matter under what conditions they might live here, they would eventually descend to the level of blackfellows. The honorable member, in that sweeping statement, included not only the residents of the back-blocks of Australia but also the factory hands employed in our large centres of population.

Mr. HUME COOK.—He afterwards apologized.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The apology was worse than the original slander; because I look upon his remarks as a slander upon the people of Australia. I have had considerable experience in the back-blocks, both on the mountain ranges and on the plains of the western interior, and I have never seen, even as an exception, a person such as the honorable member described. I have been over the mountain ranges, which commence at the end of what is practically the suburban railway to Healesville, to Mansfield, King River, the Omeo Plains, Monaro, and on to Gundaroo, and I say that you will not find anywhere a more sturdy and better developed race, both physically and mentally, than the inhabitants of those parts. Some persons are at times inclined to deride and ridicule those engaged in rural pursuits, but to make a success of such pursuits—and the greater number of those engaged in them have been successful—there is necessary not brawn and muscle only, but brain as well. Brawn and muscle alone would not have overcome the natural difficulties that hindered settlement in the western portion of New South Wales, or on the mountain ranges and tablelands of Australia. Forethought and perception were also needed. What has developed the country on the tableland between here and Sydney—and I refer more particularly to this country, because I know practically every inch of it? In my short lifetime enormous forests have been levelled, and comfortable homes built, not merely by the exercise of muscle, but by the application of brain power to the removal of all the difficulties of the work. For an honorable member, who has apparently been reared in the lap of luxury, to speak of those who have built up Australia, under conditions of hardship, living like blackfellows, and becoming a degenerate race, is to slander our people. I have not a full knowledge of the condition of those employed in our factories, but I have a slight knowledge of the conditions in Melbourne, and I say that the honorable member had visited the factories, and had seen the people who work there, he would know that his remarks were a slander upon them. I admit that whenever large numbers of people are crowded close together, as they do in some of the larger cities of Australia, there is sure to be a certain amount of destitution and poverty. But it is only where the bread-winners are unable to find constant employment, and thus to earn sufficient to give their families a reasonable degree of comfort, that absolute destitution. It is when people living in large cities are unable to find employment in the factories or elsewhere, that the honorable member spoke so slightly of poverty and wretchedness arise. What proposal has he to make for the improvement of the lot of the workers of Australia? The honorable member poses as one who would do much for the Commonwealth, yet he would expose our workers to the strictest competition on the part of the races of the rest of the earth. I will give a few moments to direct attention to what I think is incumbent upon the present any other Ministry actuated by any desire to promote the welfare of Australia. Statements are periodically made that the first duty of the Government is to attract immigrants to our shores. The honorable member for Hunter, and others of his ilk, have again and again urged that should be done. It is certainly desirable that we should have a larger population, as the cost of government would be distributed over a wider area, and would fall more lightly on the people individually. I maintain, however, that it would be absolutely useless to encourage immigration unless we could provide those who come with employment. The statement has frequently been made by honorable members of the Opposition that the labour situation of recent years—and particularly the Immigration Restriction Act—has been chiefly responsible for the stoppage of migration to Australia. I should know, however, how it is that practically before the advent of the Labour Par-political life of Australia, and consequently prior to the passing of labour legislation, immigration to Australia had not ceased, but we were unable to retain population that we had. In support of this assertion, I refer honorable members to Coghlan. I regret that the contentious representatives of New South Wales, who are constantly drawing attention to the absence of Ministers or their supporters from the House, are to-night conspicuous by their absence. They are first to complain when any of the Ministerial supporters are not present to listen to their railings against the Government, because of some imaginary fault, and yet, in a reply is forthcoming to any of the statements which they are so prone to make, they are missing. If an honorable member on this side of the House leaves the Chamber to secure some much-needed refreshment, after listening to them for hours, there is at once an outcry, and a demand for a Ministerial supporter to enter the billiard-room while the member is sitting is little short of a crime. And yet these honorable members absent themselves without question. What were the conditions prevailing in New South Wales before the establishment of the Commonwealth? If honorable members turn to Coghlan, page 154, they will find that in 1893—years before the Liberal Party in New South Wales could have done any damage, because they were under the paternal care of the right honorable member for East Sydney, who maintained office by means of their support—New South Wales lost, by emigration over immigration, 1,560 persons. In 1896, when the leader of the Opposition in this House was still Premier of New South Wales, and there was no labour legislation, and not even an Immigration Restriction Act in force, the number of emigrants from that State was 3,967 in excess of the immigrants.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The right honorable member for East Sydney was then producing New South Wales to all the theories of free-trade.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is so. A still more remarkable fact is that in 1902 and 1903—when the Immigration Restriction Act was passed by this Parliament—New South Wales had an excess of immigrants over emigrants totalling over 11,000.

Mr. FULLER. — The immigrants came principally from Victoria.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am not referring to the places from which they came—that is for the moment an immaterial consideration.

Mr. McCAY.—It is important having regard to the fact that the honorable member says that the Immigration Restriction Act was then in force.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That may or may not be.

Mr. WATSON. — If this immigration came from Victoria it had nothing to do with the Immigration Restriction Act.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Quite so. As to the statement that they came from Victoria—

Mr. FULLER.—We were glad to have them.

Mr. KENNEDY.—And Victorians are glad to go to New South Wales, for it is a splendid, although, in part, undeveloped, country. Coghlan shows that the population of Victoria, as compared with that of New South Wales, is practically congested. In Victoria we have 13.76 persons to the square mile, while in New South Wales the number is only 4.61 to the square mile. Those who have traversed the mountainous districts as well as the western plains of the two States know that there is proportionately a larger area of good land in New South Wales than there is in Victoria.

Mr. CAMERON.—But the honorable member includes all bad land.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I include the whole area of each State.

Mr. CAMERON.—What is the proportion of bad land in New South Wales?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Speaking from practical knowledge and experience, I can say that proportionately, there is a larger area of waste land in Victoria than in New South Wales. As a matter of course, the trend of population is from the more congested districts to country in which the population is sparse, and which offers opportunities for progress and development. There has been a constant stream of emigration from Europe to America, and for very many years from Victoria to New South Wales. Those who are engaged in agricultural and pastoral pursuits can account in a small manner for the aggregation of people in centres of population. Take farming as an illustration. The same amount of labour is not required on a farm to-day to produce any given quantity of grain or other produce as was needed twenty-five years ago. An enormous proportion of the work of production on the farm to-day is practically done in the factories in the city. Suppose that thirty years ago, when my experience as a farmer began, a man had a crop of one hundred acres of wheat. Assuming that he had a reaper, which was not commonly in use at that time, it would take ten men with a team of horses ten days to take off the wheat, and from twelve to fifteen men with a threshing machine two days to put the wheat into bags. What is the condition to-day? Two men, or, to use the general expression, a man and a boy, who is off-sider to bring a change of horses and sew the bags, now take off the same acreage and bag the wheat in ten days.

Mr. CAMERON.—If the farmer uses a stripper, but not if he uses a reaper and binder.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Owing to the width of cut, he cuts it in less time with the reaper and binder than he did with the old reaper, and, with three men and a team of horses, he puts it in the stoop in seven days. The labour which was engaged on the farm thirty years ago is now employed in the factory making the machine. If it is not so employed there it has been displaced entirely, and the labour of America or Europe, or Great Britain, is employed to make the machine.

Mr. FULLER.—Will the honorable member tell us the difference in the area under cultivation and the production to-day, as against twenty years ago?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have not the figures at hand, but they are to be seen in the Statistical Register. Given a normal harvest in Victoria, the production of wheat in the mid-eighties was practically just as great as it is to-day.

Mr. FULLER.—Will the honorable member quote the figures for New South Wales?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It was the inability of the Victorian farmer to get land, the peculiar conditions prevailing amongst the pastoralists in southern New South Wales in the early nineties, and their utter inability to deal with foot-rot in sheep, that developed wheat-growing there, under a system of slavery.

Mr. FULLER.—That is a new idea! I never heard of that before.

Mr. KENNEDY.—With very rare exceptions, no man can successfully grow wheat on the share system in New Wales.

Mr. FULLER.—I know that it is very successfully in the constituency of the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. WATSON.—Successfully for the owner.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is absolutely successful for the land-owner, and as to the production for the State generally it is absolutely unsuccessful for the unfortunate producer.

Mr. FULLER.—A number of Victorian farmers are doing well under the system to-day.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I admit that a number of Victorian farmers went into New South Wales on the share system, with the idea that at an early date the pastoral leases then about to expire would be made available for selection. But for one cause or another that was not done. When the seasons were good and the labour normal, the men were able to get a return for their labour, but when the seasons became irregular and prices went below a certain level, they did not get their sustenance for the year. I know some men who went over to Southern New South Wales with their plant, prepared to put in a year and wait for an opportunity to get their own; but, unfortunately, in many cases, at the end of a few years the squatter had the plant, while the man had the experience.

Mr. CAMERON.—And still they are pouring in from Victoria.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes, they keep pouring in, and a number have been able to acquire holdings of their own. The same remarks apply more particularly to the country lying between the Murrumbidgee, and extending to the Lachlan. Frequently when a block of land is made available there it is taken up by from 300 to 500 persons, beyond all doubt that sufficient land is available to satisfy the number of persons. I am one of those who do not attract population to Australia. In the first instance, there is a divided duty. The Commonwealth has no land to offer. The land is directly under the control of the States, but, unfortunately, no State has formulated a scheme by which it would be possible for men without means to get to the land, and make a livelihood.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Does the honorable member mean men in this country?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I mean men in or of this country. If there is a man in the world who can make a living on a bit of land with very little means to start with, it is the Australian. If an Australian has an intimate knowledge of local conditions, and who has been reared to the pursuits, cannot succeed on land without money, certainly the man who comes from a foreign country will not do so without undergoing a very bitter experience indeed. Some States Governments have made an attempt, by resumption, to get the Crown land available; but as has been shown in New South Wales, the Crown land available is not equal to the demands.

Mr. WATSON.—They cannot find land at present for the sons of their own farmers.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No. The States Governments have made an attempt to resume private lands, but so far as I have been able to gather, the results have not been satisfactory. The Victorian Government has a scheme of land resumption for rural settlement, but up to the present time it has not been a success. There are many reasons which have contributed to this result, but perhaps it is not desirable for me to enter into a dissertation on them, although I feel rather disposed to do so. Apart altogether from the price which is paid by a State Government to the land owners, the first consideration should be to secure land suitable for rural settlement. It is absolutely useless for a Government to think that a man can take up a small area of land, and make a livelihood. We are going to have closer settlement, and must have good land with a good climate. But there is one direction in which the Commonwealth Government can do much towards attracting people to Australia and keeping those who are here from going to other countries to find employment. I referred a few months ago to the fact that, owing to mechanical contrivances and scientific developments, an enormous amount of farm labour has been dispensed with as compared with fifty-five or thirty years ago—perhaps not so far back. That labour has practically been forced into the factories of the towns; and this does not apply to production only. It relates also to marketing. To-day it is an unknown thing for butter to be put up in a complete form for market on the farm where the cows are milked. Thirty years ago, under the old pan system of separating milk and working the cream up into butter, a considerable amount of labour was employed. To-day the grazing of the cows is, of course, conducted on the farms, and the milking is done there, but practically all the rest of the work is done in factories. Large quantities of the butter exported from Australia is made up in Melbourne or some other convenient centre. With regard to our meat trade also, the whole of the sheep slaughtering is practically done at large establishments at the ports of shipment. Labour is consequently displaced, and if employment is not found for it in some other direction, the result must be that you will have men adorning the street corners of the cities, besieging Parliament House, and asking the Government to start relief works. Unfortunately, in the past, instead of devoting ourselves to meeting our own requirements, and finding profitable work for our own people, we have contracted the habit of borrowing money for relief works. That is unfortunate in two ways. In the first instance, the country incurs indebtedness, for which we have nothing whatever to show. In the State of Victoria, I could point to many works that have been carried out under those conditions, and I believe that the same remark could be made concerning some of the other States. But the second effect is worse still—that the self-reliance and energy of our population is sapped to a considerable degree. What applies to Melbourne applies equally to Sydney. You have men beseeching Parliament to find work for them. No Parliament could, without a violation of humane principles, allow men to starve, who are willing to work. But it is not in consonance with a policy of progress and development that we should spend enormous sums of money on relief works.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Must we not have a surplus working population? Otherwise, how are we to get in the harvest?

Mr. KENNEDY.—In a community such as ours—with a continent of over 3,000,000 square miles—with a few people dotted round a part of the seaboard—is it not absurd to think of having a surplus industrial population, merely for the sake of reaping a few million bushels of wheat at harvest-time, when there is practically little surplus labour required nowadays to take off such a crop?

Mr. CAMERON.—Is there not a disinclination on the part of people generally to go from the towns to the country to work?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have never observed such a disinclination. I can say as one who has been on both sides of the fence—as a labourer and an employer of labour—that I have never known any difficulty to be experienced in obtaining labour. But, unfortunately, I have seen, during the last ten or twelve years, a compulsory drift of men from the rural and pastoral districts, simply because they could not find employment.

Mr. POYNTON.—And could not get land for themselves.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No, they could not. In the district in which I have been living for many years, a considerable number of men like myself, not altogether “degenerates,” not frightened of a day’s work, not bearing any close resemblance to a blackfellow, claiming to have sufficient muscular force to hold their own in the race, and sufficient brains to know when it is raining—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I believe that the honorable member for Hunter has a bigger muscle than the honorable member for Moira has.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Last night I advised the honorable member for Hunter to make an examination of those on the front Opposition bench.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I cannot stand this.

Mr. KENNEDY. — I ask the honorable member not to retire to the billiard-room. I prefer that he should remain here. It is unfortunate, I say, that for many years past, in the agricultural and pastoral districts of Victoria, there has been, for obvious reasons, a drift of population that should have been enabled to settle there, by the subdivision of holdings or some such method.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I call attention to the state of the Committee. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am delighted to see the honorable member for Hunter present, and to observe that he does not appear to be suffering so completely as I thought from the aberration of intellect which he last night suggested prevailed in this Chamber; though I do think there were some premonitory symptoms when he allowed his imagination to run riot in regard to the degeneracy of the people of Australia. I have already said that, in regard to our population, one chief factor is within the control of the States Governments. But there is another factor, of importance, within the purview of Parliament. I allude to the possibility of industrial development, more particularly relating to manufactures. In reference to this, I feel that there is a possibility of again raising the fiscal issue, and a certainty of a few more fine speeches from the Opposition benches, if they are again occupied. However they may be, I venture to say that the Commonwealth Government can do much to counteract the possibility of creating a race of paupers, such as were referred to by the honorable member for Hunter last night.

Mr. KELLY.—That is hardly fitting that the honorable member for Victoria should make a personal explanation.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The personal explanation was, if possible, a greater improvement than the original statement. Progress in the rural districts to-day is calculated with practically one-tenth of the labour which was required twenty-five years ago. If we are to maintain a population in this country, it is absolutely necessary that the place be attractive and self-contained as far as possible. We have heard of pictures painted—

Mr. KELLY.—By whom can one get a glowing picture painted?

Mr. KENNEDY.—By a poet. We have had glowing pictures painted of the conditions held out in Canada and the United States to the people of the densely populated centres of the old world. But those who draw such pictures forget the policy which prevails in both of these countries. Those honorable members have never admitted, although the fact might be questioned, that in them their free trade theories would be held up to ridicule in the United States and in Canada, where there are almost prohibitive Tariffs.

Mr. CAMERON.—And there are no free trade policies.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The people of the United States and Canada, being self-governing, cannot control or suppress monopolies within their own borders; whereas we in Australia know that it is impossible to do so. Monopolies which are beyond our control. As an Australian, I am not afraid of the operation of any monopoly in Australia, while we are a self-governing community. It would be an admission of weakness that when a monopoly became injurious and unduly oppressed the whole or a section of the people, this Parliament—which is practically a committee of the people—would be unable to meet the circumstances.

Mr. CAMERON.—There is a sugar monopoly and also a tobacco monopoly, and nothing has been done.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member would, I think, be very loth to do anything to abolish the tobacco monopoly.

Mr. CAMERON.—Let me have the opportunity, and I shall show honorable mem-

Mr. KENNEDY.—I believe there will be an opportunity in the future. I am, however, being drawn off the thread of my remarks. While it may be admitted that Canada and America are easier of access to the populated centres of the world than Australia, the fact remains that there are advantages presented by those countries which will eventually end. As regards the possibilities of agricultural or pastoral production, no author or authority has ventured to say that the advantages are in favour of Canada, where the people are practically bound for months and months every year when their stock has to be fed and fed. Such conditions are practically unknown in Australia. The latest returns show that the industrial development of Canada is, as a matter of fact, a greater one than its agricultural progress. The exports of manufactures from Canada are greater than the exports of agricultural products. Is that possible under the conditions of the Commonwealth of Australia? Can we in Australia desire any commodity for ourselves, apparently the proper thing to do is to purchase them from abroad.

Mr. KELLY.—Is this the same honorable member who was talking fiscal peace last year?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is fiscal peace possible while there is a remnant of the Free-Trade Party in existence?

Mr. CAMERON.—We on this side are a majority; there is only a coalition on the Government side.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is fortunate for the people of Australia that there is now a Government in power with an absolute majority. The honorable member for Wilmot does not constitute a Government with a majority to-day.

Mr. CAMERON.—When I did, the Government had security of tenure, which the present Government have not; they have to depend on the Labour Party.

Mr. KENNEDY.—To-day, when a question is raised by the Government as to their future, they have not to say, "Yes, Mr. Cameron."

Mr. CAMERON.—No; it is "Yes, Mr. Watson," now.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Government, of which the honorable member for Wilmot constituted the majority, was held in suspension like Mahomet's coffin, for a week, waiting for the sweet voice of the honorable member.

Mr. CAMERON.—I am glad to know my voice is sweet.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There has now been a complete sweeping away of the old shreds and patches; and if the late Government majority will allow me to get in a word, I would point out that the present Government are here by the support of a majority of the representatives of the people of Australia in the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government have a working majority.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The present leader of the Government is not responsible for the existence of the Labour Party, or for the presence in this House of any particular representative. Unfortunately, it has been a cause of distraction in public life in the past that leaders of parties, as parties are constituted, do not recognise the handiwork of their masters, the electors. No one of us has any right to challenge the presence here of any honorable member, no matter whom or what he represents. He is here at the will of our masters. The only appeal which honorable members opposite can make against the existing condition of affairs is an appeal to their masters.

Mr. McCAY.—Give us a chance.

Mr. KENNEDY.—In spite of anything that any of us may do, we shall all have that chance. I speak here without any undue pressure, and I honestly admit, as I have told my constituents, that I am not consumed with any burning desire to go back to the public platform, and look into the cold eye of the inquiring elector. But when the time comes, I will face the situation in good faith.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Wilmot distinctly stated that he did not desire a dissolution, and therefore voted for the Reid-McLean Government.

Mr. CAMERON.—No, I did not.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The present appeal to us to go before the electors is not business. The present Government and their policy are fairly established, so far as I can judge. I may get a surprise; surprises have come to supporters and to leaders of Governments before, even when they have thought they had a trump card up their sleeve. But the sky is practically clear to-day. I was attempting to show that it is incumbent on the present Government to realize how essential it is that we should be a self-sustaining people. That is not raising the fiscal question.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Does any one oppose that idea?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Even in the present debate we have been told that we should subject our labourers, whom we are supposed to protect, and for whom we should secure a fair standard of comfort in living, to competition with coloured men, and with the sweated labour of Europe.

Mr. CAMERON. — Do not our wheat-growers already have to compete with them.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am rather pleased that the honorable member has brought me to that point. In dealing with this question, honorable members opposite sometimes say, "Look at our primary producers. What assistance do they ever get." I am one of those engaged in primary production, and I represent a farming constituency. I say that, much as the producers do get—and I fully recognise that they get a very great deal in the shape of direct assistance from the State—they ought to get far more. Let me give one illustration to show what the primary producers get, and it is not an illustration peculiar to Victoria. I take it from the last Victorian Budget. I may say that States Treasurers are becoming rather harsh in the matter of grants to rural industries. They are developing a brusque, nasty way of saying "No" when an application is made to them for assistance which the applicants think desirable. But the primary producer does receive considerable State assistance. The other day we were referred to the proceedings of a Royal Commission, which show that those who posed as the saviours of the farmers were, for their own greed, robbing the farmers. It is these dishonest men who bring honest traders and merchants to ruin. These are the men who howl most against the assistance given to the producers, and against what they call "Socialism." What is it but a policy that a State should look after the welfare of its people. That is Socialism in its true sense. The honorable member for Hunter the other evening attempted again raise the bogey of Socialism when in his own constituency the question was made, with a great flourish of rhetoric, and all the eloquence of the leader of the party, they could not band together a little league against Socialism. In the last Victorian Budget statement for 1896-7, to show what has been done for the primary producer, and I find there a vote of £50,000 to the Treasury Department to cover a loss on the carriage of grain.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is a proper thing.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The same thing applies to New South Wales.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It should be continued.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is a point of State assistance given in the same direction. It is an instance of a vote from the State Treasury for the benefit of the primary producers.

Mr. CAMERON.—They are responsible for the carriage of goods, and must bear the loss, if any.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I think the honorable member for Hunter should examine the policy of the honorable member. We hear honorable members on the other side telling the story of Australia that the primary producers get no assistance from the State. The Victorian Railways Commissioners have been appointed to manage and control the carriage ways of the State, and to fix the rates for the carriage of produce. Under the management of the State Government, the primary producers are compelled to carry grain at a rate which the Commissioners say it is impossible for them to carry it profitably. As a consequence, a loss is made by the Railway Department on the carriage of grain, and a vote of money is voted from the State Treasury to recoup the amount last year of £50,000.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—To help private individuals to make profit.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes.

Mr. McCAY.—And the honorable member calls that Socialism?

Mr. WATSON.—Of course it is.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Bland would take the loss on the farm from him?

WATSON.—I would not. I am not a taxer, as the honorable member for Maitland is.

JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is a double progressive land-taxer.

KENNEDY.—The Agricultural Department of Victoria spends £10,000 a year in protecting the stock-owners of the State from the ravages of diseases in stock. The Department also spends £15,000 a year in aid of technical education. I think these are examples of State assistance in the right direction, and for honorable members to say that the primary producer deserves no consideration from the State is to come to a wrong conclusion.

JOSEPH COOK.—The object of all the votes is to build up private enter-

KENNEDY.—In Victoria the muni- cipal subsidy is a vote of which the primary producers indirectly get the benefit. It is granted to cities, towns, boroughs, or rural shires, so that practically only the local districts participate in the subsidy, which amounts to something like £100,000.

In addition to that and other indirect votes there are direct votes totalling over £1,000,000, to recoup the railways for losses in the carriage of grain, for technical education to assist the viticultural industry, and so on, all of which are a recognition of the duty of the State to help its primary producers. Therefore it follows, as a matter of course, that it is the duty of the Commonwealth in imposing Customs taxes to do all that is possible to establish industries to give employment to our people, and as the duties would not operate in any way as to prove a hardship to the producers. But there is another direction in which this Government must move if it is to achieve some of the objects for which the Commonwealth was instituted. It has been pointed out that in the Northern Territory and South Australia we have an immense undeveloped country which is to-day practically neglected and undeveloped. At the commencement of Federation we decided—in the Union rightly—that we would have a Commonwealth of Australia; but no man who regards the future with an unprejudiced mind can say that it is impossible that we, although flying the British flag, can continue to hold the country for ever if it remains undeveloped.

The Commonwealth Parliament has conferred upon it the right to grant subsidies, and the States have been deprived of that right. It was bitterly regretted in Victoria that the States should have been deprived of that right, because we were attempting, just prior to Federation, to further the development of our agricultural production, which could be stimulated in many directions unnecessary for me to enumerate. Among other industries we could assist the production of beet sugar, which has done so much for the nations of Europe. Although we grow sugar cane in the north, it would be possible for us to grow beet in the southern States. I hope that I shall not arouse the wrath of the representatives of Queensland in making this suggestion.

Mr. WILKINSON.—We should like to see it done.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The production of beet gives immense possibilities for closer settlement; yet the Commonwealth Government has not given it consideration.

Mr. FISHER.—We have passed an Act providing for the granting of a bounty on the production of beet sugar.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Government has not made any other proposal in that direction.

Mr. FISHER.—The producers of beet could claim a bounty under the Excise Act.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Apart from beet, we have the right soil and climate for the growing of flax, and I have heard the best authorities from the flax producing centres of the old world say that they have seen fibre produced here which is equal to any on the face of the earth. Practically nothing has been done to develop that industry, though flax is another crop which may be grown on small areas, and lends itself to the encouragement of close settlement.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Flax is largely grown in New Zealand.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The New Zealand flax produces a coarse fibre suitable for twine making; but I have been assured by one of the best authorities in Australia that a fibre could be obtained from the flax grown in Australia which, for the making of linen, would be equal to any in the world. Then, nothing has been done to encourage the production of linseed, of which we use an enormous quantity. Tasmania has taken one of our flax-growers, a man whose name will live in history for his enterprise and his experiments, which have proved that in Australia we can depart from the methods of the old world, and instead of pulling and retting the flax, and adopting other processes which are necessary there, can cut it with a reaper and binder, ret it in the open, and find a market for the fibre. But when we were dealing with the Tariff, honorable members opposite said that we should not manufacture a pound of twine in Australia.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We do not talk like that.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is practically what was said. Here is an industry which is wholly a primary one, and yet honorable members, when it was shown beyond a shadow of doubt that users of twine would not have to pay more for it if an effective duty were imposed, refused to give any assistance.

Mr. CAMERON.—Is the honorable member aware that flax is a most exhausting crop?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes; and I am aware of a number of other things in connexion with agricultural production. The honorable member for Mernda, last night, made a very valuable suggestion in regard to the Northern Territory, which is yet undeveloped. I think, with him, that it is incumbent upon the Government to move at a very early date to test the possibilities of that great country. We have not all reached the blackfellow level yet, and if it is proved that the development of that territory by white people is possible, there is sufficient capital and enterprise, sufficient brawn, muscle, and brain in the community to bring it about. I think that that territory could be developed on the lines suggested by the honorable member for Mernda. What are a few thousand pounds compared with the possibilities of the development of that country, and the danger to Australia if it remains long undeveloped? I do not doubt the righteousness of the White Australia policy which this Parliament enunciated. One has only to read American publications of the day to know how difficult is the problem which confronts the American people in the "big children," or black population, of the United States, who although originally imported as slaves, are to-day free, and, under the Constitution, entitled to equality with the whites. But is there equality? Will any honorable member say that there is? I ask those who hesitate between a white and a piebald Australia to consider that problem in all seriousness. We have not to deal with it in Australia, and we should not, even as a last resource, make it possible here. But, at the same time, it is our duty and obligation to develop our territory, and not perform it great danger will be done to Australia in the future.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If we do not use it, it will not belong to us.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is the point I take up. We are within reach of the teeming population of the East that a handful of people could hold our country against their attacks. Should they be moved to possess it, or not?

Mr. POYNTON.—They are not coming into the Northern Territory.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am not concerned of what may happen to-day or to-morrow for what is a generation in the future? But if we are to fulfil our duty to Australia, we must look, not to the immediate future, but to the years to follow. Has the Empire been built in a day, a year, a generation, or even a century? We pride ourselves on our ability to do this, that, and the other, but jealous of the traditions of our race, we then should we leave this great country undeveloped? There is the germ of possibilities in the suggestion of the honorable member for Mernda. The Government should formulate some practical scheme, selecting particular locations, having regard to variations of climate and soil, with a view to forming settlements to test the possibilities of the territory. There is not run any risk of failure for the cost of a few thousand pounds, because the country must be developed if we are to succeed. That is the view I take of the situation, and I trust that, instead of being said continuously that the Government under consideration, some effort should be made to solve the difficulty, and that we shall accomplish results that will be to the credit of this Parliament. This is one other matter to which I should like to direct attention, namely, the impression that appears to have been formed that the Federal Parliament is guilty of extravagance. I do not think that I ever saw any institution that suffered from extravagance or impecuniosity. The honorable member for Hunter adopted some haphazard system of calculation, by which he put up, in one breath, a number of items, of which about £2,500,000 was expended in a year or two.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I did not refer to the proposed expenditure on the Capital.

KENNEDY. — Nothing will be that regard for some time to come.

LIDDELL.—I do not see much promise for it in the Estimates.

KENNEDY.—Strange to say, those who were prepared by the Government to support the honorable member was a sup-

MCCAY.—And which the honorable member also supported.

KENNEDY.—Yes; consequently I have no fault to find with them. Even the honorable and learned member could find no fault with the Estimates. He, however, charged the Treasurer with extravagance and profuseness of expenditure, and declaimed against him for his extravagance. The Treasurer had actually done nothing but something that the honorable member did not wish to have de-MCCAY.—I did not charge the Treasurer with extravagance, but said he had a right to be so for extravagance.

KENNEDY.—One might as well throw a horse in pound for looking over the fence of a good grass paddock. We have no fault with hard facts. There has been no increased expenditure in some directions, but in others it would have been unreasonable to expect that no expansion would take place in the Post and Telegraph and Defence Departments. I have very decided opinions regarding the question of defence, and I am always prepared to listen to the views of experts, and I desire to highly commend the honorable and learned member for Corinella on his contribution to the discussion. I was really delighted to hear him speak as an ex-Minister, and as, in some degree, an expert, and I always listen with respect to what he has to say. I do not propose to discuss the question further than to say that in all seriousness, that we should do more in the direction of defending our ports and harbors, and securing suitable means to meet the requirements of the Australian Squadron.

MCCAY.—That is our first duty.

KENNEDY.—Yes. Now, returning to the charges of extravagance that have been made against the Commonwealth, those who regard our expenditure as unreasonably large, appear to forget that this Government, whatever its policy may be, or whatever expenditure it incurs, is living within its income—when the bill is settled, there is no more trouble; there are no interest charges to meet and no indebtedness is built up. It has been reported in the press that we have considerably increased the expenditure on certain Departments, and I wish to mention one case by way of illustration. Those of us who were in the States Parliaments, do not forget that there seemed to be a burning desire, immediately prior to Federation, to increase salaries in the Departments that were about to be transferred to the Commonwealth. In Victoria, a special Act was passed just towards the close of the session with a view to provide increased salaries for the transferred officers. Some members appeared to think that the Federal Government would have to foot the bill, and it entirely escaped their attention that the Victorian taxpayers would be called upon to bear the burden. The extra expenditure thus provided for is now attributed to the extravagance of the Federal Government. The Tasmanian Parliament took somewhat similar action.

Mr. CAMERON.—One or two Tasmanian members opposed the proposal.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes, but the majority carried their point. We are also charged with extravagance in connexion with additions, and new works and buildings in the transferred Departments. If the honorable members will carry their minds back to the period immediately prior to the establishment of the Federation, they will remember that all the States Governments became severely economical in regard to the transferred Departments.

Mr. POYNTON.—They were more than economical.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Exactly; they became penurious. They thought that the Federal Government would have to fix things up; they forgot that the States would have to bear the cost of any works that were carried out. I find that in the Customs, Post and Telegraph, and Defence Departments the expenditure on additions, new works and buildings, in 1901-2, amounted to £94,000. In 1902-3 the expenditure increased to £157,000. In 1903-4, only £3,400 was spent, whereas in 1904-5, the outlay amounted to £333,000. The estimated expenditure for the current year is £417,000. What I wish to emphasize is that every shilling of this money has been provided out of revenue. In looking through the papers which were circulated in connexion with the Budget of

SCOTT'S PATENT TYPE-SETTING MACHINE

1903-4, I find a table showing the condition of affairs that existed in the year prior to the transfer of the various Departments which are now under Federal control. That table shows that out of the total expenditure of £450,000 by the States, on these very services, £412,000 represented loan money, the effect of the expenditure of which the taxpayer did not immediately feel. But what is the position to-day? After five years of Federal control, these services are costing £417,000, every shilling of which will be paid out of revenue. I contend, therefore, that we have set a good example to the States. Ample evidence is forthcoming that the Commonwealth has been guilty of no extravagance whatever, and in addition we have established the great principle that whatever expenditure we incur must be met out of revenue. There is only one other matter to which I desire to refer. I wish to throw out a gentle hint to the Government in regard to future English mail contracts, because I am satisfied that they will be in office when a fresh contract requires to be made.

Mr. CAMERON.—When will that be?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Two years hence.

Mr. KELLY.—The same people may be upon the other side, but the same team will not be in office.

Mr. KENNEDY. — The company is good; let the honorable member make no mistake about that. It was an outrageous action on the part of the late Government to sanction the existing mail contract under the conditions that they did. Altogether apart from the question of the employment of black labour, they appear to have entirely lost sight of the interests of the producers of Australia. It was within the knowledge of every member of that Government, and of their supporters, that those engaged in the export of perishable produce from the Commonwealth were, from one reason or another, absolutely at the mercy of the shipping ring.

Mr. KELLY. — Does not the honorable member know that the present Government propose to ratify that contract?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am giving the Ministry my view of the matter. Despite the knowledge that the shippers of perishable produce from Australia were being charged exorbitant rates — chiefly owing to the action of the shipping ring, in which the mail companies are prominently interested—the late Government allowed them to remain at the mercy of that ring.

The CHAIRMAN. — Order! Under the Standing Orders, the honorable member cannot discuss that question in detail, inasmuch as it already appears on the business-paper in the form of a notice of motion.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I merely desired to make an incidental reference to it. The late Government have had justice meted out to them. When a subsidy is being paid for any particular service, it is the duty of the Government to see that the interests of those who find the money are not neglected. We know very well that in the past the shipping companies absolutely refused to carry butter to the old country for less than 2d. per lb.; but after a contract had been entered into with one of those companies for the carriage of our mails, the producers of Victoria banded together and succeeded in obtaining a weekly service from another company, which charged them only just one-half that rate of freight. Is not that conclusive proof of some dereliction of duty on the part of the Government? Do we not also know that a member of the late Government was pestered by a representative of one of the companies which was anxious to secure the English mail contract, not only at his office, but even in the railway train?

Mr. KELLY.—That was the time for the honorable member to speak.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I did not have the opportunity to do so, because Parliament was not in session.

Mr. McCAY.—Will the honorable member point out how the producer would have been better off if the present contract had not been accepted?

Mr. KENNEDY.—There would have been £120,000 in the Treasury which could have been operated upon for the purpose of inducing another company to undertake the carriage of our mails. I regret that my remarks have been somewhat disjointed. I am sorry that some of the results which were anticipated from Federation have not been achieved. Much has been done, but still more remains to be accomplished. It was anticipated that Federation would result in economies that were previously impossible, and more particularly in relation to the work now carried out by the Agents General of each of the States. The London of the States involve an annual expenditure of something like £30,000 and the result so far as the Commonwealth is concerned is not very satisfactory. In connexion with these larger issues I should like to see the Government action, in order that some of the benefits which were foreshadowed as likely to be enjoyed by the Federation may soon be enjoyed by the people. I wish it to be understood that I am not disappointed with Federation. I have no fault to find with what has been achieved by it, but am still more anxious for the future, and trust that the Government will devote their best efforts to the realization of the anticipations of patriotic Federalists.

ADDITIONS, NEW WORKS, AND BUILDINGS.

DEPARTMENT OF HOME AFFAIRS.

Committee: (Consideration resumed 24th August, vide page 1473):

Division 1 (Trade and Customs),

4. PAGE (Maranoa).—I think that the Treasurer should explain for what purpose the vote of £1,909, in subdivision 1, is required.

DEAKIN.—Let the honorable member state the object.

KELLY (Wentworth).—I regret that the Prime Minister should have pulled my pugnacious friend with so much force. I think that we ought to have an explanation as to the purposes for which the moneys are required.

GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The item in subdivision No. 1, "Custom House, Sydney, 1905," is a revote from last year to provide for improvements at the Customs House, Sydney, which is in a dangerous position. Stairs and other accommodation have to be provided, and a contract is now in progress.

Proposed vote agreed to.

Division 2 (Defence), £66,516.

KELLY (Wentworth).—There are a number of items in this division to which I do not object, because I desire the Department to get all the money it can. But I would point out that, whilst some of the proposed votes in respect of rifle clubs, ranges, and so forth, are no doubt necessary in their way, they are not so urgent as are votes required to bring the naval base of Sydney into a reasonable state of preparation for the work that may be required of it. I do not propose to go into this question again; but honorable members on all sides who have spoken on the defence question have impressed on the Government the urgency of proceeding at once to get our naval bases in a fit state of preparation. There is no vote in these Estimates to complete the provision necessary to place Sydney in this respect in a proper state. I wish to emphasize the fact that, while the proposed expenditure in respect of rifle clubs is no doubt necessary, it is not so urgent as is that required, for instance, to bring up the ammunition for the guns in Sydney to a safe level, or to so increase the personnel of the forces as at any rate to give one gun's crew to every modern gun we have in the fortress there, or to equip that fortress against torpedo-boat attack, which has been definitely accepted as the most likely form of attack that it will have to meet. I wish to know whether the Treasurer will be prepared during the year, if he finds that savings can be effected in some other direction, to grant the money necessary to place Sydney in a fair state of preparation for all eventualities.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not prepared to make a statement. Everything must depend on what is recommended by the Department.

Mr. KELLY.—I know fairly well what the Department will recommend.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then the honorable member knows more than I do.

Mr. KELLY.—Of course one must not expect the Treasurer to know much about his own Estimates. I would remind him, however, that this is a matter of vital importance to half a million of people, and surely they are entitled to some consideration. It is not only Sydney but almost every port in the Commonwealth which needs to be put in order.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—These estimates were framed by the late Government.

Mr. KELLY.—I am not complaining of any items on these estimates.

Mr. PAGE.—The late Minister of Defence said it would take £800,000 to put our defences in order.

Mr. KELLY.—I quite agree with the honorable member. But I am not expecting the Treasurer to find that sum, but merely asking that essential matters which are required to put the defence system on a fair footing—not on a “safe” footing—should be attended to. In no other country could a Government stay in power when it became known that it was neglecting its responsibility to the extent of leaving the country's most vital points open to immediate attack. All I am asking is that if the Treasurer has the money to spare, or can save this amount in other directions, he will attend to these essential matters.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If they are necessary and are recommended, we shall find the money right enough, whether we make savings or not.

Mr. KELLY.—There are three matters which I think ought to be attended to. In the first place, there is a shortage in the personnel.

The CHAIRMAN.—There is no item on these estimates relating to the personnel.

Mr. KELLY.—These matters are all connected with fortifications.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member will be able to refer to all these matters when the Defence estimates come before the Committee.

Mr. KELLY.—What I wish the Treasurer to provide is a few of the 12-pounder guns which every one recognises are necessary for the protection of Sydney. The cost with ammunition would be £2,000 a piece, and only a few guns would be required to enable the place to make some show of defence against a torpedo attack. If the Council of Defence recommend that such an expenditure is urgently necessary, will the Treasurer find the money during the current year? Surely that is a very small request to make?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not prepared to answer the question off-hand, nor am I prepared to admit that anything the honorable member says is the case.

The CHAIRMAN.—I desire to draw the attention of the honorable member for Wentworth to the fact that these are estimates for new works, and include no provision for either ammunition or guns.

Mr. KELLY.—There is definite provision made for two 7.5 guns and ammunition.

The CHAIRMAN.—That may be the case, but provision for ammunition is specially made in the Estimates-in-Chief.

Mr. KELLY.—Provision for ammunition is also made in these estimates, and I submit, sir, that under the Standing Orders I have a perfect right to object to every item which is not so urgent as the one I wish the Minister to consider.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member has a perfect right to object to every one of these items, but he has no right to anticipate a discussion which will take place on another part of the Estimates. He can call for a division against every one of these items if he pleases, but he is not justified in asking for information at an improper time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think, sir, you are ruling at large. What my honorable friend is trying to do is to show that certain expenditure is much more urgently required than is this proposed expenditure.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who is to be the judge?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Evidently the right honorable gentleman is not the judge, for he tells us candidly across the table that he knows nothing about the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not prepared to make a statement, any way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Whoever is the judge, the right honorable gentleman is not, I regret to say. The custom is to have a person in charge of the Estimates, or in the vicinity of the Chamber, who knows something about defence matters. It is quite customary, when the Estimates are under consideration, for the Minister at the table to furnish explanations, and give information about any item upon which we are asked to vote. When information is asked for by the honorable member for Wentworth he is met with a snap from the Treasurer, to the effect that he will not answer the question, because he does not know anything about the matter, and if he did he would not give an answer. That is not the way for the right honorable gentleman to conduct himself when he is asking the Committee to vote money.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable gentleman said that my honorable friend was improperly asking for information, and that he had no right to get it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said it was unusual to ask for information.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable gentleman taunted my honorable friend with being the judge of these matters. If there is one honorable member who knows anything about the state of the defences of Sydney, it is the honorable member for Wentworth. He has made a special study of this subject, and his speeches here show that he is well informed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member asks questions they will be answered. He has the usual opportunities of asking questions.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My honorable friend has asked the Minister as courteously as he can, but can get no information from him. I submit that he is quite in order in showing that this money ought not to be voted for the purpose proposed, but ought to be applied to a more urgent purpose.

The CHAIRMAN.—I am very sorry, indeed, if I have misunderstood the full scope of these Estimates. The honorable member for Wentworth mentioned that provision is made for guns for Western Australia, and I should like to know on what page it is made.

Mr. KELLY.—On page 255.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And on page 246 provision is made for emplacement for guns.

The CHAIRMAN.—At the end of these Estimates provision is made for special defence material, but that is quite separate from the matters with which we are now dealing. I am only anxious that the business shall be conducted in an orderly fashion, and, of course, that it shall be expedited. I would suggest to the honorable member for Wentworth that if he desires to refer to these matters, he should wait until we are dealing with the vote on the subject, when he would be quite in order in urging that it is more necessary to provide guns at Sydney than at the place proposed.

Mr. KELLY.—The course I adopted was intended to facilitate business as far as possible. I do not wish to object to any item on the Defence Estimates, provided that I can reasonably assure my constituents and the people of Sydney, who are vitally interested, that the Government seriously mean to take the first opportunity of putting the defences of that city in a decent state. The least I can expect from the Treasurer is a civil answer. I am not asking him to commit the Government to anything, but merely for information in order to facilitate business.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member will tell me exactly what he wants, I shall get the information from the Defence Department with pleasure.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister ought to have it here.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not got it here.

Mr. McCAY.—It is in the Department of Home Affairs.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The honorable member for Wentworth is really asking for a declaration of policy on behalf of the Defence Department, and not for information in respect to any item on the Estimates.

Mr. KELLY.—Not exactly.

Mr. GROOM.—As the Minister in charge of the items under the head of Home Affairs, I shall be pleased to supply the honorable member with information in regard to any item he may mention. I understand him to say that he is quite satisfied with the items, and does not challenge them. They are estimates recommended by the Defence Department as being for necessary works. The honorable member will admit that it is somewhat unreasonable at this stage to expect information which can only be obtained after inquiry has been made. It is unreasonable to expect that a certain policy shall be pronounced without an opportunity to look into the points which he has raised in connexion with the defences of Sydney. All that the honorable member can reasonably ask is that the important matters which he has brought forward shall not be overlooked, and that inquiries shall be made on the lines which he has suggested.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—The matter in dispute, as I understand it, is this: The Minister of Home Affairs, not the Treasurer, should be in a position to give any particulars that are wanted as to these votes. The course followed in regard to the Defence estimates was that, after the Commandants of the States made their recommendations, they were gone through item by item in the Defence Department. Then they were sent to the Home Department, which took its turn at them, after which conferences took place between the Home Affairs Department and the Defence Department, resulting in the estimates being settled in their present form. The Commandants asked for all that they thought was desirable; the Defence Department granted some of the requests; the Home Department, which always expects to cut £50,000 or £60,000 off the estimates of the Defence Department, went through them, and left what was thought to be essential in the recommendations originally emanating from the States. In regard to what the honorable member for Wentworth has stated, I should say that Sydney is really the best defended port in the Commonwealth.

Mr. FISHER.—The best guns are needed to protect the fleet, which is always lying there!

Mr. McCAY.—I merely state a fact, and the honorable member for Wide Bay flies at me for doing so. Sydney is, I say, the best defended port in the Commonwealth.

Mr. KELLY.—Against torpedo attack?

Mr. McCAY.—In respect of defence of all kinds.

Mr. KELLY.—There is no defence against torpedo attack.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not agree with that statement, but I do not wish to enter into the considerations involved in it.

Mr. KELLY.—I can prove my statement from authority.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member cannot fairly ask that all other forms of Defence expenditure shall be put aside in order to provide 12-pounder guns for Sydney. With all respect to him, that is an unreasonable request. We all admit that 12-pounder guns are desirable, but to say that it is impossible to defend a port against torpedo attack without them is rather a strong assertion.

Mr. KELLY.—It is laid down in the standard artillery authority.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not wish to discuss the question of torpedo attacks on a vote for rifle ranges and drill halls.

Mr. JOHNSON.—They are closely allied, all the same.

Mr. McCAY.—I think I may congratulate myself that I am not in charge of these estimates! It is essential that we should provide repairs for fortifications, construct rifle ranges where troops exist, and drill halls, or, at any rate, store rooms; because very often the term "drill halls" means nothing more than that. Otherwise the forces that we have in existence could not be carried on. Consequently there must be a certain amount of expenditure for those purposes. No doubt all that the honorable member for Wentworth recommends ought to be done, but it must be remembered that we have only a certain amount of money to spend, and when that is the case it is necessary to leave undone some works which, to some people, may appear to be necessary. The honorable member wishes that money which is saved on one vote shall be spent in another direction. But it is impossible when money is saved on works to spend it on guns, without its being put in the Supplementary Estimates. That would certainly be a very unusual way to deal with Estimates. I sincerely hope that money will not be saved out of the vote for special defence material, because all that is provided for that purpose is absolutely essential. I remember going through these estimates very carefully. I cut down and cut down in various directions, because I wanted money for special defence material chiefly. I left nothing but what I regarded as necessary for the absolute carrying on of the existing forces, and I think that every penny on the Estimates is required for that purpose. Everything is shown in the long schedules. Sums under £300 are lumped together, except in special cases; but other items are given separately. That is why there are general headings embracing large sums.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I do not intend to oppose the item under discussion. What I object to is that it seems to me to be ridiculously small for any practical purpose of making the harbour fortifications of Sydney effective. Is it sufficient, for instance, to put the fortifications of Sydney into proper order—that is, if we are to take seriously the statement made by the Prime Minister some time ago?

Mr. McCAY.—What is wrong with the fortifications of Sydney?

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is just what I want to find out. Honorable members opposite are laughing a little bit too early. Perhaps they will not laugh when I have read what the Prime Minister said on this subject. He made a statement in regard to the defence of Australia which has been reprinted in a return laid upon the table of the House. I will quote his words—

Quite certainly we have no vessels belonging to the Commonwealth which could be used even to attempt to protect our coastal trade.

Then he goes on to say—

The forts, for instance, about our principal cities are, in the first place, most of them of antiquated design, and very dangerous to the garrisons who would hold them under the fire of modern missiles. Then the guns in these forts are, many of them, old in type, and some quite obsolete.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable member say that that applies to Sydney?

JOHNSON.—The Prime Minister of it applying to "our principal McCAY.—As a matter of fact, does honorable member say that it applies money?

JOHNSON.—I take it that Sydney principal city of the Commonwealth. The Prime Minister did not refer to Sydney, or include Sydney, he ought to specifically said so. If our forts in the condition described, it seems to me that the sum on the Estimates, which I suppose is for additions and repairs, is obviously small.

McCAY.—There is no money on the Estimates for reconstructing forts.

FISHER. — This is exposing our weakness to the Japanese.

JOHNSON.—It was not I, but the Minister, who exposed our nakedness. The late Minister of Defence has spoken of his efforts to cut down expenses, and it appears to have been cutting them down at the wrong end.

McCAY. — That is a matter of fact.

JOHNSON.—I regard the Imperial Navy as our first line of defence outside of Australia; but our own first line is our coast, harbor, and river defences. Therefore, if, as the Prime Minister has suggested, our forts are more dangerous to our defenders than to the enemy, it is time we set to work to put them in better shape, even if, for the time being, we have to down the vote for the military land forces, which constitute our last line of defence.

McCAY.—I never heard before that these are not military defences.

JOHNSON.—I have no objection to the sum being voted in order to bring our forts up to date, if they are in the position alleged by the Prime Minister; but the work could not possibly be carried out for the sum set down in the Estimates.

McCAY.—The cost of building emplacements for guns is reckoned by thousands and not by hundreds. The sum voted is not for that purpose.

JOHNSON.—I should like some information on the point from the Treasurer. Is it proposed to leave the forts in their present antiquated condition, to be served by obsolete guns, which, by the way, are very rarely brought into use in practice purposes.

McCAY.—The forts of Sydney have the most modern guns of any in Australia.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The guns may be the most modern in Australia, and yet antiquated.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! We are now dealing only with the construction of fortifications.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Do I understand you, Mr. Chairman, to rule me out of order in speaking on the subject of fortifications?

The CHAIRMAN. — I thought I had made the matter perfectly clear. We are dealing with fortifications only with regard to their construction, and not to their armament or fittings.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I only mentioned armaments and fittings incidentally. We are told that the forts of our principal cities are most of them of antiquated design, and, if it be the case that they would be more dangerous to the defenders than to the enemy—

Mr. McCAY.—Does the document quoted by the honorable member say that?

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is practically the inference from what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. McCAY.—I think not. Read the document again.

Mr. JOHNSON. — The document states—

The forts, for instance, about our principal cities are, in the first place, most of them of antiquated design, and very dangerous to the garrisons who would hold them under the fire of modern missiles.

Mr. McCAY.—But the honorable member said the statement in the document was that the forts would be more dangerous to the defenders than to the enemy.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That must be the case if the forts are in the condition described. Perhaps the Treasurer will give us some information as to what this money is to be expended on. Is the money required to bring the fortifications into an up-to-date state?

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I have listened with very great interest to the recent addition to the authorities on military matters in the person of the honorable member for Wentworth. While I agree to a certain extent with the observations of the honorable member. I do not see that he is now justified in repeating what he has said more than once during the last week or two on the question of defence. I refer particularly to the honorable member's suggestion that money might be saved on the proposed expenditure on rifle clubs and rifle ranges. I trust that the Treasurer will not fall in with the suggestion of the honorable member, which is certainly not in a direction I can approve. In the country districts the inclination is to rather extend the rifle club system, and it certainly ought to be encouraged, seeing that it does not cost a great deal, and that it will provide a strong arm of land defence.

Mr. KELLY.—I am not objecting to these particular items in the Estimates.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member for Wentworth has on two or three occasions indicated what he thinks ought to be the policy in the future, and with that I think he ought to be content, so far as the present debate is concerned. I would rather see the expenditure on rifle clubs increased than decreased; besides I know that to carry out the ideas of the honorable member for Wentworth we should have to pass not merely an item on the Estimates, but a special Loan Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is the honorable member for Gwydir in favour of a loan for that purpose?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I was merely pointing out that to undertake the work desired by the honorable member for Wentworth would probably necessitate the raising of a loan. Personally, I have not been a student of military matters, and do not understand them; and, as I do not represent an electorate where military information can be obtained, or is of special interest, I leave the details to the authorities and experts who have to guide Parliament. I do not pretend to understand a matter which is too intricate for an ordinary layman.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—The honorable member for Gwydir told us that he knows nothing about military matters, and that, I presume, is the reason why he has addressed the Committee on these items. The question raised by the honorable member for Wentworth is not one difficult to understand. It is, on the other hand, of the most rudimentary character, and I am certain that if the honorable member for Gwydir applied himself to it for ten minutes, he would readily understand what the honorable member for Wentworth wishes. I venture to say that the suggestion of the honorable member for Wentworth could be carried out without raising a loan on the credit of the Commonwealth, and thus beginning a career of loan expenditure, such as the honorable member for Gwydir, and those associated with him, have been the first to discourage. I hope we are not yet going to such purposes as those under. Neither is it necessary to borrow repetition on the part of the honorable member for Wentworth, if the facts the honorable member alleges, and I have reason to believe that they are, the petition we have of those facts makes the House the better. They must be met until some remedy is found for which the honorable member has not yet called attention.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The late Minister of Defence denies that the expenditure suggested is necessary.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know the late Minister of Defence denies that the expenditure suggested is necessary.

Mr. McCAY.—I say that what the honorable member suggested is desirable, but there are other things that are desirable, and the Commonwealth will not burst if the money is not spent this year.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Gwydir said that the late Minister of Defence denied that the expenditure suggested is necessary.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for Wentworth says that this money is not spent before any other, and I am emphatically of that opinion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think it ought to be a matter of before or after.

Mr. McCAY.—When you have a lot of work to do, and only £1 to do it, you must put off something.

Mr. KELLY.—One cannot expect to get more than £1 if he does not ask for it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think that the vote for rifle clubs should be taken down, and, on the contrary, I think it should be encouraged in every form.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not say that the expenditure should be cut down.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—On the other hand, that does not do away with the necessity for providing a remedy for the situation which the honorable member for Wentworth alleges exist at the Sydney forts. The honorable members have asked, what is the trouble? And because the honorable member for Lang could not answer right off, he went round the Committee, as the honorable member had been convinced of confusion. But, really, there is no need to be said for the honorable member's mention. It is a fact that there are no shells in the forts in Sydney which have been fired in practice, because the dition with which to fire them. I hope honorable members generally are aware of this.

McCAY.—It is not correct to say that we have not been fired, because there is ammunition to fire them.

JOSEPH COOK.—I understand that there is a certain reserve of ammunition, but it is not replenished, and therefore the guns are not in a position to practice with them.

McCAY.—The reserve of ammunition is being built up, and it is only cordite ammunition that they have not got, so far.

JOSEPH COOK.—That is what I am talking about.

McCAY.—They can practice as well with black powder.

KELLY.—They cannot practice with black-firing guns.

JOSEPH COOK.—I understand that black powder cannot be used with firing guns, and there is no supply of ammunition with which they could practice. Consequently, while we have these up-to-date guns they are of no use, because we are unable to get the peace of mind to learn how to use them properly.

PAGE.—Then let us have our own ammunition factory.

JOSEPH COOK.—So far as the clubs are concerned, I hope the Committee will always look on them with a sympathetic eye. For two sessions in this Parliament, I had a motion on the business-table proposing a very largely increased grant for the encouragement of rifle shooting. I believe that the course I suggest is about the only one which can be adopted to remedy our present comparatively backward state with regard to rifle shooting in Australia. Out of the huge sum of money voted each year, we ought to be able to furnish some first-class prizes for shooting—prizes such as would make a matter of pride and effort on the part of the shooters in all parts of Australia to win them.

JOHNSON.—Yet we refused to help the clubs to go home to the Bisley meet-McCAY.—We can do very much with £2,000 than spend it on sending a rifle team home to Bisley. That is the best thing to do with it.

JOSEPH COOK.—My own impression is that we should vote at least £2,000 a year for prizes for rifle shoot-

Mr. McCAY.—We already give the rifle clubs nearly £6,000.

The CHAIRMAN.—I point out to the honorable member that this discussion can be more appropriately taken on the Defence Estimates.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I apprehend that the whole of these votes for rifle ranges are for the purpose of facilitating rifle shooting.

Mr. GROOM.—For the construction of ranges.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the object of the expenditure is to facilitate rifle shooting.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! I point out to the honorable member that the Committee is not now discussing the Estimates of the Defence Department; but really Estimates of the Home Affairs Department. When the Defence Estimates are reached it will be competent for honorable members to discuss rifle clubs, prizes for rifle shooting, and the supply of ammunition and guns.

Mr. JOHNSON.—And fortifications?

The CHAIRMAN.—No; we shall have dealt with the Estimates for new works by that time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no desire to pursue the matter in detail; but I am pointing out broadly another method, in addition to that provided by these Estimates for the encouragement of rifle shooting. In addition to providing this expenditure for rifle ranges, sheds, grants to rifle clubs, and so on, we should, for the specific purpose of encouraging rifle shooting in Australia, furnish money for some big national prizes.

The CHAIRMAN.—Can the honorable member connect such a proposal with the Estimates for new works and buildings?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no wish to persist in this matter, as there will be other opportunities to deal with it. I should like to discuss the question very seriously, because I believe that, unless we adopt some such means as I have suggested, our rifle practice will continue in its present backward state, and there will not be afforded the facilities for such practice which ought to be given in a country like this.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—I desire briefly to refer to what would appear to be apathy on the part of officers intrusted with the carrying out of the express will of this Parliament. Honorable members will have noticed the large amounts which it is proposed shall be revoted this year. The necessity for these revotes indicates either incompetency on the part of the officers who are intrusted with certain duties, or what is worse, an interference with the will of this Parliament by other bodies who have no right to interfere. We passed last year a large number of votes which appear again on the Estimates for this year. There should be some explanation given by Ministers as to why this kind of thing occurs year after year. The bulk of the money proposed to be voted on these Estimates for expenditure in South Australia was passed last year, and some of it was passed the year before. We have States members going round the different States and complaining that the work of erecting a certain post-office, or of completing an addition to a certain building, has not been taken in hand owing to the action of the Federal Parliament. I desire to know what is the real reason for these revotes. Have we not men under the control of the Federal Departments who are competent to carry out the work for which these votes are passed? Does it really take our officers two years to draw up specifications for a simple addition to a post-office? I think the practice followed is for this Parliament to pass Estimates, and the officers of the Departments then draw up specifications when the old method of how not to do it is followed, with the result that we have each year to revote a large sum of money. We are condemned by our constituents when works for which this Parliament has voted the money are not carried out. My own opinion is that the States Treasurers "pull the leg" of somebody and prevent these works being gone on with. If that is so, we ought to know it. We ought to know who is behind the scenes preventing these works being carried out. I do not believe that the officers in the Commonwealth service are not competent to prepare the necessary specifications and get these public works in hand during the twelve months, and so obviate the necessity of revoting these amounts from time to time. I have noticed that a vote for plant for the printing of stamps which appeared on the Estimates last year has been allowed to lapse altogether, and I should like to know why.

The CHAIRMAN.—I point out to the honorable member that we have not yet reached that item, which will be found in the Estimates for the Postmaster-General's Department, South Australia.

Mr. POYNTON.—I merely want to direct attention to the matter, that the Minister in charge of the Department has not stated that when we come to the item, which is common with other representatives of South Australia, desire to know why that vote has been dropped or why it has been allowed to lapse. I believe I am voicing the general opinion of the members of the Committee when I say that some reasons should be given for the continual revoting of amounts which appear on the Estimates. If the State is responsible we should know, and if the fault lies in the inability of our officers to carry out the specifications, then the time available for the expenditure of the money, the sooner we replace men who will be competent to do the work, the better. I do not believe that our officers are incompetent. In my opinion, the delay is due to efforts on the part of the States to credit the Federation, so that they can complain when necessary work is not done. "Well, that is the fault of the Federal Parliament." I trust that some explanation will be given as to why each year we are asked to revote money for works which have been proved in previous years.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I want to know like the Minister in charge of the Department to say whether, in every estimate, the estimated cost is given, and whether the amount set down to be voted is the total cost of the work when completed. I want information is given as to the total cost of the work when completed.

Mr. GROOM.—There is, in every estimate, a foot-note giving that information.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I wish to know from the Minister of Home Affairs whether, among the votes for new works in South Wales, £600 is set down for rifle clubs for rifle ranges. Underneath, there are other votes for rifle ranges at Richmond, Bathurst, and other places. Then, why is £1,000 put towards the cost of a drill-hall at the estimated total cost of £2,000? Is the building going to be reduced in penny numbers?

Mr. GROOM.—£1,000 is all that is required this year.

Mr. McCAY.—The plans have been drawn that the most urgently needed portion of the building can be put up this year, and the rest of it added next year.

Mr. PAGE.—I should also like to know regarding the proposed vote for land near Colah Railway Station, which £500 was appropriated ly £4 spent. This is an item which be pointed out to the Premier of South Wales, when next he accuses Federal Government of extravagance.

GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—With regard to complaints of the honorable member, the delay that he speaks of has been chiefly due to the fact that these estimates have hitherto not been passed until the end of the session, and they have been taken earlier this year in order to prevent a recurrence of it. The cause is mainly not want of competency on the part of our officers. This year the getting of preliminary designs has been expedited in anticipation of the passing of the Estimates at an early stage of the session.

POYNTON. — But in the cases of which I complained, the money was voted twelve months ago.

GROOM.—Yes, but delay was unavoidable in connexion with the calling of the session, and the starting of the works.

McCAY.—All the plans necessary have now got ready at once.

GROOM.—That is so. This year, however, everything will be done to press matters as much as possible. As the honorable member says, delays are due to the Commonwealth and to the States, because they produce uncertainty as to the relation between the finances of the States and those of the Federation, and our Estimates appear unduly delayed by the piling up of revotes. The honorable member for Lang asked for information in regard to items 1 and 4. In regard to item 1, the total vote is £39, of which £674 is a revote for which approval was given at last session. The remaining £565 is to carry out a number of works in regard to officers' quarters, Adamstown Rifle Range, West Maitland quarters, and others of which I have a list. With regard to item No. 4, it is proposed to revote £360, and the balance of the amount is made up of a series of items to provide for the erection of a shelter and other conveniences at Adamstown rifle range, and for removing and erecting wire fencing, and so on. Main work is also to be carried out at the Victoria Barracks, the Garrison Hospital, the Drill Hall, and in connexion with a number of rifle ranges in various parts of the country. In connexion with item 5, the honorable member for Maranoa wished to know why it was proposed to make a general grant to rifle clubs for rifle ranges, whilst certain other ranges were specially provided for. The item referred to provides for ranges for rifle clubs under the regulations, on requests made during the year.

Mr. McCAY. — When rifle clubs are formed some of them receive £20, and others £40, according to their membership, to assist them to secure ranges. As we cannot tell beforehand where the clubs are to be formed, they cannot be specified.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England). — I think that the Minister has shown that there was some justification for the criticism which has been passed upon these items, because he has explained certain matters upon which it was necessary that we should have information. We cannot possibly know anything about these matters, and, therefore, unless someone enlightens us, we are obliged to vote in the dark. The thanks of the Committee are due to the honorable member for Corinella for the very clear way in which he has placed matters before us. The amount provided for fortifications appears to me to be extremely small. I am not a military man, and I do not understand these questions, but I should think that no fortifications worth speaking of could be provided for by means of the small sum set down here. For "fortifications, barracks, rifle ranges, and drill halls," the total sum appropriated is only £4,479, including revotes. If it is intended to erect new fortifications, the provision seems to me to be very small.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not intended to build a new fortress out of that sum. If you wanted to build a wall 10 feet long as a portion of a fortress, the work would come under item 4.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It has been stated that the principal cities of the Commonwealth are not adequately defended, and I think we should do well to concentrate our efforts upon making proper provision for the safety of our principal harbors and rivers. The defence of the most important points along our coastline is next in importance to the provision for naval defence. Our object should be to deal with our enemies before they can effect a landing on our shores. It is of no use to fritter away money in small amounts, and we might with advantage save up our funds for a year or two, and then devote the whole sum available to some substantial and useful work. I was asking the honorable and learned member for Corinella which part of our coast required the strongest defences, and he appeared to indicate Sydney as the port to which our attention should be principally directed; but my idea is that we might with advantage strengthen our defences at our outposts, with a view to preventing any descent being made upon the Commonwealth. Some criticisms have been offered with regard to the revotes, and the necessity for passing these Estimates as speedily as possible. It seems to me that all preparations should have been made long ago for proceeding with works for which revotes are provided. I trust that the Minister of Defence will formulate a scheme for the systematic expenditure of money on the protection of our various harbors, instead of paying too much attention to matters of detail.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I regard the explanation given by the Minister with regard to certain revotes as unsatisfactory. It is idle for the Minister to tell the Committee that the Department cannot get the necessary plans and specifications prepared and the works commenced in less than nine months. If his statement be correct, that condition of affairs is anything but satisfactory. We know perfectly well that the Treasurers of the various States have been endeavouring to make their expenditure and their revenue balance. To accomplish this, they have been doing their best to persuade the Commonwealth not to expend certain sums of money. Only last evening it was pointed out that the Parliament of Queensland had actually gone so far as to revoke out of loan funds the money expended by the Commonwealth on certain works in that State, and to pay it into revenue.

Mr. PAGE.—That is illegal.

Mr. McDONALD.—Nevertheless it has been done at the instance of the heaven-born Treasurer who is in office there at the present time.

Mr. PAGE.—It is a wonder to me that the Auditor-General would allow it to be done.

Mr. McDONALD.—The point is that it has been done. The States Treasurers are making every possible effort to prevent money which is voted by this Parliament from being expended. I think that the Minister requires to give us some better explanation of the reason these amounts were not spent than that they were only voted towards the close of last session. I trust that he will cause an inquiry to be made with a view to ascertaining what are the exact facts. If the Works Departments in the different States cannot proceed with these undertakings within the year for which the amounts are voted, it is time that we endeavoured to obtain the services of some person who is competent to do so. Last year, out of £170,000 which was voted for various public works, only £68,000 was spent.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—Following up the remarks of the honorable member for Grey, I would point out that under subdivision 3 revotes appear in connexion with the re-erection of a drill-shed and defence buildings at Townsville, of a rifle range at Brisbane, and of cable and cable storage tanks for electrical communication between Goode Island and the mainland. In connexion with all these items, the votes for which I presume are urgent, we find that money has been lying at the disposal of the Department for a whole year, and has not been expended.

Mr. GROOM.—Some of the contracts are in hand, and the work is being carried out.

Mr. KELLY.—Why does not that fact appear on the Estimates? I protest against the dilatory methods which have been adopted by Departments.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member is censuring the late Government, which he supported.

Mr. KELLY.—I recognise that no Government can keep such a tight control over expenditure as to be seized of every penny which is spent or not spent. Nevertheless, I do hope that an earnest effort will be made to expend the amounts voted by us during the financial year for which they are voted.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I wish to know whether the £1,000 which it is proposed to expend on a rifle range at Brisbane is intended to be spent in the acquisition of a new range, or merely in putting the old one in order. At the present time, there is really no rifle range at Brisbane, nor has there been one for a number of years. Both the members of the rifle clubs and the military are using a portion of the cemetery reserve on sufferance. I should like to know to what this expenditure of £1,000 is to be devoted?

Mr. GROOM.—It is to be spent in the acquisition of a new rifle range.

Mr. McCAY.—At Sandgate.

Mr. PAGE.—If it is voted for the purpose of obtaining a specific site—

Mr. GROOM.—No site is mentioned in the Estimates.

Mr. PAGE.—I should like to know what is behind this proposal.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Any item of expenditure can be transferred to any other Department if the Executive so desire.

Mr. McCAY.—That cannot be done under our Audit Act.

Mr. PAGE.—It is very singular if it can be done.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No vote can be transferred except to another item in the same subdivision.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is constantly done in the States.

Mr. GROOM.—If this money is voted for the acquisition of a rifle range it must be applied to that purpose.

Mr. PAGE.—I wish the Government would get this matter decided as soon as possible. The matter has been hanging fire ever since the opening of the first Parliament. On each year's Estimates there has been a proposed vote for a rifle range for Brisbane, and yet nothing has been done. The range at present being used by the riflemen of that city may be closed to them at any moment, and I therefore trust that the Government will lose no time in securing a suitable site.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—The honorable member for Wentworth was rather unfortunate in referring to this subdivision as an example of dilatoriness on the part of the Department of Home Affairs, or of any other Department, because, with the exception of the amount for rifle ranges, every one of these revotes are in respect of contracts let before the 30th June.

Mr. GROOM.—The works are in progress.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so. I know a little about the question of a rifle range for Brisbane. Shortly after I took office, towards the end of last year, a site was fixed upon, but considerable opposition was raised to it in certain quarters, and I felt bound, in view of the representations made, to have a further investigation. I was also about to visit Queensland, and as the opposition continued, I thought it right to make personal inquiries on the spot. I caused special examinations to be made by officers who were sent to Brisbane for that purpose, and I finally came to the conclusion that Sandgate was the only suitable place.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Did the honorable member inspect the Woolston site.

Mr. McCAY.—I cannot remember the names of all the sites. The direction of the proposed range at Sandgate was varied. It was proposed first of all that it should run from east to west. It was then suggested that it should run from north to south, and finally it was proposed that it should run from north-west to south-west. At last I wrote that the objections to the site might well be withdrawn, but unfortunately my connexion with the Department terminated rather suddenly. I understand that since then the Minister has definitely decided upon Sandgate as a site for the rifle range, and has taken steps to acquire the land.

Mr. GROOM.—I shall explain that point.

Mr. McCAY.—At all events, the matter ought to have been settled by this time, and steps taken to acquire the necessary land, because the objections made are no longer reasonable, in view of the way in which they have been met by the Department.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—In regard to the question of the rifle range for Brisbane, I may say that it has come before the Minister of Defence, and that as objections have been made to the selection of the Sandgate site, he has promised to look into the whole matter. It would not be right for me to let it go forth that he has arrived at an absolute decision one way or the other.

Mr. PAGE.—This is an extraordinary state of affairs.

Mr. GROOM.—The Minister has to take the responsibility of his position, and is entitled to look into the whole question.

Mr. McCAY.—The papers are now complete.

Mr. GROOM.—That is so, but the honorable and learned member for Corinella has already said that the matter caused him considerable anxiety when he was in office.

Mr. McCAY.—The papers were not complete when I took office, but they are now, and the Minister can obtain a grasp of the whole position in half a day.

Mr. GROOM.—The Minister of Defence is seeking to obtain a thorough grasp of the whole position, but he has not the advantage of the personal knowledge of the several sites which his predecessor enjoyed. The proposed vote is intended, and I presume that it will undoubtedly be applied, to secure a site for a rifle range at Brisbane. It is a matter of pressing urgency, for the absence of a proper range is having a discouraging effect not only on members of rifle clubs, but on the military forces generally of Brisbane.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—I wish to refer briefly to this question, because it has formed the subject of a good deal of correspondence between myself and the Department. I know that a range for the metropolis is a crying need, but notwithstanding that it has been a considerable time on the tapis, it seems that some time must yet elapse before it will be ready for use. So far as I understand it, the object of the proposed vote of £1,000 is to provide only for the purchase of land. A footnote sets forth that the total estimated cost, exclusive of land, is £5,000. I presume, therefore, that before the range is ready for use it will be necessary to have a further sum placed on next year's Estimates and passed by us. As the honorable member for Maranoa has pointed out, the range at present in use may be closed at any moment. If that happened, the result would be the disorganization of rifle clubs and associations, on the maintenance of which considerable sums of public and private moneys have been expended. I know something of the location of the suggested range, and am pleased to hear that, in the opinion of the Minister of Defence, there is now little reason for the objections that have been raised, having regard to the rearrangement of the line of fire. Only last week, however, very strenuous opposition was offered to the establishment of the range at the site almost decided on, and another site which was in contemplation some time ago has been suggested.

Mr. McCAY.—If it is the Darra site, it will cost a good deal more, for the country there is fairly flat, and the site is far less acceptable than is that of Sandgate.

Mr. WILKINSON.—From either side, there are local trains run to within two or three miles of the site, besides through trains—that is, to Oxley on the one hand, and to Goodna on the other, and the Commissioner of Railways has expressed his willingness to extend the running of the trains. I do not wish it to be understood that I advocate one site more than another. As I understand that the Minister is considering the objections which are raised, I shall not pursue the subject at this stage. I wish to refer to the general facilities which are given to riflemen for practice. I do not agree altogether with the honorable member for Parramatta, when he says that large sums should be given for prize money. I believe in stimulating rifle shooting by offering liberal inducements, and if there is any money to spare it ought to be used in improving rifle shooting, rather than in prizes. If ranges are not provided, the men cannot shoot for prizes. They could also be encouraged by being provided with more liberal travelling facilities.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I wish to clear the air a little. The difficulty over the selection of a site for a rifle range near Brisbane was very nearly brought to a successful issue by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, when fortunately, the late Prime Minister committed political suicide.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—For the past three years, I have been persistently applying to the Defence Department to do justice to the residents of Bowen. Owing to the position of the rifle range, the line of fire is across a road which is used by a few persons who have no other means of access to their homes unless they pass at the rear of the range. There have been one or two examinations of the range made—one by the late Commandant of the State—and I am credibly informed that they were of a most trivial and absurd character. The gentleman who is particularly interested in this matter has gone to considerable trouble and expense to point out to the Department a site for a range which would be equally as suitable, equally as convenient to the riflemen, and perfectly safe to the residents. The commencement of the line of fire would be at practically the same base, but the men would fire in a different direction. A few mounds would have to be made for the men to shoot from. I have asked the Department continually to take up the matter, because it is a great shame that the lives of a man and his family, as well as his stock, should be endangered. It would involve a very small expenditure to the Department, and when done it might save a considerable outlay in the future. It is not so very long since the Department was called upon to pay a considerable sum as compensation to a man whose property was damaged by the firing from the rifle range at Randwick. The residents of Avr have spent a considerable sum out of their own pockets in establishing a rifle range.

They have asked that it should be extended a little, so that there shall be no danger from the line of fire to either stock or persons.

Mr. McCAY.—The difficulty in the way is that the Queensland Government want £8 an acre for land which is worth hardly as many shillings.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I am informed that the State Government has offered to lease the land for practically as long as it may be required at a merely nominal rental, and that the Defence Department has seized upon that fact as an excuse for not acceding to the request of the residents. I am sure that the rent would be willingly paid by the riflemen themselves. It is very disheartening to these men, after they have spent their money and time in endeavouring to become marksmen, to find obstacles thrown in their way by the Department, which cannot see any reason for the expenditure of public money, except in and around Sydney and Melbourne. Outside localities receive no encouragement in this regard. I hope, however, that the request of the residents will receive early consideration.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall make a note of the case.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—It is an extraordinary thing that if the Department intends to spend £5,000 in providing a rifle range at Brisbane for the metropolitan troops, only £1,000 is placed on these Estimates, unless the further expenditure is to be put off for a year. The complaint is that ever since the Federation was established, this matter has engaged the consideration of the Department. It appears to me to be simply playing with the question, to ask the Committee to vote only £1,000 this year. I consider that if the rifle range is to cost £5,000, a larger sum should be voted. The request made by the honorable member for Herbert is a very small one, and I think it should be granted.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—There are two items under the heading of Western Australia that require explanation. There is a re-vote of £800 for the drill-hall at Boulder, and a fresh vote of £75 for a site for the drill-hall. Was the money for the hall voted before the site was acquired?

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—A building was being rented at £58 per annum, and the Defence Department strongly recommended that a new one should be erected.

Mr. KELLY.—Is this the whole cost of the site?

Mr. GROOM.—The £75 is for the land, and the remainder of the money is for the drill-hall.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—I should like to have some information with regard to the Western Australian expenditure. Under the new arrangement, whereby payments are charged on a per capita basis, the fullest explanations ought to be made. For instance, I should like to know the estimated cost of the land for the fort at North Fremantle. If the land was acquired from the State it is a fair thing that, as Defence works are being carried out, it should be granted to the Commonwealth.

Mr. GROOM.—It is not State land; it is private property.

Mr. POYNTON. — I understand that Government property was acquired in one instance, and that the State charged four times as much as it was worth.

Mr. McCAY.—That was in Queensland; the Arthur Head fort is at North Fremantle.

Mr. POYNTON.—I know it is useless to protest against the per capita basis, but items of expenditure that are to be so charged need to be watched very carefully. Otherwise, there will be great extravagance. The moment a State gets to know that the cost of the construction of works is borne by the Commonwealth it will go in for having the best of buildings and spending more money than is necessary.

Mr. KELLY.—The per capita basis applies only to defence matters, I think.

Mr. POYNTON.—No; it applies to all things. I know of some magnificent buildings that are being erected for the Post and Telegraph Department. The Treasurer ought to explain this item.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—One site at North Fremantle has to be purchased; but the most expensive one, at Arthur Head, belonged to the State Government. There were a good many buildings upon it. They have been removed. The estimated value of the land was excessive, in my opinion—£18,000. I had some correspondence on the subject with the then Premier of Western Australia—Mr. James—and eventually he agreed to treat it as transferred property.

Mr. POYNTON.—We shall have to pay for it later on.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If we adhere to the balancing arrangement we shall have very little to pay. No payment in money will be made now. When the question of the transferred properties is settled, this site will be included.

Mr. POYNTON.—What is the area?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think it is about an acre.

Mr. LONSDALE.—What is the price agreed upon?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No price has been agreed upon. It will have to be determined by valuation.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—Last year when we were discussing the construction of new works, I brought before the then Minister of Home Affairs the matter of contract as against day labour. I urged him to adopt the day labour system in connexion with the Fremantle forts. In some States, if not in all, there have been cases where works of this kind, which ought to be faithfully built, have been scamped by contractors for the sake of making large profits. No matter how careful the inspection may be, an unscrupulous contractor will contrive to get in cheap work and prevent proper value from being obtained for the money. The Minister expressed his readiness to adopt the day labour system if the work could be as well done as under contract, and at my request he opened up negotiations with the Western Australian Department of Public Works, with the result that the latter consented to carry out the work with their own officers and men. At that point, however, the Minister of Home Affairs sought to impose impossible conditions, asking the Western Australian Government to give a written guarantee that they would make good any extra cost over the estimate. This, in my opinion, was a most unreasonable request.

Mr. McCAY.—I think it was very desirable.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I agree that every precaution should be taken, but the personal guarantee of the State Minister that every care would be observed should have been enough.

Mr. McCAY.—Did not the Western Australian Department decline to bind themselves in any way to their own estimates?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am not aware that the Western Australian Department made any estimate. I understand that simply took the plans and estimates of the Commonwealth Department. At first the Minister of Home Affairs desired the Western Australian Public Works Department to tender along with private contractors; but that, of course, the Western Australian Minister properly declined to do. When, at last, the Minister of Home Affairs decided to call for tenders, he sent to the Western Australian Department plans and estimates which were so carelessly drawn that the Western Australian Minister declined to take any responsibility until certain alterations were made. As one who knows something of work of this kind, I judge from what I saw of the estimates that the contractor could have cheated the Commonwealth out of a large sum of money. Surely the Department of Home Affairs ought to have officers capable of drawing up proper workable plans and estimates. There should be no invitations to contractors to enrich themselves at the expense of the taxpayer. I ask the present Minister of Home Affairs to consider this question of day labour once again. It is always understood that fortifications should be constructed with as much privacy as possible, and surely that is a very reasonable view. Calling for public tenders and constructing the forts publicly ought not to be tolerated for one moment, and the best means of insuring privacy is to have the works done by the States own officers.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I desire to support what has been said by the honorable member for Fremantle. There is another matter into which careful inquiry should be made. I understand that in order to secure a sufficient elevation from which to fire the guns, it was found necessary to either go behind the town and fire over the buildings, or to fix the site almost in the heart of the town. Military authorities say that if the fortifications are completed at the present site, the big guns, when fired, will do great injury to the buildings of Fremantle—that, at least, they will certainly smash every window in the place. This matter ought to be thoroughly inquired into before another penny is spent. It was stated to-night by the honorable member for Parramatta that there are magnificent guns in Sydney which cannot be used for want of suitable ammunition, and it would appear now that we are going to spend £87,000 on a fortification, the guns of which will, every time they are fired, cause damage to the extent of some hundreds of pounds. Has there to be no gun practice until the enemy comes, when, of course, the risk would have to be taken? I think some better arrangement could have been made, and I feel inclined to divide the Committee on the question whether any further money should be spent under the circumstances. I hope the Minister will promise that there shall be a thorough investigation.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—There is an item on which I should like to get some information. I see that last year there was a vote of £2,200 for non-recurring expenditure, and only £511 of that amount was spent. I should like to know why there is no money put down for this purpose this year, when so little of last year's vote was spent? We had last year a vote of £960 for expenditure at Hobart, and only £50 of that amount was spent. There has been no great outcry about Hobart having no guns at all, whilst a good deal has been said about the defective defences of Sydney. I may say that I consider that Hobart possesses the best harbor in Australia, and that city certainly requires to be defended as much as any other in the Commonwealth. I have been informed that the old battery there was removed before the new appliances were received in Tasmania. I should like to have some information as to why it was necessary to pass a large sum of money on last year's Estimates, and so little on this year's Estimates, although so little of last year's vote was expended in Tasmania.

Proposed vote agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE: TASMANIA.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—I should like, in deference to the honorable member for Bass, who put a question regarding a certain item in the Estimates, to say that the explanation he required will be given at the earliest possible stage to-morrow. There was no intention to overlook what he stated in the neglect to reply to his remarks to-night.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 8 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Report (No. 2), presented by Mr. POYNTON, read by the Clerk, and agreed to.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Mr. MAUGER.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister, without notice, whether, in view of the misrepresentation and ignorance displayed by Australian detractors and others, the Government will take special steps to make the nature and objects of the Immigration Restriction Act known to the British Government and its people? Will he make it known in the same quarter, in some way—by special despatch or otherwise—that it was owing to representations made by the Imperial Government that the Commonwealth Parliament was induced to agree to the insertion of the language test in the Immigration Restriction Act?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The best refutation of these calumnies will be afforded by the announcement of a definite policy for the encouragement of immigration which I hope the House will be able to consider before the session closes. In the meantime, steps will be taken to correct current misrepresentations. The language test was adopted in spite of the strong feeling against it of many, if not most, honorable members, and in order to meet representations made by the Secretary of State to the Colonies in 1897.

FEDERAL CAPITAL SITE.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is stated in this morning's newspapers that an agreement has been practically reached between the Prime Minister and the Premier of New South Wales concerning the method to be adopted for the settlement of the Capital Site dispute. Is the honorable and learned gentleman prepared to make a statement to the House on the subject?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Premier of New South Wales, having asked this Government to perform some overt act, as by driving a peg, to assert the claims of the Commonwealth to take and deal with the territory we require under the Seat of Government Act, we have replied expressing our concurrence, and informing him that the Attorney-General is now considering the best method in which some formal action may be taken to allow of the submission of the matter to the High Court.

AUSTRALIAN DEFENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Has the attention of the Prime Minister been called to a speech made by Colonel Price at the annual dinner of the Victorian Mounted Rifles? That officer is reported in last night's Herald to have said that the defences of Australia are in a deplorable state, and that, owing to our immense sea-board, if we were attacked, we should certainly not be found in a fit condition to repel the attack—

I say, as an experienced man, that we could not fight for eighteen days. I am not a pessimist, but I say that it is very necessary that Australia should look out for herself.

That statement is published under sensational headlines, and it is, I think, desirable to take notice of it. Does the Prime Minister think it worth while to do so?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have read Colonel Price's statement, for which he is personally responsible, but make it a rule not to trust scare headings.

COMMONWEALTH STATISTICAL BUREAU.

Mr. GROOM.—I desire to inform the House that a copy of the correspondence between the Commonwealth and the Governments of the States with respect to the establishment of a Commonwealth Statistical Bureau will be laid on the table of the Library this morning.

SUPPLY.

ADDITIONS, NEW WORKS, AND BUILDINGS.

DEPARTMENT OF HOME AFFAIRS.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 7th September, vide page 2043):

Division 3 (Post and Telegraph), £79,581.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—Before the Committee proceeds further with the consideration of these Estimates, I wish to give honorable members information which was withheld last night, not discourteously, but because they were then eager to catch their last trains. The honorable member for Bass asked the meaning of the item, "Non-recurring, £2,220," in connexion with the votes for Tasmania. That item is not a portion of the Estimates for 1905-6, but the difference the aggregate of the items in last year's Estimates, where expenditure was incurred, and vote; that is, it accounts for items which appeared in last year's Estimates but not appear in this year's. The amount made up, first, of £1,120 for the rifle range at Hobart, the late Mr. Defence, when the Estimates for the financial year were under consideration, decided that a revote should not be made, secondly, of £600 for a magazine at Ceston, it being considered that the accommodation would be afforded by the re-allotment of existing buildings, and thirdly, of £500 for a drill hall at Adelaide and Ulverstone, these buildings completed during the last financial year, and forwarded to the Minister of Defence for representations made by the honorable member for Herbert, and will cause to be made into and give consideration to the statement of the honorable member for the mantle in respect to contract labour.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I have given direct attention to the proposed expenditure of £800 on the General Post Office building. When the former vote was made, some question was raised as to whether the work should be carried out by contract or by day labour. The work was carried out under the day labour system, and I am glad to hear that by a well-equipped staff we can understand that, as the result of the estimations made last year, it was decided that it should be continued upon the day labour system. I should like the Minister to bring this matter into this matter, with a view to the fact that this shall be done.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—It is true that a part of the work has been carried out by day labour, but it was found necessary to perform some of it by contract. I am glad to look into the matter.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—In connexion with the item referred to, I should like to know how it is that whereas the cost was £2,300 the much larger sum of £3,092 was expended.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—No mistake was made in the Estimates. The amount covered the cost involved in the construction of the roof; the extra sum required to provide the flooring and other fittings.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—The explanation given by the Minister indicates the ridiculous position which is occupied by the Commonwealth in regard to public works. A building is erected, and after the roof has been put on, it is found to be necessary to put down a floor for which no previous provision had been made. And this happened in the great city of Sydney, where there is an architect at the corner of every street. The sooner we employ a staff of our own, which will arrange to put in the floor before the roof is constructed, the better. Was it supposed, for one moment, by those who drew the original plans, that the occupants of the building could walk on the laths and plaster forming the ceiling of the rooms immediately underneath. I can scarcely realise that the Minister was speaking seriously.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Down—Minister of Home Affairs).—My statement was substantially correct, and the incident is not capable of the Gilbertian construction suggested by the honorable member for Maranoa. As a matter of fact, this work was started by the State Government, and it was thought that some of the money required would come out of loans. Provision was made in the design for the construction of a roof, and for certain alterations, it was necessary to put in a floor and certain partitions, in order to complete the work. It, therefore, became necessary to ask the House to vote the additional amount.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I have, for some time past, been endeavouring to obtain information from the Postmaster-General with regard to postal officials, particularly letter-carriers, who are being brought into Melbourne, in order to have their work allotted to them at the central office, instead of at the various suburban offices. I am given to understand that this centralizing policy is responsible for the proposed expenditure of £10,000 this year upon the extension of the General Post Office in Melbourne. The total estimated cost of the work is £30,000. I understand that this centralizing system is adopted only in Melbourne, and that in all the other large cities the letter-carriers work from the suburban offices. I think that the Minister should look very carefully into this matter. I admit that under our present system, by which the expenditure upon new works is debited upon a per capita basis to all the States, any honorable member who protests against expenditure in his own State may be looked upon as doing it an injury, but I think that we should consider the Estimates very carefully, and check, as far as we can, useless expenditure. Honorable members should not consent to expenditure merely because it may be to the advantage of their own State.

Mr. PAGE.—That is the true Federal spirit.

Mr. TUDOR.—I think that is the spirit which should animate all of us. The Queensland Government some time ago requested the Commonwealth Government not to carry out certain works in that State, because they did not wish their State to be burdened with the cost of them, as the present system of paying for works and buildings did not operate then, and I think that we should all endeavour to keep down expenditure as far as possible, not with a view to undue economy, but in order to prevent extravagance. There are some other items which I regard as too large. I note that provision is made upon the Estimates for the expenditure of £2,500 upon a post-office at Warracknabeal — although the population of the township does not exceed 2,000 or 3,000.

Mr. HUME COOK.—It is the centre of a very large distributing district.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is the excuse which is urged for the expenditure of every large sum of money in connexion with the erection of post-offices in country towns. The item should be carefully looked into. At any rate, I do not feel prepared to accept the responsibility of voting these sums in the absence of fuller information.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—I am sure that if the honorable member for Yarra will visit the Melbourne General Post Office he will be convinced that, in the interests of the men who are employed there, additional accommodation is urgently needed. I agree with him that the centralization which is going on, and which necessitates men being brought in from Brunswick and the outlying suburbs in connexion with the delivery of letters, is exceedingly unfair to them. It frequently compels them to work not eight but eleven and twelve hours per day. I do hope that the Postmaster-General will investigate this matter. I can assure him that there is no occasion for the present practice. For years letters were delivered in Victoria without resort to it. Under existing conditions the men may work nominally.

only eight hours a day, but in reality they are compelled to be on duty for a considerably longer period. The accommodation for letter-sorters and others in the Melbourne General Post Office is very inadequate. Indeed, I do not know why the health authorities have not interfered.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is inadequate not only in regard to the letter-carriers' quarters, but in regard to those of other officers.

Mr. MAUGER. — The requirements which are insisted upon in the case of private employers have not been enforced by the health authorities in the Postal Department. I am aware that the Postmaster-General has visited the offices, and I am quite sure that if the honorable member for Yarra does likewise he will agree that further accommodation is urgently required.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I should like to obtain more information in regard to this vote of £10,000. I do not know whether we are to have a repetition of the condition of affairs described by the honorable member for Maranoa, who spoke of a building without a floor, or a structure possessing a floor, but no roof. Certainly, there has been too great a tendency to erect buildings of a temporary character, which require to be pulled down and rebuilt within a few years. Some time ago, in a spirit of great economy, the Electric Telegraph Office in Elizabeth-street, Melbourne, was erected. That building will have to be demolished some day, and a new one substituted. It is not at all in keeping with the Post Office buildings, and is entirely inadequate to the business which is transacted there. I desire to know whether this proposed vote of £10,000 is to be expended upon additions of an absolutely permanent character—whether it is to be part of a well-defined scheme to extend the General Post Office in accordance with the original plans and specifications. It seems to me that if this money is to be spent upon temporary buildings, it will not be true economy, but the very worst kind of waste.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I am quite prepared to accept responsibility for this proposed vote. When I was Postmaster-General I made careful inquiries into the accommodation at the General Post Office, Melbourne. I visited the place, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is not creditable to the Department to allow men to work there under existing conditions.

Mr. PAGE.—Did the present state of affairs obtain prior to Federation?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It has been in force for a long time. If the honorable member will visit the Registered Letter office in Bourke-street upon any busy day he will find the place thronged with people, and that from want of space the officials are very much hampered in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. PAGE.—We can see that at times in any of the other States.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am sure that the honorable member would be satisfied of the need for some additional accommodation if he saw what happens in Melbourne. When the late Government were in office, a proposal was made to me that temporary partitions should be erected round the verandah of the General Post Office. I did not think that it was desirable to spoil a fine building by the erection of wooden partitions. I concluded that the requirements of the Department were such that it would be unwise to expend a large sum of money in providing temporary additions which would require to be demolished within a few years. Consequently, after consultation with the Federal architect, it was decided that permanent buildings should be erected. It is not intended that too much money shall be spent upon those buildings immediately; the idea is that they shall be extended as the requirements of the public demand. The additions will be in keeping with the main building. There is a splendid block of land available for the purpose—a block which at present is not being utilized. I think that the Government are acting wisely in supporting the view taken by the late Ministry. At first I was disposed to think that temporary buildings might suffice, but after a personal inspection upon two occasions, and after consultation with the Federal architect, I decided that it would be better to erect a permanent structure. It would not be wise to enclose the verandah of the General Post Office with a wooden partition.

Mr. HUME COOK.—It would spoil the appearance of the whole building.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is what has been done to a certain extent in Elizabeth-street.

Mr. PAGE.—What did the Sorting Committee recommend?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They recommended that temporary buildings should be erected. However, I entertained a different view, and after consultation with the Federal architect, I was satisfied that it would be false economy to erect a temporary structure, seeing that it would probably require to give way within a comparatively brief period to a permanent building. The decision of the incoming Government proves that I acted rightly in recommending this expenditure. I believe that my successor caused inquiries to be made, and was satisfied that the correct course was adopted by the late Government in deciding that this expenditure should be incurred.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I must congratulate the Government on having the able advocacy of the Opposition in support of these Estimates. The honorable member for Yarra has given notice of a question relating to the centralizing of suburban letter-carriers at the Melbourne General Post Office, and I understand that there are a number of suburban offices where the sorting might well be carried out. I shall not support any proposed vote which, in my opinion, is unnecessary. Some of the States are passing through a time of stress, and this expenditure on new works will impose on them a further burden. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports has told a harrowing story of the overcrowding of officers at the General Post Office. Has this occurred only since Federation?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The business of the office is increasing.

Mr. PAGE.—Has it increased to such an extent that additions involving an outlay of £32,000 are necessary.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—As the result of these additions, a considerable saving will be effected in the number of hands employed.

Mr. PAGE.—I am pleased to hear that the increased business is one of the results of the union. This is another of the injustices which Victoria has suffered as the result of Federation. It is strange that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, who is one of the High Panjandruns of the Anti-Sweating League, has not called attention before to the overcrowding of which he now complains.

Mr. MAUGER.—I did so years ago.

Mr. PAGE.—And it has been left to a Minister representing another State to recommend this expenditure.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I believe that the honorable member for Coolgardie, when Postmaster-General, appointed the Sorting Committee which recommended that increased accommodation should be provided. The only difference is that the committee recommended a temporary building, while I considered it would be wiser to have a permanent one.

Mr. PAGE.—The committee was appointed to inquire and report, and yet the Minister has over-ridden its recommendations.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Surely a Minister is not always bound to adopt the recommendations of his officers?

Mr. PAGE.—Certainly not. If I were a Minister, I should break away from some of the red-tape regulations.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is what I did in this case.

Mr. PAGE.—If the requirements for the next ten years will be served by the erection of a building costing £5,000, it would be unwise to incur this expenditure of £32,000. I only urge the Minister to see that the reasonable economies which he would practice in making alterations to his own residence are observed in relation to works undertaken for the Commonwealth.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that there is considerable force in what has been said by the honorable member for Maranoa. Although we are asked this year to vote a sum of only £10,000 towards this work, we know that a total expenditure of £32,000 is involved, and that we shall have to vote that amount by yearly instalments. I should like to know whether the late Postmaster-General had the plans and specifications submitted to him, and was satisfied that there was no alternative but to agree to this expenditure.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I consider that the accommodation is necessary, and that a permanent building would be better than a temporary one; but it is for the Government architect to say what expenditure is necessary to provide the requisite accommodation.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—One cannot fail to observe that considerable expenditure is being incurred in connexion with the principal postal buildings of the union, and it is well that we should consider whether we are not a little inclined to extravagance in readily adopting the plans of architects, who often have no true conception of economy. As a rule, the only desire of a Government architect is to prepare plans for a handsome building that will serve to enhance his reputation. This is new expenditure, and will fall heavily upon Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania. Those States are at present suffering acutely from the extensive expenditure that is being incurred in connexion with new works, and I should like to know whether the Postmaster-General as well as his predecessor have carefully considered the plans and specifications for these additions. The services of an architect are undoubtedly valuable, provided that he is told how much his employer is prepared to expend. The building in which we are assembled was designed by an architect who was told that he might spend anything up to half-a-million; but we know that £1,000,000 was expended. Architects have magnificent ideas, but it takes a lot of money to give effect to them. I observe an item of £2,500 for a new post-office at Warracknabeal. I am told that that flourishing town already has a post-office which is doing good work. Is it intended to replace that excellent building at a cost of £2,500?

Mr. PHILLIPS.—Has the honorable member seen the building?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No, but I have been told that the district has a population of 5,000, and that the town has an excellent post-office, where the work is done efficiently. £2,500 is a large sum to spend in providing a post-office for this insignificant town, especially when an excellent front could be put to the present building at a cost of £1,500. I know of some towns similarly situated, where a grant of £1,000 has been made to provide a front to the existing building. The honorable member for Macquarie comes from a State in which public money has been spent most lavishly in this direction. But in Victoria, South Australia, and other States, such lavishness is not appreciated. £2,500 is altogether too much to vote for a new post-office at Warracknabeal. If the burden had to fall upon the people of Victoria alone, and they desired the expenditure to be incurred, the case would be different; but Queensland, New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania will be debited with a portion of the outlay. If so much money is not required to provide the necessary accommodation for the proper conduct of postal affairs in this town, then its expenditure will be a waste of public funds. I think that the item of £10,000 for extending the General Post Office in Melbourne should be looked into th-roughly, because it will involve a total expenditure of at least £30,000, and the item of £2,500 for a new building at Warracknabeal could very properly be reduced to £1,500.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—A new post-office at Warracknabeal is absolutely necessary, because the present building is really unsafe, and is not worth repairing. The foundations are defective, and altogether the building is in a very bad state of repair. In constructing the new building it is intended to utilize all the material in the present one. The old brick building is absolutely useless and unsafe, and it is necessary to provide adequate accommodation for the postmaster, as well as for the work which is to be done. This proposal involves no undue extravagance. It has been subjected to criticism by four Ministers, to see if it were not possible to reduce the expenditure, but it was found absolutely necessary that it should be incurred. As regards the extension of the General Post Office in Melbourne, it is not intended to erect a temporary structure, because to do so would be practically to waste public money. A plan has not yet been decided upon, but the intention is to lay down permanent work, with a view to eventually completing the original structure. It is not proposed to waste any money on the erection of temporary buildings, which, after they had served their purpose, would have to be pulled down. As a matter of economy to the Commonwealth as a whole it is considered that lasting work should be done. The question as to whether it is necessary to bring letter carriers into the head office is one which is outside the jurisdiction of my Department, and on which perhaps, the Postmaster-General may offer some observations.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—I have never inspected the General Post Office in Melbourne, but I quite agree with the action of the late Minister in his efforts to largely increase the accommodation for the officers. Many improvements to the General Post Office in Sydney have been made, and there is no reason why essential accommodation should not be provided in the General Post Office here. Last night I had to complain of the dilatory conduct of the Defence Department in regard to matters which I had continually submitted. I have a similar complaint to make against the Post and Telegraph Department. In my electorate there are many places which are very ill served in regard to post-offices. Chillagoe, which is an important town, and the centre of a large district, with a considerable population, has only a contract post-office. I am convinced that Chillagoe deserves a higher grade of office than it has. At Atherton, a large piece of land has been reserved in the centre of the town for post-office purposes. Part of it might be sold, and the proceeds devoted towards the erection of a new building. The place was visited by many honorable members on the tour in Queensland during the recess, and they will know that the inhabitants are very badly served in regard to postal requirements. Other places in my electorate are similarly situated. Cairns is a large town, the centre of an important district; but only £2,500 is set down for a post-office for it, whilst the same sum is to be devoted for the erection of a new office at a place like Warracknabeal, which, I learn from honorable members who have been there, is merely a little one-horse place of no consequence, inhabited by a few men and several dogs. I really cannot see why such a place should occupy the same position in regard to expenditure on post-offices as an important town like Cairns. I can see no reason for these anomalies. The only conclusion I can draw is that favoritism is shown to Victoria and to New South Wales.

Mr. PHILLIPS (Wimmera).—I am glad to hear that it has been decided to expend £2,500 on the erection of a new post-office at Warracknabeal. I was not present at the early part of the sitting to-day, but when I arrived I was told that a certain amount of opposition was being exhibited to the proposed work. Those honorable members who are criticising it surely know nothing about Warracknabeal. I contend that the expenditure is fully justified. Three Postmasters-General have considered and approved of the work, which has been recommended by their inspectors. The matter reached a climax a short time ago, when tenders were invited for the repair of the old post-office. Those tenders would have involved a considerable expenditure, and the inspector reported that, after all, it would only be a piece of patchwork, and that the money would be wasted. Something has been said about the population of Warracknabeal. It numbers about 3,000 people, and the population of the district at the present time is about 7,000. A short time ago Warracknabeal was seventh or eighth on the list of Victorian post-offices, a fact that indicates that the business done there was equal to that done at any other town of similar size in the State. That fact is some justification for the construction of the new office. The residents of Warracknabeal have made an application for a telephone exchange to be established, and, if it is granted, it will, of course, mean that increased accommodation will be required. The present building is wholly insufficient. I am perfectly satisfied that if honorable members would visit Warracknabeal, see for themselves the size and importance of the town, and form an opinion as to the resources of the district, they would without hesitation come to the conclusion that the existing accommodation is insufficient, and would support the vote. I trust that no further opposition will be shown to it, because I am satisfied that the work is necessary, and should be carried out.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—It is all very well for the honorable member for Wimmera to say that this work is necessary, but what we want to know is why a new building is required. It may be true that the old post-office is in a bad state of repair, but that is no reason why we should spend £2,500 on a new building, especially as we have been told that £1,000 expended on the old office would make it sufficient to meet all requirements. We learn from the Minister that £2,500 does not cover the whole of the expenditure, because the material in the present building is to be utilized in the construction of the new one. Evidently it is good material, and would be worth, say, £300 or £400. If it is good enough to use again, one must come to the conclusion that it would be cheaper to repair the present office. I presume that this expenditure will fall upon the whole Commonwealth. We are quite justified in opposing any outlay which is likely to be a heavy burden upon the people.

Mr. PHILLIPS.—A part of the burden is thrown on Victoria.

Mr. McDONALD.—Victoria bears no burden beyond its proper proportion of the cost of buildings. My complaint is that expensive buildings of this character are erected in places where they are really not necessary. Neither the honorable member for Wimmera, nor the Minister in charge of the Estimates, has shown any need for an elaborate building such as that proposed. There may be hundreds of other post offices in the same class as that at Warracknabeal; and requests for elaborate buildings of this kind will lead to extravagant expenditure and endless trouble. Under the circumstances, I move—

That the item, "Warracknabeal, £2,500," be reduced by £1,500.

Unless we obtain some further information, showing the expenditure to be absolutely necessary, I shall press this amendment to a division.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The amount proposed is large for a small place like Warracknabeal, but we ought, in my opinion, to accept the assurance of the honorable member for Wimmera that if we visited the district we should be satisfied that the sum is required.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir). — I am pleased to see that the Committee is in an economical mood this morning. I am surprised, however, to hear the honorable member for Wimmera supporting a proposal for such exorbitant expenditure on a post-office at Warracknabeal. It is, further, surprising to find the ex-Postmaster-General, who is now a prominent member of the Opposition, in the forefront in supporting this expenditure at a time when he has no responsibility.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I only exercise the same right that the honorable member is exercising.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We know that the honorable member for Macquarie administered the Post and Telegraph Department with such care and tact as to earn the respect of every honorable member, and it is now alarming to hear him advocating this lavish expenditure at a time when he has practically no responsibility. We all know that a brick building means a substantial building; and I am certain that not many years since a very considerable amount was expended on the post-office in this town. The ex-Postmaster-General had most piteous appeals from very important centres in the Commonwealth for cheap buildings in which postal business could be conveniently transacted, and he was hard-hearted enough to refuse those appeals. I should like to know what it was that affected him to such an extent that he granted the request of the residents of Warracknabeal.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I must do not remember the honorable member for Wimmera ever waiting on me.

Mr. PHILLIPS.—All I did was in a petition signed by the residents.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have not made any charge against the honorable member for Wimmera, who, I would make no request which I feel was justified on its merits.

Mr. JOHNSON.—When was the building erected?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It cannot be more than twenty years ago, because Warracknabeal as a town is only of very recent date.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think it was that the present building is of recent date.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is strange in the case of a brick building up so recently. We have attention drawn to the fact that the Government has accepted contracts, and to provide for very essential parts of the buildings. I trust that the Minister will be able to give a full explanation of the necessity for the proposed expenditure.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Monaro—Postmaster-General).—In reference to the matter brought forward by the honorable member for Yarrawonga, the attention of the Committee is directed to the fact that the report of the Sorting Committee on the Melbourne Post Office. They say—

Owing to the extremely inconvenient position, and the very limited space in the room, obstructed by numerous large and obsolete fittings (see rough plan of room and fittings submitted), together with the fact that the letter carriers' room is on the corner of the building, and the delivery room in another street, proper organization of the vision are very difficult, if not impossible. The arrangements cause delay and consequent expense, as two lifts have to be provided for the conveyance of mail matter, letter carriers' staff to the letter carriers' room, and cannot be made of the available space. It could be remedied by the erection of an expensive L-shaped annex on the corner, extending from the mail room to Elizabeth-street, thence to Elizabeth-street, thus adding about 6,000 square feet of space, as a large part now available for the letter carriers' room. The proposed addition would enable the letter carriers' room to be placed in a central position, leaving sufficient space for the introduction of the bag rack system. It would also permit of the delivery room being removed to a more convenient position for the public, on Elizabeth-street, and allow the service of letter carriers to be utilized during the time now wasted waiting for correspondence to be delivered.

them under the present slow process, at the same time expediting deliveries to the city and suburbs.

That is the position in the Melbourne Post-office, and I should like to say that, even if there were no centralization, the additions proposed are absolutely necessary to provide reasonable accommodation for the officers employed, and to enable them to carry out their work with the expedition which the public demand. I have looked into the plans placed before my predecessor, and, although they have not been definitely decided upon, I can assure honorable members that nothing of a temporary character will be approved. In all the cities of the Commonwealth, and in fact in every place whose permanency is established beyond any doubt, only buildings of a permanent character will be constructed.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Will not the Minister see that the character of the building is preserved in the case of the proposed additions to the Melbourne Post Office?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Certainly. Whilst £30,000 is asked for, it is proposed to spend £10,000 at the present time in a way which will preserve the character of the building, and later on if additional accommodation be found necessary we can add storey to storey, and there will be no need to pull down any of the work previously constructed. I had a report prepared on the subject of centralization, which really means that letter-carriers are sent out from the Melbourne office in many cases, instead of from some of the suburban offices. Whilst we should be desirous of treating the letter carriers, and all the public servants of the Commonwealth, as well as we can, the convenience of the public must also be considered. There can be only one desire on the part of the Department, and that is to give the best possible service at the least possible expense, and whilst the officials of the Department are treated fairly they must expect to have to do the same work as they would be required to do if the Post-office were a private institution. There is no doubt that the vast increase in the work of the letter carriers has been brought about by the reduced rate of postage in Victoria. The report on the subject says—

This vast increase is accounted for by the introduction of the penny postage, and the new Postal Rates Act, also the general increase of population. It therefore follows that a very large increase of sorters would be required if the old system were reverted to. At least twenty-five additional sorters would be required at the General Post-office, and a number of sorters would also require to be appointed at the suburban offices; and even then their services would not nearly be so rapid or efficient as at present, and the public would not tolerate the delays which would be unavoidable with such a system after experiencing the benefits of the present one.

I do not think any one will seriously contend that we should go back to the old system. It would mean the employment of twenty-five more sorters, whilst the public would not be as well served as they are at present. The Government are of the opinion that centralization is a bad thing if it can be avoided. It is the policy of the Post-office Department wherever it can be done to distribute the work, and let each centre take care of itself. But when the adoption of such a policy involves extra expenditure without securing a better service, we do not propose to run a good principle to death. As regards postal facilities at Chillagoe and Atherton, any representation made regarding those places will receive every consideration. It is not the function of the Postal Department to erect grand buildings, because I think that when the convenience of the general public is fairly met with suitable offices, we should do what we can to provide better facilities of communication for those who are living in distant places. In many districts contract offices are better than official offices—the three grades of offices being non-official, contract, and official. The representations of the honorable member for Herbert will have every consideration, and so will those of other honorable members, especially when they have to do with the requirements of the back-blocks. The design and construction of the Warracknabeal office are really matters for the Department of Home Affairs; though, of course, the postal authorities will have something to say as to the accommodation to be provided. I would remind the Committee that these Estimates were prepared by the previous Government. My predecessor looked very carefully into this matter, and we all know how painstaking he is, and how strong is his desire for economy, and when I add that they were also scrutinized by the late Treasurer, whose views as to the desirability of keeping down expenditure are so well known, honorable members need not be very much alarmed at the proposal. Complaints have been made that many requests for offices in the country districts have not been complied with, because Victoria cannot afford to comply with them, though, whenever a good case is made out, I will give consideration to it. Warracknabeal is an important place, with a pretty big postal business, requiring the employment of a staff of eight officials. When a new post-office was asked for, the district inspector was instructed to report on the subject, and on that report the following minute was written:—

This is really a matter for the Department of Home Affairs to decide. The district architect has reported that, owing to the foundation having given way, the present building will, at no distant date, be unsafe.

In the face of that report, I do not see the justification of questioning the advisability of the proposed expenditure. It is desirable that we should be economical, but £2,500 is not a large sum for the erection of a post-office in a large place like Warracknabeal.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—In my opinion, the explanation of the Postmaster-General has not justified the expenditure of so large a sum as £10,000 on the General Post Office in Melbourne, an expenditure which only forms part of a proposed total expenditure of £30,000. In my opinion, there is too much expenditure on ornate buildings, to the neglect of public requirements in other directions, such as improved and cheapened telephonic communication. Ever since I have been a member I have been trying my hardest to obtain from successive Postmasters-General telephonic communication for Miranda, Cronulla, Sylvania, and adjacent places, which are absolutely without this ordinary convenience. Sutherland, the nearest place to which there is a telephone, is a considerable distance away, and that telephone was only recently erected, after persistent effort, at a cost which was very small.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — Because we adopted the condenser system.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The district to which I refer contains a much greater population than that of Warracknabeal. I am at the present time having considerable difficulty in the effort to get a public telephone at the new railway station at Oatley, the centre of a busy and fairly populous neighbourhood. Although successive Postmasters-General cheerfully acquiesce in the erection of costly post-offices in country towns, they demur at granting telephonic communication to districts where people cannot properly conduct their business without it.

The Postmaster-General has told us that, according to the district inspector's report, the Warracknabeal post-office is in a state of disrepair, and that the foundations are giving way, and it may become unsafe. The present building, however, must be a comparatively new one, because Warracknabeal has not existed as a town for many years.

Mr. PHILLIPS.—It has existed for thirty-five years.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I understood that the present building has not been erected very long. If its foundations are giving way, that must be owing to the unsuitability of the site, or due to a defect in construction which reflects upon those responsible in the first instance.

Mr. WATKINS. — Warracknabeal is the capital of the Wimmera.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I believe that it was a fairly important centre until the railway was extended further on, but that since then it has declined.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Its postal revenue this year was £300 greater than its postal revenue last year.

Mr. JOHNSON.—We are asked to give what is equivalent to a present of £1 per head to every resident in the town, because of an increase of £300. In Marrickville, although there is a population eight or ten times as large as that of Warracknabeal, the postal business is transacted in an office which cannot have cost anything like £2,500. It seems to me that one-storey weatherboard structures would be sufficient for places like this. At the same time, while I am not disposed to support the item as it stands, I think the honorable member for Kennedy is proposing too drastic a reduction. In my opinion, the Department should do not more, when erecting post-offices, than meet the actual necessities of the towns in which they are to be erected, and any savings could be expended in extending telephonic communication. I shall oppose all the items in which I think that the proposed expenditure is too great, until more recognition is given to the needs of the country in regard to telephonic communication. Since I have been in this Parliament, I have, as the result of eighteen months' hard work, secured the construction of only one small telephone service on the condenser system.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member wanted me to make a departure from a regulation—a departure which if it had become general would have resulted in great loss of revenue to the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHNSON.—A resolution was passed by this House in favour of an amendment of the regulations which would permit of the extension of the telephone system; and I think that effect should be given to the wishes of honorable members. The residents in the other States should not be subjected to inconvenience because of some special arrangement which is in force in regard to the out-of-date telephone system of Western Australia. We should cheapen and extend telephone facilities as far as possible, and, in the meantime, oppose all proposals for lavish expenditure in the erection of elaborate post-offices where they are not required. At the same time I think that the honorable member for Kennedy has proposed too great a reduction upon this vote, and I cannot go the whole way with him. I hope the Postmaster-General will do his best to give effect to the resolution passed in favour of providing better facilities for telephone extension, and at lower rates than those now charged beyond the metropolitan radius, and that he will alter any regulation that may prevent the desire expressed by honorable members from being carried into effect.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—We have been told by the Minister that the plans which were prepared last year were very carefully considered by the Postmaster-General and the Treasurer; but it is very strange that so many of the votes proved to be larger than were required. Last year we passed the sum of £5,500 for expenditure upon sundry offices, but only £1,075 was spent. This year it is proposed to revote £2,600, and to also appropriate £500 for new service, making a total of £3,100. The total vote for this year, added to the amount spent last year, represents a considerably smaller sum than the appropriation for 1904-5, and I should like to know whether we are justified in placing any reliance upon the estimates of our officers. Why is it that the large sum voted last year is not now regarded as necessary? We are here as a Committee of review, and we should not vote a single shilling unless we are satisfied that it is required. If we are called upon to rely solely upon the reports of the officers, we might just as well pass everything they propose without question. Last year £838 was appropriated for expenditure upon the sewerage of sundry offices, whereas only £266 was spent. This year it is proposed to revote £150, and to spend £200 upon new service, making a total of £350, which, added to the amount expended last year, gives us an aggregate considerably lower than the previous appropriation. I showed also that in one case in Tasmania, £1,100 more than was required was voted. Our officers should present us with reliable estimates in the first instance, and, if we consider that the proposed votes are justified, the money should be spent during the year. If, on the other hand, the officers present excessive estimates, they cannot be properly discharging their duty. I do not approve of the proposal to spend £10,000 in making additions to the General Post Office, Melbourne, before we have any plans submitted to us. For all we know, £8,000 might be sufficient, or, possibly, £12,000 might be required. I think that the proper course in all these matters is to offer a bonus for the best plan submitted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have to carry out the original design.

Mr. STORRER.—I do not know that that is always the best course to adopt. We ought to profit by our experience, and to recognise that modern buildings are, if not so ornamental, more useful than those which were erected years ago. We should be careful not to vote large sums of money which are not required for expenditure during the year, because the extent to which our balance-sheet has been inflated on the wrong side has prejudiced us in the eyes of the general community.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—I might explain to the honorable member for Bass that during the year additions have to be made to various offices and buildings, regarding which no precise estimates can be furnished, because we do not know what requisitions may come in. The Estimates have to be based upon the experience of preceding years, and I hope the honorable member will not find fault with the Minister in charge, or with the officers, if they endeavour to keep the expenditure during the year below the amount appropriated.

Mr. STORRER.—What about the item for sewerage—£500 or £600 more than required was voted last year.

Mr. GROOM.—The £150, which it is proposed to revote, is to be devoted to the sewerage of the Hawthorn and Flemington Post-offices, and the £200 to be appropriated for new service is to provide for the sewerage of the post-office at North Melbourne. We must also appropriate a sum to meet general contingencies in connexion with additions to sundry offices.

Mr. STORRER.—The amount is a very large one.

Mr. GROOM.—The £2,600 which we are asking honorable members to revote, is required to complete works which are already in progress at the post-offices at Bairnsdale and Windsor. The Estimates last year were not passed until December, and, therefore, only six months was available within which to carry out the work authorized. It is proposed to appropriate only £500 for new services arising during the year, and I can assure the honorable member that the object of the officers has been, and will be, to minimize the expenditure as much as possible.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I think that our expenditure from beginning to end is upon altogether too lavish a scale. It must be remembered that the taxpayers have to provide this money. If we were conducting a business of our own we should conduct it upon economical lines, because we should have to provide the funds with which to carry on operations. But as we do not feel the pinch in that respect, we are not so careful as we might be in sanctioning expenditure upon Government departments. It appears to me that in some way or other we should endeavour to discover a much less lavish method of spending the taxpayers' money. I contend that amounts which have been voted for services which may be carried out during the current financial year, should not appear upon the Estimates as revotes. They should be struck out, and we should vote the money as if it were to be spent upon new services. Of course if any amount is intended to be expended upon any work which is in progress, a revote will be unavoidable. The Minister of Home Affairs has declared that it is necessary to vote a large sum to cover contingencies. I contend that if those contingencies have not arisen, and if the amounts have not actually been spent, they should not appear upon the Estimates as revotes, but as expenditure upon new works. I do not think we should complain, because the expenditure upon these works has been kept below the estimate. So long as the services are well conducted we should encourage the Government to make savings wherever possible. It is far better that high estimates should be submitted for the carrying out of public works than that we should be furnished with low estimates, and should afterwards be required to vote additional money for the purpose. To my mind the proposed vote in connexion with the Warracknabeal Post-office is an unduly large one, despite the fact that both the Postmaster-General and the honorable member for Macquarie, agree that it is absolutely necessary. We should keep a tight rein upon our expenditure. I believe that for a less amount than £2,500, we can provide all the accommodation that is necessary at Warracknabeal. In my opinion, we should be acting wisely if we despatched a representative to Canada to ascertain how it is that similar works there are carried out upon cheaper lines. I think that our telephone system should be extended in the interior as far as possible. In this connexion I have no special complaint to make, but I know that in a pastoral district in the constituency which I represent, the residents are very desirous of obtaining telephonic communication. The cost of providing them with this great convenience is estimated at £300. They have offered to contribute £100 towards the erection of the line before the work is commenced, but so far their application has been refused. I admit that the Postmaster-General is obtaining another report upon the matter. In districts where men are prepared to prove their bona fides by contributing one-third of the capital cost of telephone lines before they are erected, I think that their claims should be considered. If the regulations do not permit of that being done they should be altered. We do not ask the residents of Melbourne to put their hands into their pockets and contribute more than £3,000 of the proposed vote of £10,000 which is intended to provide additional accommodation at the General Post-office. Of course we may be told that in our cities there are large populations, and that, therefore, these works are reproductive. But they are reproductive only because of the primary producers. Seeing that the individuals to whom I have referred, are prepared to tax themselves to the extent of 33 per cent. upon the capital cost of the undertaking, there should not be the slightest hesitation in carrying out the work. I admit that it is very difficult for us to control our expenditure. To a large extent we have to accept the Estimates submitted upon trust, but I do think that Ministers should exercise the closest supervision over them, and that, instead of sanctioning the erection of costly buildings, they should be content with less pretentious structures, in which the business of the Departments can be comfortably transacted.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I desire to say a word or two upon the proposed vote in connexion with the Warracknabeal Post-office. It seems to me an unduly large one, especially in view of the treatment which was meted out to the Woollangabba Post-office, in Queensland. Last year a sum of £2,010 was voted for the erection of a post-office at South Brisbane, but only £904 of that amount was expended. I think that that fact constitutes an argument in favour of reducing the vote for the post-office at Warracknabeal. The latter town is said to be situated in the "back-blocks." I am sorry that the honorable member for Hunter is not present, because I should like to know if his definition of "back-blocks" applies to Warracknabeal.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that the Postmaster-General made a satisfactory explanation of the proposed expenditure of £10,000 upon the General Post Office of Melbourne, and consequently I shall offer no opposition to that item. In the case of the Warracknabeal Post-office, however, I am satisfied that all the adverse criticism in which honorable members have indulged has been thoroughly justified. In that office I find that it will be necessary to provide accommodation for only eight officials, and that the material used in the old building, including the fittings, can be utilized in the new structure. On the other hand, I find that at Mosman, in Sydney—the locality in which the Postmaster-General resides—although a new building is to be erected upon a new site, and despite the fact that accommodation must be provided for seventeen officers, the proposed expenditure is only £2,100. It seems to me that the Postmaster-General has proved that a vote of £2,500 in connexion with the Warracknabeal building would be an excessive one. I urge the Committee to amend the amendment of the honorable member for Kennedy, and to agree to a reduction of the amount by £1,000. I contend that an expenditure of £1,500 will provide ample accommodation there.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The foundations constitute the trouble. What am I to do when my officers, and the Federal architect, tell me that the work cannot be undertaken for less than £2,500?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The Postmaster-General can commence de novo. As a business man, it seems to me that the honorable gentleman has clearly established the fact that an outlay of £1,500 will provide ample accommodation for the officials at Warracknabeal.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy). — From inquiries I have made, I learn that the greater portion of this sum is required for putting in a foundation, and that that fact accounts for the high cost of the new building. It is said that, owing to the rottenness of the ground, it would cost two or three times as much to put a new foundation under the existing building as to lay down a foundation for the new building. Although there is no stone in the district, a certain amount of material will be available from the old building. In my opinion, however, the amount we are asked to vote is too large. My principal objection is not so much to the cost of the new building as to the distribution of the expenditure amongst the various States. In view of the fact that New South Wales has a population nearly three times as great as that of Queensland, the result of this rule will be that in the near future Victoria and New South Wales will be compelling the smaller States to bear a burden which is really beyond their capacity. I feel that the appropriation of these large sums for the erection of post-offices will impose a very heavy burden upon the smaller States. It is high time that the whole matter was looked into very carefully, and a reduction in the cost of new buildings was made. From what I have heard, I am satisfied that the reduction proposed in the vote for a post-office at Warracknabeal would be too great, and therefore I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN.—It is not necessary for the honorable member to ask leave, because the question has not yet been put from the Chair.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert). — I am thankful to the Postmaster-General for giving me an assurance that he will take into his consideration the matters I mentioned this morning. . He implied that I had not previously communicated with the Department, but the fact is that my representations on the subject have been protracted over a period of four years. I hope that prompt attention will now be given to my requests. It has been laid down as a rule that a town cannot be provided with an official post-office unless the postal revenue is £400. The postal revenue at Atherton exceeds that sum. In the centre of the town there is a piece of land which is absolutely suitable for a post-office, and which has been granted for that purpose by the State Government. There is no reason why an official post-office should not be provided. At the present time the postal business is done at the railway station, to the great inconvenience of every one, for it must be remembered that Atherton is a large distributing centre. I hope that the Minister will place an amount for this purpose on the Supplementary Estimates for this year. The sum of £2,500, which has been put on the Estimates for the Cairns post-office, is rather small; but I do not complain on that ground, because I learn from a foot-note that the new building is estimated to cost £3,000. I ask the Minister to give more than the usual formal consideration to the matters I have mentioned. I have no wish to ventilate any grievance here until I have found that I can get no satisfaction from the Department.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I desire to obtain a little information about the item of £2,500 for the Cairns post-office, which, we are told, is estimated to cost £3,000. Is this large sum also due to defective foundations, or is it required for making additions to the existing building, and, if so, does the state of the postal business warrant the expenditure?

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—At Cairns it is proposed to erect a new post-office. The postal inspector reports that the accommodation in the present building for the public is totally inadequate. It is merely a portion of an eight-feet verandah, which is blocked in with part of the original walls of the main building left open, and just a counter inserted. Behind the counter there is very inferior accommodation. The space for handling the mails is exceedingly limited. In fact there is a block when the officers try to do mail business. The public lobby, the telephone exchange, and the telegraph office are under a skillion roof. Of course, it can be easily imagined that during the summer months the atmosphere is exceedingly trying to the staff. During the greater portion of the day, from about ten to four, fourteen officials are obliged to work under very trying conditions.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What is the state of the Cairns?

Mr. GROOM.—It is a very important place, and is likely to become one of the most important in the northern part of the State. The old building, and I can say that it is absolutely required. The main building is positively dark, because daylight is admitted through a small window in the back skillion. If ever any expenditure for a post-office was justifiable, this is the case. When the new building is erected, the old building will be used for the purpose of a dwelling. I am unable to give the member for Lang an idea of the revenue, but I can assure him that it is a very large distributing centre. It is a starting point of not only several railways, but also several railways, with up large mining and pastoral properties. The expenditure of this sum is quite justifiable, especially when it is remembered that the present building has accommodated from twelve to fourteen of

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—As I have visited Cairns, I can indicate the word that the Minister of Home Affairs has said in reference to the importance of the district and the necessity for a post-office there. The item in question appears to be the most important in the Estimates for new works and buildings in Queensland, and it seems unfair, at the least, that the number of works carried out in that State should be limited. Prior to Federation the Government took steps towards rebuilding the General Post Office at Brisbane, but practically nothing has since been done in that direction. I think that the representatives of Queensland have a right to expect that provision shall be made for new works in that State, and particularly in the capital city. I direct the attention of the Committee, not to the items under the heading of "Queensland" in the Estimates, but to the absence from the provision for many necessary improvements. The operators at the General Post Office are handicapped by want of room, and it seems to me that more consideration be shown for the wants of Brisbane generally.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I should like the Minister to give the Committee some information as to what is being done in regard to a new General Post Office for Brisbane. Before Federation was established tenders were called for competitive designs, so that the people of the State were evidently of opinion that a new building should be erected.

Mr. CAMERON.—They probably thought that with Federation the other States would be jointly responsible for the cost.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — That cannot fairly be said, because competitive designs were invited several years before Federation. In these circumstances, I should like to know why nothing has been done to provide the increased accommodation required.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—The honorable member for Lang has questioned the advisableness of the proposed expenditure on the Cairns post-office, but I for one have no objection to offer to it. The Public Service Commissioner has placed the Cairns post-office in the fourth grade, and the Warracknabeal post-office in the ninth grade, and yet the proposed vote in each case is exactly the same.

Mr. GROOM.—In the case of Warracknabeal provision is made for a residence for the postmaster, as well as for a post-office.

Mr. TUDOR. — No doubt the Public Service Commissioner had regard to the work to be performed at the Warracknabeal office when he placed it in the ninth grade. The honorable member for Brisbane has raised a question that is likely to be frequently discussed in this Committee. He has pointed out that these estimates provide for an expenditure of only £7,145 on new postal works and buildings in Queensland, and that this is a small amount compared with the proposed expenditure in other States.

Mr. PAGE.—It is all that is necessary.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is so. The point I wish to emphasize is that we should regard these items from a Federal standpoint, and not from the point of view of a particular State. It was because of this feeling that I questioned the necessity for works proposed to be carried out in an electorate joining that which I represent. In dealing with these items we should study economy, just as we should do if we were dealing with the expenditure of our own money. We should not be ready to sanction expenditure merely because it is to be borne by all the States.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I am glad that the honorable member for Yarra has compared the proposed expenditure on the Warracknabeal post-office with that on the post-office at Cairns. It appears from the statement made by the Minister of Home Affairs that while there are twelve officers employed in the Cairns office, there are only eight in the Warracknabeal office. I am not familiar with the two districts, but I gather that Cairns has a larger population and is a larger distributing centre than is Warracknabeal. We have also the assurance of the Minister that it is likely to develop into a town of great importance. I have no objection to expenditure that is shown to be absolutely necessary. If the accommodation at the Cairns post-office is such as has been described, improvements must be needed, but whether it is necessary to spend the amount proposed is quite another matter. In view of the explanations that have been given, the proposed vote seems to be more justifiable than does that to which we have agreed in the case of the Warracknabeal post-office. At the same time, I should like to know what accommodation is to be provided.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I should like to know whether the Minister of Home Affairs is in a position to afford us an explanation regarding the position assumed by Queensland in reference to new works and buildings erected by the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth will bear the cost of these buildings, and I wish to know whether they will be our property?

Mr. GROOM.—Yes.

Mr. McDONALD.—I have been led to ask the question owing to the extraordinary action taken by the Government of Queensland in transferring from loan account to revenue, amounts equivalent to the expenditure incurred by the Commonwealth on new works and buildings in that State.

Mr. GROOM.—Can the honorable member quote a specific case?

Mr. McDONALD.—I am referring now to votes relating, not to postal buildings, but to defence works, and the erection of telegraph and telephone lines. It was pointed out the other evening by the honorable member for Macquarie that the expenditure charged to revenue by the Commonwealth from 1st July, 1901, to 31st

May, 1903, in respect of new works and buildings in Queensland, was debited by that State to their loan account. The Auditor-General's Report appearing in vol. 1 of the Votes and Proceedings of the Parliament of Queensland for 1905 prove that this has been done. We find that the amount charged by the Commonwealth to revenue on account of new works, &c., to 31st May, 1903, and now charged to the State loan fund, so as to recoup the revenue of the State, is £33,287 17s. 7d. in respect of electric telegraphs, £1,472 4s. 2d. in respect of defence, and so forth. I presume that when we pay for these buildings out of the revenue of the Commonwealth, they must become the property of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—And the old buildings also.

Mr. McDONALD.—I understand that we have to pay for the old buildings as transferred properties. It strikes me, however, that there may be a difficulty, not only with respect to Queensland, but as to other States also, in this respect. A State Government may have carried a vote in a State Parliament on account of a certain work, and would have no asset to show for the expenditure; and, by-and-by, when we come to pay for these buildings, the State Government may wish to make the Commonwealth pay again, because the expenditure has been charged to its loan funds. I know that this has happened in Queensland. The State Government will have nothing to show for the sums so taken from loan money, and credited to revenue, and unless we are able to show that this particular post-office was built from Commonwealth money we may have to pay twice. I want to know whether these buildings really belong to the Commonwealth after we have paid for them?

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—This is the first time that the point raised by the honorable member for Kennedy has been brought under my notice. I will look into it carefully. All properties that were exclusively used by the Commonwealth at the time of taking them over passed to the Commonwealth, and ultimately they will form the subjects of a settlement between the Commonwealth and the States concerned. The honorable member is quite right in drawing attention to any matter if he thinks that we may possibly be charged twice, in consequence of a State's method of financing.

I will certainly see that no such thing takes place. Of course, however, a State's method of financing is within its own jurisdiction.

Mr. McDONALD.—I merely wished to be sure as to the ownership of the buildings.

Mr. GROOM.—The Cairns post-office will be paid for by us, directly out of revenue. It is a transferred property. It is ours. All that we have to pay for are properties which belonged to the State at the time of transfer. They will be valued according to principles agreed upon, and the Commonwealth will be debited with the amount due.

Mr. McDONALD.—What is our status? If we spend this money for the construction of buildings, will they be ours after we have paid for them?

Mr. GROOM.—They are our property, and any money that we spend upon them we spend upon what is our own. The Treasurer informs me that the practice to which the honorable member has alluded has been discontinued.

Mr. McDONALD.—It was done in Queensland last year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It has not been done since the works have been debited per capita.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—The representations which the honorable member for Herbert has made to my Department concerning the postal accommodation at Atherton have received consideration. I have asked the Deputy Postmaster-General of the State for a further report, and immediately I receive it the matter will be dealt with. In answer to the honorable member for Lang, I have to state that the revenue from the Cairns post-office is £6,500 a year. Cairns is an important place. As to the question asked by the honorable member for Robertson, the Inspector-General of Works has paid a visit to Brisbane, and has looked into matters concerning the General Post Office carefully. I believe that a project is on foot for making certain improvements, at a cost of a few hundred pounds, that will afford the necessary accommodation for some time to come. Nothing definite has been decided. The Inspector-General has only just come back. But the whole matter will be carefully considered, and I hope that what is reasonable will be carried out.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I wish to refer to the lack of privacy in connexion with the telephone lines that are ing multiplied, owing to the new systems made by the Department. A system was inaugurated by the late Master-General, and I have no reason to suppose that the present Postmaster-General is not carrying out the same policy. In country districts are now beginning to get the full value of the telephone system. The arrangements are faulty, inasmuch as there is no privacy in the use of the instruments. When a telephone is installed in a country post-office, unless there is a separate cabinet, people will not make full use of it. At present there is a lack of separate cabinets.

WATSON.—It would not cost much to put them in.

JOSEPH COOK.—It is a matter of making a very little expenditure, and the advantage to country people would be very great indeed. I believe that such an instrument would pay for itself over and over again. I ask the Postmaster-General whether money can be provided for this purpose. I congratulate both him and his predecessor on the new departure in connection with the installation of new telephone services. I am glad to see that the advances of science have made it possible for country people to enjoy the use of the telephone. The more we can do for people in the back country these advantages, which are always easily obtainable in the towns, the more we shall be carrying out the purpose for which the system was instituted. That is being done thanks largely to the energy and assistance of the late Postmaster-General, in connection with the use of what is known as the condenser system.

MAHON.—It was started by Mr. Watson when he was Postmaster-General.

JOSEPH COOK.—There is nothing new under the sun. When something which is to be new is invented, we usually find that in some form it has been in use from the beginning of time. But I venture to say that, for practical purposes, it is only very recently been discovered to what an extensive degree the condenser system can be utilized. Years ago the condenser system was talked of, but then scarcely any of the principal officers of the Department saw their way to adopt it, but now it is in the most gingerly way, with the result that in some cases extensive and costly duplications were made, which all have now been avoided. While this system is not new in the sense that it has now just been discovered, it is new in its application. But what I am now asking is that where extensions have been granted the Department shall make them of the fullest possible advantage to the people. That can only be done by guaranteeing some privacy to the users of the public telephones. I understand that the telephone cabinets cost £4 or £5 each, but I think that, perhaps, they might be provided more cheaply. At any rate, whatever the cost, it may be regarded as nothing compared with the advantages conferred. In my opinion, the great increase of business would more than compensate for the outlay; and I ask the Minister to endeavour to rectify the inconvenience I have pointed out.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—Instructions have already been given that wherever possible public telephones shall be so placed that they may be made use of in privacy. When this can be done in country places at small expense, it is only a question of time when it may be done in all, or pretty well all, places where the business of the user of the telephone is likely to be overheard by the public.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—The telephones in the silence cabinets in various parts of Sydney ought to be so constructed and cabinets so managed as to be of more service to the public. They are largely used by business men, but it is found that in many cases the expenditure of the threepenny-piece elicits no reply, and on occasions, two or three coins have to be inserted before communication is accomplished. Moreover, the instruments provided are those of the earliest period, which have been discarded in other branches of the telephone system; and if the public cabinets are a failure, it is because they do not give general satisfaction. I hope the Minister will endeavour to provide up-to-date instruments. Personally, I have ceased to use the public telephones for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—I should like to know what provision has been made for the work which was promised in connexion with the service at Streaky Bay, South Australia. Only last week I received a telegram stating that this work had been held over for a considerable time; and I notice that no provision is made for it under these Estimates, although there was a promise that the work was to be put in hand. Is it proposed to make provision in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—This matter has only recently been brought under my notice, and inquiries are now being made. The honorable member for Grey made some representations to me the other day, and on these a report has been asked for.

Mr. POYNTON.—But a promise was made that this work would be put in hand as early as possible.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What is the particular work to which the honorable member refers?

Mr. POYNTON.—It is some work in connexion with the telephone system.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That work is being attended to. What I was referring to was the request for the post-office; in this latter matter, a report has been asked for, and, when received, it will, of course, have attention.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—An amount of £1,600 is provided for a post-office at Kadina. Will the Minister kindly give some information as to the work it is proposed to carry out?

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The money is intended for the erection of a post-office. At present, the postal business at Kadina is conducted in premises belonging to the State, and we have received notice that the building is required by the State authorities. It, therefore, becomes necessary to provide a building of our own, and, in view of the population, and the importance of this centre, the sum of £1,600 is not regarded as excessive.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie).—I see that £800 is provided for, I presume, the erection of a new post-office at Fimiston. In regard to this work, the Government cannot be accused of extravagance, because the experience of the people at this particular place, owing to the want of proper accommodation, has been most unsatisfactory. Great difficulty was experienced in getting a building of any description, considerable hostility being shown by the Department on, I understand, local advice.

Mr. MAHON.—But accommodation was provided very quickly when I became Postmaster-General.

Mr. FRAZER.—I am pleased to say that the honorable member for Coolgardie, who knows the importance of this place, immediately acceded to the reasonable request for accommodation when he became Postmaster-General. At present, the Government pay a rent of £104 per annum for a building that is entirely unsuitable. It was alleged, when requests were originally made for accommodation, that the business likely to be conducted at Fimiston would not justify the erection of a post-office, but I am pleased to say that at this place is done the fifth largest amount of postal business transacted in the post-offices of Western Australia. Fimiston is in the very centre of the gold belt, known as the "Boulder Block," and the mines in the vicinity are producing about £7,000,000 worth of gold per annum.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why all this explanation? Nobody is objecting to the expenditure.

Mr. FRAZER.—But I am complaining of the smallness of the amount provided, which is not more than enough to provide entirely inadequate accommodation. It is extraordinary that such an interjection should come from the honorable member for Lang, who is one of the great time monopolists in the Chamber. The honorable member has spoken for about half the time devoted to the Estimates, and has communicated less real information than has any other speaker.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I shall move a reduction of the amount provided.

Mr. FRAZER.—If the honorable member does so he will probably find himself alone. It is safe to say that within half-a-mile of the Fimiston Post-office there are 20,000 people at work during the working hours of the day, and very many of them can get to the post-office during the luncheon adjournment in order to transact mail business. The block of land on which the post-office is to be situated has been made available by one of the mining companies, which is a proof of the anxiety of the companies to have their business transacted near the mines. The cable business in connexion with the mines is of considerable magnitude. Although the Commonwealth, by an arrangement with the State Government, and in order to get a clear title to the land, has paid the sum of £500 for it, from an impartial valuation is estimated that it is worth £6,600. There is another aspect of the question which should receive some consideration. The climatic conditions prevailing in Kalgoorlie are such that, during some months of the year, it is not possible for public officers to give reasonable satisfaction in their employment if they are compelled to work in a galvanized iron building. I trust that if the work is undertaken it will be carried out in such a way that it can subsequently be extended as the need for greater accommodation arises. Provision for a further sum might be made on the Supplementary Estimates, or from an advance account. I hope that the Postmaster-General will see fit to express an opinion on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I did not propose to offer any observations on this item, but when I suggested to the honorable member for Kalgoorlie that it was not necessary to enter upon a lengthy explanation of an item to which apparently there was no opposition, I was met with a reply which was designedly offensive in its character, and wholly uncalled for. If it were only as a matter of protest against the right of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie to constitute himself, with the characteristic bumptiousness of precocious youth, lecturer-general to the Opposition, I should be justified in asserting my right to challenge this item, or any other item on the Estimates. But I have still more solid grounds than the assertion of my right of criticism as a member of this House. I was previously unaware where Fimiston was situated, but I have since made some inquiries, and I find that it is about a mile from Kalgoorlie. From the information I have received, and from the anxiety displayed by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie to secure the expenditure of a larger sum than is proposed to be voted, I am convinced that the item is one of those which require investigation. But for the remarks of the honorable member it might have been passed over in silence. I find that Fimiston is situated between Kalgoorlie and Boulder City, at both of which places there are magnificent post-offices.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — Fimiston is 2½ miles from Kalgoorlie.

Mr. JOHNSON.—As Fimiston is connected by an electric tram service with Boulder City and Kalgoorlie, the people of the district can, with the greatest ease, make use of the post-office accommodation provided at either of the places mentioned, in addition to availing themselves of the Fimiston Post-office.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Look at the revenue of the Fimiston office.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There can be no guarantee of a permanent revenue from a place which depends solely on the extent of the payable mineral deposits in the neighbourhood. Some justification should be shown for additional expenditure in a place which appears to be very well served already.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There is a post-office there now.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am aware of that, and, so far as I can see, it meets all present requirements without the necessity for a penny of extra expenditure. Seeing that the place is so close to the palatial post-offices at Kalgoorlie and Boulder City, I think it is unnecessary to expend this money at Fimiston. The post-office at Kalgoorlie vies with the General Post Office in Melbourne in the matter of structural magnificence and accommodation, and it is probably more up-to-date than is the Melbourne office. It would appear to have been designed to supply the requirements of the public for the next half-century. I feel disposed to move a reduction of the item by £775. I think that £25 would be a proportionate expenditure for a post-office at Fimiston, in view of the postal facilities provided by other offices in the neighbourhood of that place. I see that £13,000 is set down for the purchase of sites. I should like to know where these sites are to be purchased. The amount proposed to be voted is a very large amount, and we should remember that after all Western Australia is only a minor State by comparison with New South Wales and Victoria, and there is a great disparity in the sums proposed to be spent in these States. It appears to me that, by comparison with the votes proposed for works and buildings in the other States, those proposed for similar works in Western Australia are unduly large. We must keep a watchful eye on all proposals for expenditure, and not vote for items unless we see a justification for so doing. I shall be glad to get information from the Minister of Home Affairs as to where these sites are situated, and what they are required for.

Mr. WATKINS (Newcastle).—I have no sympathy with the first part of the speech of the honorable member for Lang, and I think that I can speak as impartially of Western Australian affairs as he can. When he talks of Boulder City being within a mile of Kalgoorlie, it is evident that he did not pay much attention to distances when in Western Australia.

Mr. MAHON.—What is the distance?

Mr. WATKINS.—So far as I could learn, it is about three miles by tram.

Mr. MAHON.—But to Fimiston?

Mr. WATKINS.—It is about two and a half miles to the place which, I believe, is known as the Boulder Block. How would the honorable member for Lang like the Department to close down all the post-offices in his district, so that his constituents would have to travel to the General Post-office by tram—a similar distance, though in summer time the climate would not be so trying?

Mr. JOHNSON. — There is some difference between the population of the two places.

Mr. WATKINS.—In Kalgoorlie and the neighbourhood there must be 40,000 people, and I have been told that the proposed post-office will serve at least 10,000 people.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But there is a post-office there now.

Mr. GROOM. — The Department pays £104 a year rent for the present post-office, and the building is very unsatisfactory.

Mr. WATKINS.—As the interest on the cost of the proposed new building would be only about £30 a year, it is cheaper to erect a building of our own than to continue to rent one. The honorable member for Lang was on firmer ground when he asked for information in regard to the proposed vote for the purchase of sites. The sum seems a large one, and we ought to be informed why so much more is being voted for one State than for any of the other States.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton). — The point just referred to by the honorable member for Newcastle also struck me. The proposed votes for new works for New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia are approximately proportionate to the population of those States; but the proposed vote for Western Australia is much larger than that for even the larger States.

Mr. McCAY.—More than one-fourth of the total vote is for Western Australia.

Mr. MAHON.—A large part is made up of revotes. Newly-settled States naturally require a greater expenditure in proportion to population than do the older States.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I understand that, and I do not cavil at the expenditure, because I think that in a few years the matter will right itself. At the same time, Western Australian representatives have no reason to consider that their State has been overlooked. While the other States of the Commonwealth have had to pay for their own post-offices, the expense of providing Western Australia with new post-offices is to be borne by all the States. I did not raise any objection to this arrangement in connexion with Defence, because the whole Commonwealth is concerned in the defence of any part of Australia; but when advantages are being given to Western Australia in connexion with the construction of post-offices which the other States do not receive, the members of that State should not complain of neglect.

Mr. WATKINS.—A very good post-office is being provided for Cairns.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I leave the honorable member for Herbert to deal with that matter. The postal accommodation at Cairns is not commensurate with the importance of the town and surrounding district. The proposed expenditure of £800 on a post-office for an important centre like Fimiston is not exorbitant; on the contrary, it is good business to save something over £60 a year in interest, and have a property of our own, instead of continuing to rent private property. I hope, however, that in the discussion of these Estimates we shall all be actuated by higher motives than mere personal animus against the representative of any district.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella). — I have no quarrel with the fact that these Works Estimates provide for a much greater expenditure in Western Australia than that State would be entitled to on the basis of her contributions, because the policy that new works should be charged on a population basis was deliberately adopted by Parliament a year or two ago. The adoption of that policy was, I take it, the first step towards the uniform charging of Commonwealth expenditure on a population basis, but under it the more newly-settled States have the incidental advantage of receiving contributions for their public works from the people of the older States, while the people of the older States suffer a consequent disadvantage. I wish for information about items 6 and 9. I gather that the Fremantle Post-office is to cost £20,000 for land and buildings. I do not at the moment remember what the population of Fremantle is.

Mr. GROOM.—About 25,000.

Mr. MAHON.—Fremantle is the gateway of Australia.

Mr. McCAY.—The post-office is not one of the portals of the gate. If the trans-continental railway were made, and Australian mails were transhipped and made up at the Fremantle Post-office, there might be some reason for providing special accommodation there; but no city of 25,000 inhabitants should require a post-office costing £20,000, unless under very exceptional circumstances.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Land always costs a lot of money.

Mr. McCAY.—I am aware that land in Fremantle is very expensive. It would be difficult to find any land in London valued at a higher price than that attached to some allotments in Fremantle. Judging from my experience, the land values there are highly inflated and entirely fictitious.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think so.

Mr. McCAY.—It is usually unwise to prophesy, but I venture to predict that land values in Fremantle and Perth will, before very long, become much reduced. An enormous number of estates have been subdivided, and the subdivisions are not being sold, and, judging from the experience through which we have passed in Melbourne, there will be a heavy drop in values very shortly. Many persons who bought land in Melbourne twelve years ago would now be glad to accept an amount equivalent to half-a-crown for every £1 they have paid. The land boom in Perth has reached its highest point, but the ebb will come along a little later. I do not know what character of building it is proposed to erect at Fremantle, but it must be of a very substantial character. Even if land in Fremantle were worth £18,000 per acre, neither an acre, nor even half-an-acre would be required as a site for a post-office. I see that £13,000 is provided for the purchase of sites for post-offices, and I should like to know whether any large purchase is included in that amount.

Mr. GROOM.—The only large purchase for which provision is made in that amount is the site for the Fremantle post-office. The balance is intended to meet requirements that may arise in the future.

Mr. McCAY.—In that case, the Estimates are somewhat misleading as against the Government. I naturally concluded that the £20,000 proposed to be appropriated for the Fremantle post-office, was quite exclusive of item 9. The Minister's explanation presents the matter in a somewhat more satisfactory light. I trust that in purchasing the site the Minister of Home Affairs will recognise that there are property-owners in Fremantle who entertain the same sanguine ideas as to values as does the Treasurer.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The land is to be resumed under the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Act.

Mr. McCAY.—Then the Government will probably not pay more than twice as much as the land is worth.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—In view of the fact that the whole Commonwealth will have to pay for the proposed sites for post-offices, the Minister seems to have been particularly generous to Western Australia. £2,675 is proposed to be appropriated for the purchase of sites in New South Wales, and £100 for the purchase of sites in Queensland, whilst £13,000 is allocated to Western Australia. No money is set aside for expenditure in the same direction in Victoria or Tasmania. I should like to know why no provision has been made for the purchase of a site for a new post-office at Drysdale.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am obtaining a report on the subject.

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not suggest that the Postmaster-General has been over-generous to his own State, but I would point out that provision is made for the erection of eight new post-offices in New South Wales—which, unlike Western Australia, cannot be regarded as a new State—that Western Australia is to have four new post-offices, Queensland two, and Victoria only three. I understand that the Minister promises that provision will be made for the purchase of a site for a new post-office at Drysdale.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why does the honorable and learned member presume that?

Mr. CROUCH.—My representations to the Minister do not appear to have any weight, and it seems that nothing has any influence upon him except a deputation. If the Minister wishes to have his time occupied in receiving deputations, I can promise to bring a number of my constituents before him every day.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There is not the slightest necessity for that, because the honorable and learned member's representations are quite sufficient. I am looking into the whole matter.

Mr. CROUCH.—Drysdale, which is very much older than a number of these towns which are of mushroom growth, does not yet possess a post-office, and I think that a modest amount should be placed on the Estimates for the purpose of providing it with one.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—Concerning the item which has been mentioned by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, complaint is made that in view of the importance of Fimiston, and of the volume of business which is transacted there, the sum provided in the Estimates is not sufficient. On the other hand, it is contended that no money should be expended on the Fimiston post-office at all. As a matter of fact, inquiries have been made by various officials, who report that an expenditure of £800 is necessary to erect a post-office at that place, and would be adequate for that purpose. A considerable business is transacted at that important centre, where we are at present paying a rental of £2 per week for post-office accommodation.

Mr. FRAZER.—The amount provided will only be sufficient to permit of the erection of an iron building.

Mr. GROOM.—In regard to that matter the honorable member has made very strong representations, which will receive attention at the hands of the Government.

Mr. FRAZER.—Will the Minister admit that an expenditure of £800 will be merely sufficient to provide for the erection of a wood and iron building?

Mr. GROOM.—I understand that that is so.

Mr. MAHON.—There is very good building stone in the locality.

Mr. GROOM.—I will promise the honorable member that I will look into the matter. Of course, nothing can be done without the authority of Parliament. The honorable member for Lang and the honorable and learned member for Corinella may rest assured that it is not the intention of the Department to expend more than is necessary in the acquisition of sites and the erection of the requisite buildings. In the case of Fremantle, however, it is absolutely necessary that postal accommodation should be provided at the earliest possible moment. The money for this purpose was passed in last year's Estimates. A site came up for consideration, and was practically approved, but its acquisition was not proceeded with. Action is now being taken to define the particular area required, and the necessary steps for its acquisition will follow. At the present time a little difficulty is being experienced in obtaining the requisite site, but I do not need to trouble honorable members with the history of that matter.

Mr. McCAY.—I suppose that the owner wants too much.

Mr. GROOM.—As a matter of fact, the owner does not desire to get rid of his property at all. That is a fair indication of his opinion of land values in the West. Of course, it is possible that these values may decline, but all that we have to pay regard to at the present moment is the fact that it is necessary for us to acquire a site and to erect a building upon it. In the case of Western Australia, too, we must recollect that we are dealing with a State which is carrying out large development works. It is a significant fact that each quarter its population returns show a considerable advance. A great portion of that population is an adult one, which means that new centres are constantly being opened up. As towns are formed and new settlements are established, the officers of the Department, looking to the needs of the future, recommend the acquisition of sites. I can assure honorable members that the sums which appear on the Estimates in this connexion are only such as are required to meet the requirements of the future.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I wish to indorse the statement of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie that the provision which has been made in these Estimates for the erection of a post-office at Fimiston is insufficient. The sum of £800 is not adequate to erect a post-office in Kalgoorlie, where, on account of the climate and the dense population, there should be a building of a substantial character. Seeing that there is good stone to be had in the vicinity, and that the permanence of the Kalgoorlie field is undoubted, I think that a stable structure should be erected. I understand that the mining companies have given the surface of the land—which is very valuable—free of charge. The honorable member for Lang has argued that the proximity of Kalgoorlie and the Boulder to Fimiston renders a post-office at the last-named place more or less unnecessary. I quite agree that the distances from Fimiston to each of these centres are not so great as have been stated. From Fimiston to Boulder the distance is about a mile, and to Kalgoorlie is under two miles. At any rate, there is rapid means of communication between these places. There is no doubt that a good deal of the postal and telegraphic business of that belt of country will now be concentrated in Kalgoorlie. I understand that the Department proposes to make Kalgoorlie the repeating station instead of Coolgardie, and to transfer some twenty or thirty operators to the former town. That proposal has been before the Department for the past eighteen months.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That will be an injustice to Coolgardie.

Mr. MAHON.—Unfortunately, it seems to be unavoidable. In that event the accommodation provided at the Kalgoorlie post-office, which, even at present, is not more than sufficient, will be practically exhausted. That being so, I believe that it is necessary, in order to relieve the congestion of business at Kalgoorlie, to provide increased postal facilities for the people of Fimiston and the surrounding localities. If the Government are to be guided by the statements of those who, knowing very little about the gold-fields of Western Australia, assert that they are evanescent, and likely soon to disappear from the map, the outlook for the western State is not encouraging. But I can only say that if there be a permanent gold-field in Australia, we believe it to be that of Kalgoorlie. I forget for the moment the depth of the Boulder mine—

Mr. FRAZER.—Two thousand feet.

Mr. McCAY.—Bendigo has been going to disappear for the last forty years.

Mr. MAHON.—The same dismal prognostications have been made in regard to Ballarat, and yet both cities continue to make solid progress. The history of Kalgoorlie will probably be the same. Until recently the developments have all taken place at the southern end of the Golden Mile, but a valuable discovery has now been made at the northern end, where a great many people said that no gold, except that found on the surface by Hannan, existed, and I believe that a very valuable mine is now being opened up. We may regard Kalgoorlie as one of the permanent gold-fields of Australia, and it is therefore the duty of the Department in erecting buildings there to have regard to the questions of permanence and durability, and to see that the convenience of the staff is studied. There is no doubt that officers called upon to work in iron buildings in that climate cannot satisfactorily perform their duties. Unfortunately, I had the experience of working for several years under such conditions, and I am able to say that the tax which they impose upon one's powers of endurance is extreme. If we expect our public officers to render good service we should provide them with reasonable accommodation. There are one or two other items to which I desire to refer. In the Estimates for 1904-5 a sum of £1,500 was appropriated for the erection of a post-office at Fitzroy—a station in my electorate—but in the Estimates now before us that amount has been reduced to £1,100. I understand that the reason given for the proposed expenditure of this large sum in a remote locality—where the population is scattered, and the revenue from the postal service small—is that there is a repeating station at Fitzroy, and that a number of men employed in maintaining the overland telegraph line are housed there. I would point out to the Minister, however, that it is desirable that he should scrutinize the estimates from time to time submitted to him. When I was administering the Department I discovered that the estimates for this work included the cost of conveying timber from Fremantle, although I subsequently ascertained that there was an ample supply of suitable timber in the neighbourhood.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is it not proposed to shift the post-office to the other side of the river?

Mr. MAHON.—That is another matter, in regard to which I desire an explanation. I have had a protest from a station-owner in the vicinity, who contends that the office should not be removed; but, as I have not been in the district, I have not the personal knowledge necessary to enable me to determine whether his protest is justifiable.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have been near there, and have no doubt that if the post-office were on the other side it would be more convenient for Derby.

Mr. MAHON.—The Department should be able to furnish a reason for the proposal to change the site.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is the reason.

Mr. MAHON.—I have entered my protest on several occasions, but all that I have been able to ascertain from the Department is that the post-office is to be shifted. With regard to the outcry as to the large sums placed on the Estimates for the purchase of sites in Western Australia, as compared with the proposed votes for similar purposes in other States, honorable members must not forget that Western Australia is but a young State, and that her wants, as a rapidly developing country, annually receiving a large access of population, are necessarily greater than are those of other States. I am pleased to observe that some honorable members have not overlooked this point, but I would impress upon the Committee that any comparison of the expenditure of the Commonwealth in Western Australia, with that in other States, must necessarily be very unfair. I think it will be found that the Department is acting wisely in acquiring, at Fremantle, the site which has received the approval of the municipality and of most of the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Of most of the representatives of the people.

Mr. MAHON.—With the exception of the Chamber of Commerce, I believe that all the representative institutions of Fremantle approve of the site in question. I have nothing to say against the Chamber of Commerce, but I do not think it represents more than a very small minority of the people of Fremantle. The local municipality favored the site which has been selected, and other public bodies have also done so. The site being in the main street, is necessarily a costly one, but I do not agree with the honorable and learned member for Corinella that, just as was the case in some of the other States a few years ago, land values in Western Australia at the present time are probably fictitious. He has overlooked the fact that Victoria was not progressing when its land values were fictitious.

Mr. MCCAY.—It was progressing, but not as rapidly as is Western Australia.

Mr. MAHON.—It was not receiving the accession of population that Western Australia is securing.

Mr. MCCAY.—It was receiving a very fair accession of population.

Mr. MAHON.—I am speaking of the period—I daresay it is the one to which the honorable and learned member referred—from 1888 to 1891, when undoubtedly land was at a fictitious value. I am not going into ancient history to find out the causes, but certainly there was nothing in the condition of Victoria at the time to warrant the extravagant prices which were paid for land. In Western Australia we had yearly a large number of new colonies and necessarily their demands increased the price of land. The parallel drawn by the honorable and learned member is scarcely fair to Western Australia. I think he will find that, although the price of suburban lands may not be maintained for business purposes will command a very high value in the portions of Perth and Fremantle.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I was present when the Minister made his statement with regard to the item of £20,000 for the Fremantle Post Office. According to a footnote the total estimated cost of land and building is £20,000; and the expenditure is, I consider, out of proportion to the business likely to be done. In other cases it has been proved that the estimated cost of new buildings is too high. The Minister might look more fully into this case, and see if the estimate could not be brought down considerably.

Mr. GROOM.—I promise to do so.

Mr. TUDOR.—I do not intend to vote against the item, as it is a certain item either next year or later on we shall be asked to vote the balance of it. Last year I protested against the item of charging the expenditure of the works on a per capita basis; but I was assured by the late Treasurer that it was adopted on the advice of the Crown officers, and that it could not be got out from.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is as long as it is long, because the transferred liabilities will have to be paid for afterwards.

Mr. TUDOR.—It is not; because the estimates have not yet reached that stage. I am objecting to the submission of these estimates, because the representative of the State seems to consider that he has no right to support any proposal to expend public money therein. I am speaking impartially on the subject. I was the first to object to the extension of the General Post Office in Melbourne, and to the item for the erection of a new post-office at Warrnambool. I trust that the Minister will take notice of the estimates for new buildings, and will not go in for new buildings, such as some of us received in the other States. It was quite open to me to see the magnificence of the buildings which had been erected particularly in Queensland. The says that the per capita payment is as broad as it is long; but I think that the States which have not borrowed large sums for the purpose of erecting public buildings will have to pay in the future for the extravagance of those States which have not adopted that policy.

Mr. CAMERON.—It is grossly unfair.

Mr. TUDOR.—It is grossly unfair to the latter, and I trust that the Committee will not sanction the erection of large buildings merely for the purpose of expending large sums of public money.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey). — I wish to enter another protest against the system of charging this expenditure on a per capita basis. Of course we are all delighted to hear of the great influx of population to Western Australia. As population means wealth, one would think that the State would be willing to bear the cost of its public buildings. When I interjected about the increase of population in Western Australia, I was twitted that the new colonists had come from South Australia. It is not much consolation to the Government of that State to have to tell the persons who have remained that they must carry on its development for the benefit of those who have left. I am not referring to a particular item on these Estimates. If there is to be a funding of the expenditure, it should be accompanied by a funding of the receipts, so as to establish a system on sound Federal lines. I do not know who introduced this method, but I predict that before long it will be declared to be the most rotten arrangement that has ever been introduced. It must lead in every direction to extravagant expenditure. What advantage is it to the representatives of a State to keep down the expenditure on public works therein if it is to be debited with a proportion of the expenditure on public works in other States? I feel quite confident that eventually Parliament will have to consider the question of pooling the revenue as well as the expenditure. Until that time arrives, however, each State ought to be responsible for the expenditure on public works therein.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle). — In the debate on last year's Budget the question of debiting the cost of public works against the States on a per capita basis was discussed. But honorable members did not seem to fully realize what had been done. So far from indorsing the remarks of the honorable member for Grey,

I think that the new system is not likely to make for extravagance. The discussion on these Estimates this morning has furnished direct evidence to the contrary.

Mr. POYNTON.—And not a penny has been saved.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is a tribute to the economy of the Estimates which have been submitted. So long as each State had to bear the expenditure on public works therein, the representatives of other States were not very much concerned about cutting down the items for a State. If the representatives of a State could induce the Government to place on the Estimates large sums for public works for the State, what did it matter to the representatives of other States how much money was voted? Naturally they said, "As the people of this State will have to bear the expenditure, let the money be voted." Under the new system, however, the representatives of each State are interested in the amounts which are placed on the Estimates for this purpose. I do not think there is any ground to fear that it will lead to additional extravagance. On the contrary, I believe that its tendency will be to cause honorable members to be keener critics of proposed expenditure.

Mr. POYNTON.—It will make honorable members keener to get sums placed on the Estimates for their own electorates.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella has done a service to the Committee in pointing out the misleading character of the footnote, which would lead honorable members to conclude that in addition to the amount set forth, a larger sum was to be expended. It is quite correct, as he pointed out, that the principal portion of the sum named in item 9 will be for the purchase of the Fremantle site. I hardly know whether or not to regret that land values are so high in Fremantle. The buyer always regrets a rise in land values; the seller never. But it has been a matter of regret to me that although this vote was agreed to last year, the efforts made from then until a few days ago to obtain land at a reasonable price did not succeed. That is the reason why the vote has to be submitted to the Committee again. Neither this Government nor its predecessor can be charged with having come to a conclusion hastily. Every offer has been carefully considered, and some which ought to have been more reasonable have had to be rejected. I believe the Government has chosen a site which will suit the convenience of the great majority of the people of Fremantle, and I trust that no delay will take place in the construction of the work. As to the character of the building, I have never been an advocate of extravagant expenditure, but I do not wish to see ramshackle structures erected in the centre of any large and growing town. I like the buildings owned by the Commonwealth to bear comparison with other buildings. I feel somewhat ashamed if I see an iron structure, pointed out as a Commonwealth building, in a town of importance. When the present Fremantle post-office was built, it was not foreseen, even by the Treasurer, then Premier of Western Australia, that in the near future the town would grow to such an extent as it has done. The expansion has taken place in a direction which was not expected; and what was then the centre of Fremantle, is now practically at one end of the town, and is, indeed, in a somewhat out of the way corner. For some time past it has been necessary to rent a portion of the Town Hall in which to transact some of the postal business, which in consequence has been done in two separate parts of the town. The erection of the new building will enable the Department to bring the two branches together in one centre, and will make for economic working. There is a great rush at the post-office during the short period when the mail-boats are at the wharfs. It is, therefore, necessary to afford every facility so that the people who come to Australia shall not go away with the impression that we cannot provide for the postal business that has to be done. I am glad to find that no objection has been raised to the expenditure of this apparently large sum, because it is recognised by honorable members that the vote is justifiable on account of the growth of a young State, which occupies a position different from that of any other State in the Commonwealth.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—I judge from what previous speakers have said that much dissatisfaction exists at the proposal to erect a post-office and various other buildings in Western Australia, at the expense of the other States. Speaking for Tasmania, it seems to me to be grossly unfair that a small poor State should be compelled to assist the more prosperous States in reference to expenditure. We have been told that a true Federal spirit is to prevail, and that we are to share other's burdens. Tasmania has been helping to carry hers. Unless the capita basis is to apply to revenue as to expenditure, it is grossly unfair. I have no knowledge as to the necessity of the post-office at Fremantle, and am not prepared to believe that it should be erected. But it should be erected at the expense of Western Australia. I propose to put the feeling of the Committee as to whether the per capita basis is to be continued, and moving a reduction of the vote.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member will not secure his object by that now; because some honorable member may agree with him as to the principle, but may desire that this vote shall be paid.

Mr. CAMERON.—Then I shall move it at a later stage. I wish to know whether the Federal spirit is to prevail, and whether we are going to share each other's burdens. Whether one or two States are to be added, owing to the fact that the Treasurer of Western Australia is a representative.

Mr. GROOM.—These Estimates were framed by the present Treasurer.

Mr. CAMERON.—I do not know who framed them, but I know that the Treasurer is responsible for them.

Mr. GROOM.—That was not the honorable member's suggestion.

Mr. CAMERON.—If the principle is laid down is that all the States are to share alike in revenue and expenditure, I am quite prepared to accept the principle, but if the idea is that one State shall have advantages for which the other States are to pay, as, for instance, in the case of the sugar bonus, I do not feel inclined to accept it.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I understand that in some cases where it is proposed to build post-offices in Western Australia it is necessary to purchase land, and that this land is being charged at extremely high prices. Care should be taken to obtain land necessary for these purposes at a fair price; but I have heard it whispered that the Government of Western Australia are asking what is beyond the value of the areas which the Commonwealth desire to purchase.

Mr. MAHON.—In some cases the land does not want to sell.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I understand that it is desired to purchase some State land. I realize that the private owner g he can get, and he is a person with whom it is at times difficult to deal. We should take care, however, that in the case of State lands the Commonwealth is not "got at." The Treasurer, who is one of the representatives for Western Australia, believes in his own State, and the right honorable gentleman doubtless desires to obtain all the advantages he can for the State; and we cannot blame him if he is allowed to do so. But we are here to guard the interests of the States as a whole. It has been pointed out that these Estimates were drawn up by the previous Government; but, for all that, it is quite possible that the influence of the right honorable gentleman was brought to bear. Under our present plan, it is difficult to control expenditure of the kind, and it seems to me that, along with the Estimates, there ought to be supplied the particulars of such matters as we are now discussing, so that honorable members might have before them accurate information of how money was to be spent in, not one, but all of the States, particularly in reference to buildings so far from the centres. The Treasurer smiles when I refer to the whisper about that State Government asking high prices for land; but we know that, so far as the right honorable gentleman is concerned, the other States are not likely to get the best of the argument when the interests of Western Australia are in question. Consequently, when the Treasurer is behind anything of this kind, it makes us suspicious, and causes us to look into the matter in order to ascertain whether everything is just and right.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—I shall at a later stage move a reduction of a vote by £1, in order to test the feeling of the Committee as to whether in future new works shall be charged to the Commonwealth as a whole on a per capita basis, or whether the States in which the buildings are erected shall bear the costs.

Proposed vote agreed to.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Division 4 (Telegraphs and Telephones), £169,150.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—There is an item here of £12,000 for the construction and extension of telephone lines, instruments, and material, in New South Wales. This is a work in which the needs of the States have to be considered, but I cannot help drawing the attention of the Committee to the fact that, whilst in New South Wales the expenditure on this score is £12,000, the amount set down for Victoria is £25,000, for Queensland £15,000, for South Australia £10,000, for Western Australia £17,000, and for Tasmania £3,000. Such large differences require, I think, some explanation. Next to the provision of post-offices, the extension of the telephone system is very important. This is one of the means by which isolated districts are brought into closer contact with the centres of civilization, and are thus enabled to carry on pioneering work with greater advantage. In New South Wales in the past, one of the great difficulties has been to get the Post and Telegraph Department to realize the importance of extending this means of communication. Numbers of little centres have sprung up all over the State, and these have for some time been asking for telephone extension. The requests, however, have been refused on the ground that the time is not opportune, the excuse, amongst others, being given by the Department that the anticipated revenue will not cover the cost. In this connexion there is always this difficulty to contend with: The cost of a proposed telephonic or telegraphic extension is estimated at the maximum, whilst the revenue to be derived from it is estimated at a minimum. The officers of the Department naturally wish to be on the safe side. They do not desire that their estimate of the cost of an extension shall be exceeded, and, on the other hand, they do not wish to supply the Department with an estimate of revenue that is not likely to be realized. Very often the mean, therefore, lies between the two extremes of a high estimate of the cost of construction, and a low estimate of revenue. When an agreement is arrived at, and the Department sees its way to approve of a certain extension, there are often considerable delays in carrying it out, which are attributed to the fact that the Department has no money at its disposal, and must await a vote for the purpose. I believe that the late Administration was largely redeemed from barrenness by the active and up-to-date way in which the late Postmaster-General dealt with these matters. The honorable gentleman had a virgin field for his operations in this direction, as his predecessors were contented to allow matters to run in the old groove, and to consider the difficulties of proposed extensions without at the same time considering their advantages. As a consequence of that policy there was a very great deal of friction and dissatisfaction throughout New South Wales, but the action of the late Postmaster-General has largely helped to remove it. The honorable gentleman introduced the system of condenser telephones, making use of telegraphic extensions to establish telephonic communication. Before his retirement from office, he approved of a number of centres connected by telegraphic communication being brought under the condenser system of telephonic communication. This approval was given in respect of a number of centres in my own district; but so far nothing has been done to carry out the work. I have had no official explanation of the delay that has occurred, although I have addressed several communications on the subject to the Department. I am unofficially informed that it is due to the fact that the Department has not the necessary instruments and material to carry out this important work, and is awaiting a vote for the purpose. I presume that these instruments and material will be supplied from the vote under consideration at the present time. The present Postmaster-General has a practical knowledge of these matters as they affect New South Wales, and I presume that the condition of things in the other States is similar, and they would be similarly benefited by the adoption of an enlightened policy in this respect. I hope that the honorable gentleman will see that sufficient money is provided to carry on this important work. I do not know that £12,000, the amount proposed to be voted, will be sufficient for the purpose; but if it will not steps should be taken to provide a sufficient amount, so that before the end of the year we may not be met with the objection urged hitherto that there is not enough money available, and necessary work must, in consequence, stand over. I trust that this work will be carried on with the energy which was displayed by the late Postmaster-General, and that the useful policy that honorable gentleman inaugurated in this respect will be carried to completion.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—In answer to the honorable member, I may say that it is the intention of the present Government to pursue in this matter the policy laid down by my predecessor, and to afford every facility for the extension of the telephonic system in country districts. I shall give attention to the question which honorable member has brought under consideration, and endeavour, as far as possible, to carry out his wishes.

Mr. LONSDALE.—We should like an explanation of the difference between the amounts set down for Victoria and those of the other States.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am accounted for by the fact that the vote set down for Victoria covers other services, including the grounding of wires, which is dealt with by a separate vote in New South Wales. There is a proposed vote of £25,000 for this work in New South Wales, the same expenditure is included in the vote of £25,000 set down for Victoria. Honorable members will find, in the year's Estimates, that the Department has the money right through the year for the purpose, and I am assured by the Postmaster-General that he is responsible for the vote that sufficient provision is made for this year. If more is required, the Government will have the courage to do any necessary vote afterwards ask Parliament to increase the expenditure.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—In connexion with the extension of the telephonic system, a matter has been brought to my notice by a number of publicans in my electorate, and I believe they are occupied the attention of progressive townships and borough councils in other States. It is considered very desirable to reduce the cost of telephones in suburban and country districts should be reduced. Subscribers in country towns are called to pay £8 a year for a business telephonic system, and £5 a year for a private telephonic system. The same charges are made in the large towns where subscribers have the advantage of being able to communicate with a large number of other subscribers. In Maitland, for example, a telephonic subscriber is able to communicate with some sixty other subscribers, a somewhat of a hardship that the telephonic subscribers in country towns should pay exactly the same fees as subscribers in the larger cities, who are given a better service for more for their money. If the charges are reduced, the use of the telephonic system will become very much more popular in smaller centres, and the service will be better than it does at present. Honorable members are aware that, in connexion with the management of the telephonic system, where the fares have the traffic has been much an doubled, and the total returns en greater. I am pleased to find e present Postmaster-General ap- be following in the footsteps of his sor, and to be particularly anxious tate the work of his Department. I en informed that it has been the of the Department to supply coun- scribers with inferior telephones; en a subscriber is connected with the metropolitan exchanges, an instrument, which can be used e hand, is supplied, but that ers to the country exchanges o put up with inferior instru- requiring the use of two hands; the people of Newcastle have to with the discarded steam trams ere once used in Sydney. I have er subject to refer to. I see no reason why a rrier should not be appointed.

BROWN (Canobolas). — I agree e honorable member for Hunter that e fair that the large business place telephone is in use practically the day should pay only at the same the small trader in a country town, at the charge to subscribers to a exchange should not be as great as rge to subscribers to whom thou- f connexions are possible. I sug- the Minister that a considerable n in the telephone fees for country es would greatly popularize the e in country districts. Within rears a number of country towns have lephone exchanges installed, and individuals living 20 or 30 outside the town have in some in- been connected with the town ex-

This practice would, I think, if the heavy fees charged for such ns were not so big a handicap. present time the town of Parkes, is a very considerable business n my electorate, is considering the ility of having a telephone exchange d. There are a number of would- scribers in the town itself, but squat- rmers, and others living at a distance would also be glad to be connected with the exchange, so that they could communicate easily with business men and others in the town, if it were not for the very high rates which the Department charges for such services. Some difference should be made between the city rates and the rates charged to small country centres where the business done is nothing like so large. If, say, £5 per annum were charged, I think that exchanges would be established in a large number of country towns, and if outside subscribers are encouraged, I think the revenue from telephones will considerably increase.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I desire to support the contention of the honorable member for Canobolas. He referred more particularly to country exchanges, but I have in my mind the need for giving better facilities to thickly-populated districts just beyond the metropolitan radius, for which, where telephone bureaux are established, the call rate is 6d. It often happens that the person going to a bureau can get no response to his call, so that the money is lost, and most people are apt to think twice before risking a coin in that way. Of course, there are some whose means are sufficient to make them superior to such considerations, but the districts which I have in my mind are populated mostly by persons of small means, who ought to have telephonic facilities at a cheaper rate than that at which they now enjoy them. I hope that the Postmaster-General will inquire whether effect cannot be given to the motion passed last session in favour of altering the regulations, with a view to cheapening telephonic communication.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I agree with the honorable member for Lang that there should be some alteration in the rates; but I think that it should be by the adoption of the toll rate or flat system. According to those who have made a study of this question, the toll system is finding most favour in other parts of the world. I desire the Minister to furnish some information with regard to the £30,000 proposed to be spent on the construction of a trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne. I notice that the sum of £19,000 is debited to New South Wales, and that the Victorian share of the expenditure amounts to £11,000. Then I see that another sum of £4,000, which is debited to New South Wales, is to be devoted to work in connexion with the erection of trunk lines between Sydney and Melbourne. I should like to know whether the line is likely to pay, and whether an estimate has been made of the loss that will accrue to the Telegraph Department owing to the installation of the telephone system between the two capitals. Our object should be to make our Departments self-supporting, and at the same time to keep them up to date. I am quite aware that the telephone is largely superseding the telegraph, but we should proceed cautiously in constructing lines which would upset our present arrangements, and some definite information should be afforded on the subject. We know that if the proposed trunk line is constructed, we shall probably have to consider proposals for the provision of similar facilities between Melbourne and Adelaide, and possibly between Sydney and Brisbane, and we should keep these possibilities in view.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I desire to impress upon the Postmaster-General the importance of doing everything he possibly can to extend telephone facilities to residents in the more remote country towns. I heartily congratulate the late Postmaster-General on the energy he displayed in extending these services, the value of which his experience enables him to highly appreciate. I do not wish to commend the honorable member for Macquarie at the expense of other administrators of the Post and Telegraph Department, but, even though his predecessors may have paved the way to some extent for what was accomplished by him, we should not withhold our approval of his action. Although much has been done in the direction I have indicated, still more remains to be accomplished, and I think the aim of the Postmaster-General should be to extend to residents in the country districts the same conveniences that are enjoyed by inhabitants of the larger and more important centres of population. At present it seems to be the rule of the Department not to construct telephone lines unless the officials are assured that they will prove payable from the outset. But I think that in a country like this it is desirable that we should strain a point in favour of those who are settled on the land, whom it should be our desire to assist in every possible way. In many cases the Post and Telegraph officials have held the view that certain lines would not pay, but the results have proved much more satisfactory than they anticipated. I am sure that I need not impress upon the Postmaster-General the necessity of continuing the good work performed by his predecessor, and I confidently leave the matter in his hands.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I should like the Postmaster-General to give us some explanation with regard to the item of £1,000 towards the purchase of telephone lines held by subscribers under the purchase system, as a vote for this purpose is only required for New South Wales. I think that the Minister should explain why this expenditure is proposed to be incurred.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—With regard to the question of telephone rates, I desire to inform honorable members that regulations are now being framed, under which it is intended to reduce the cost of the telephone service in connexion with some of the smaller lines. Later on I hope to be able to submit a general scheme of uniform rates for each State. At present the rates are much higher in some States than in others, and we hope to be able to bring about conditions which will at least make some closer approach to uniformity. We intend to reduce the cost of the telephone service as far as possible, particularly in the case of the smaller centres.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Has the Minister decided to adopt call rates?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I think honorable members had better wait until the regulations are completed. With regard to the matter mentioned by the honorable member for Yarra, my predecessor inquired very carefully into the proposal for the construction of the trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney, and I hold in my hand a long report on the subject, the concluding paragraph of which reads as follows:—

Estimates have been obtained which indicated, in the opinion of the late Postmaster-General, that the revenue that would be derived from conversations over the line would, at the outset, exceed 10 per cent. on the cost of construction. It was also pointed out that the copper wires which would be used for the line would, if required, be available for telegraphic purposes.

Mr. MAHON.—By whom were the estimates prepared?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—By the responsible officers of the Department. It is proposed to charge 6s. for the use of the line for three minutes.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Can the Minister tell us what loss is likely to be incurred so far as the telegraph lines are concerned?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I cannot give any specific information on that point at present. As a rule, however, the estimates of revenue furnished by the officials are found to be rather below than above the actual result, particularly in connexion with telephone services. A large amount of quite unexpected business generally has to be provided for, because persons who avail themselves of the service and appreciate its benefits relate their experiences to their friends, who are induced to also avail themselves of the opportunities offered.

Mr. MAHON.—For how long does the Minister suppose that he will be able to charge the rate of 6s. for three minutes' use of the telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is a matter for the experts to determine; but I think business men would only be too ready to pay that charge at the present time. I should not be at all surprised if the revenue derived from this source proves to be in excess of the estimate. In the matter of the use of old telephone instruments in New South Wales, I desire to say that that State does not suffer so much hardship as do some of the other States. We are endeavouring to provide better instruments as opportunity offers. That is to say, as we obtain better instruments we are substituting them for the old ones. The honorable member for Gwydir has referred to the refusal of the Post and Telegraph authorities to construct telephone lines in localities where they will not pay. In this connexion it must be recollected that the Department is supposed to be worked upon commercial lines. If our officers report not only that a line will not pay, but that it is never likely to pay, we have to proceed with extreme caution. At the same time, I admit that, in order to convenience the public, we should be prepared to take certain risks, particularly in the outlying portions of the country, because, as settlement progresses, we are bound to obtain an increased revenue. As regards the question of providing a letter-carrier at Kurri Kurri, I merely wish to remark that that is a new township, and the honorable member for Hunter may rest assured that his representations will receive every consideration. As the sum of £30,000 or £40,000 has already been advanced by the Treasurer to enable certain of these works to be proceeded with I am very anxious that the Committee should pass the Estimates relating to them this afternoon. When the Estimates in chief are under consideration I shall be glad to supply honorable members with any further information which they may desire.

Mr. PAGE.—Surely the trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney has not yet been started?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moira).—I have no desire to delay the Committee in coming to a decision on these Estimates. The Postmaster-General has declared that the Department must exercise caution in sanctioning the construction of lines which are not likely to prove immediately remunerative. I should like to know whether that caution on the part of the authorities is carried to the extreme of refusing to answer letters which are addressed to them on these subjects, because that has been the experience in some instances. As far as I am concerned—apart from the proposed expenditure on the trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney—these Estimates contain nothing of a controversial character. On that question, however, I propose to divide the Committee, and therefore I suggest to the Postmaster-General that the consideration of that item should be postponed. I also desire to ascertain whether we are committed to any expenditure in connexion with the proposed trunk line to which I have referred.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—As Postmaster-General in the late Government, I accept responsibility for having recommended the construction of the proposed telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member has no responsibility, save as a private member of the House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But in my capacity as Postmaster-General I had an opportunity of looking into this matter very carefully.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am prepared to postpone the consideration of the item in question.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—I wish to know whether the proposed expenditure for the construction of new telephone lines will be limited to those which are specifically determined upon now?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Certainly not.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Will there be any reserve fund out of which lines that may be asked for during the current year can be constructed?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Certainly.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I think it would be well if the large sum of money proposed to be expended on the trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney were devoted to the extension of postal conveniences to country districts. I agree with the honorable member for Gwydir that if we wish to encourage the settlement of people on the land we must make the conveniences of civilization as accessible to them as possible. In order to accomplish that end we should be prepared to make some sacrifices. Even if certain telephone lines do not immediately return interest on their capital cost in addition to working expenses, I do not think that the loss so incurred represents a waste of public money.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—In answer to the observations of the honorable member for Brisbane, I would point out that, under the old system which obtains in New South Wales, some people own their own telephone instruments. These we are gradually purchasing. In reply to the honorable member for Moira, I wish to say that no expenditure has been incurred in connexion with the trunk telephone line to which he alluded.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—In connexion with the construction and extension of telephone lines, instruments, and material, I wish to know why—although only £20,000 was appropriated for that purpose last year—the sum of £22,459 was expended?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—The expenditure under this head for the year 1904-5 was £22,459, or £2,459 in excess of the appropriation. The amount now provided, £25,000, will be required to permit of necessary extensions of the telephone system; the establishment of new telephone exchanges, the purchase of Ericsson instruments, cable, &c., and also to cover the cost of labour, cartage, and requisite material. I presume that the other expenditure was carried out by way of transfer.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I think that the system under which more money is spent than is actually appropriated for a specific purpose is a bad one.

Mr. CROUCH.—It happens constantly.

Mr. TUDOR.—There are only three or four items in these Estimates in which that course has been followed.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member will find scores of instances in the Estimates.

Mr. TUDOR.—I am prepared to let the item to pass on the understanding that no money will be expended that has actually been passed for payment.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—I would like to obtain some information from the Postmaster-General in reference to the estimates relating to the construction and extension of telegraph lines. There are two lines in my electorate to which I am particularly interested. Application has been made on several occasions for the construction of one of these—a line from the Hills to Irvinebank—in which a telegraph company is particularly interested. I believe that on more than one occasion the company has proffered to pay a proportion of the expense of erecting the line, which would extend over a distance of 15 miles, but that for some reason the Department has failed to proceed with it. Judging by a communication I have received the work has been under consideration for some time, and I am anxious to have some explanation of the reason for the delay. The other line to which I desire to refer is a line between Herberton and Atherton, a distance of about 12 miles, and which would connect two fairly large and important centres—the one being an agricultural district, the other a mining district. I am very pleased to hear what the Postmaster-General has to say in regard to these lines.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—The reports so far received have not been favorable to the construction of these lines in question; but further negotiations having been made, the Postmaster-General at Brisbane has been requested to furnish an additional report. If that report be favorable, the Department will have the funds to construct the lines; but until such a report is received I cannot say that the work will be carried out. I promise the honorable member that I shall look into the matter, and report on it in the light of the fresh information we are seeking to obtain.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—The division 4 includes the item—

amount was voted last year, and I like to know what is to be done, Adelaide office is very well equipped, conducted on economical lines. I stand that it is intended to give the committee another opportunity to discuss matter, but I think it would be well to leave the whole subdivision.

AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Mo—Postmaster-General).—I trust that honorable member will not press his proposal. The honorable member for South Australia has asked for an opportunity to make a proposal to omit this item, and I promised that it shall be afforded at a later stage. I shall then be able to leave the honorable member for Coolgardie the information that he desires.

CULPIN (Brisbane).—This item seems to involve the transfer to South Australia of certain work now being carried on in Brisbane. Apparently, the intention is to print postage stamps required for Queensland henceforth be printed in Adelaide, and I fail to see why we should allow this item to pass without offering a strong protest. I hope that the subdivision will be postponed.

AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Mo—Postmaster-General).—This item, inasmuch as it does the printing of postage stamps, has given rise to a good deal of discussion, and honorable members have asked to be supplied with further information as to the intention of the Department. This will be another opportunity to discuss the proposal, and honorable members will be afforded the fullest information on the subject. The printing of stamps is now being carried on in several printing offices, but the work is to be consolidated. The printing of stamps is very similar to the printing of bank notes, and needs to be carefully supervised. At present we have only one Commonwealth printing establishment, and that is in South Australia.

In all the other States our printing is carried out by the Government Printing Offices of those States. I ask honorable members, in the light of this explanation and in view of the promise I have made, not to oppose the passing of the subdivision.

PAGE (Maranoa).—In view of the explanation given by the Minister I shall not oppose the passing of the subdivision, although it certainly relates to a matter of great importance to the States of Queensland, Victoria, and New South Wales, which have their own printing establishments, and print their own stamps. Tasmania and Western Australia have had their stamps printed in the other States; but if the proposition is that all stamps required for the Commonwealth shall be printed in South Australia, I shall have something to say with regard to it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—The proposal is that all our stamps shall be printed in the one State. Honorable members must realize that the Commonwealth derives a very large revenue from the sale of stamps, and that it is necessary that we should exercise great care to prevent any improper manipulation or forgery in connexion with the work of printing them. At the right time, I shall be very pleased to give further information on this subject.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I think, on further consideration, that as we have now reached the usual adjournment hour, and honorable members desire to get away, it would be well to postpone subdivision 5, for it involves large questions of policy. The failure of the Department to realize the conditions of isolated settlements in Australia requires exhaustive consideration at the hands of the Committee. A good deal has been said to-day and on other occasions about the wonderful improvements in telephoning which have been made by the introduction of the condenser system. What I contend is that the real needs of Australia, especially of its remoter portions, have not been improved by anything which has yet been done. Wherever a telephone has been established under the condenser system, there was previously a telegraph office. But the position I have to present to the Committee is that Government after Government have made no real attempt to meet the necessities of the outlying and pioneering settlements. I would ask the Postmaster-General not to press this subdivision until we have an opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government, and especially the remarks he made to-day as to his individual willingness to extend telephones and telegraphs in advance of the revenue-earning possibilities of the lines. If the Government are prepared to adopt that view, I shall have no more to say on the subject; but I have heard only the Postmaster-General express his opinion, and I am not too sure that his colleagues agree with him. However, that is a matter for settlement amongst themselves. Up to the present moment, the Department, as well as the Postmaster-General, has carried out a totally different policy. I represent a district which contains a great many of these remote settlements, and in which a line over a vast distance necessarily cannot pay. My complaint is that the Postmaster-General states one thing here, and that when I write to the Department I get a totally different answer. It is only fair, however, to say that every Postmaster-General has carried out this policy.

Mr. PAGE.—Why did not the honorable member fix up these things when he was in office?

Mr. MAHON.—I could not, as I shall explain to my honorable friend.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If the honorable member intends to discuss this question at any length, we are willing to postpone the subdivision.

Mr. MAHON.—Very well.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General). — As the honorable member for Coolgardie desires to discuss several items which are included in this subdivision, I think it might be postponed, and the subdivision relating to Tasmania taken. So that there may be no misunderstanding as to what I said to-day, I wish to make an explanation. If an application be made for the expenditure of several thousand pounds on the erection of a telegraph line, and the revenue is estimated to amount to £100 or £200, I do not suggest for a moment that we ought to seriously consider such a proposal. But where the estimated revenue approaches nearly to the amount prescribed, and the line will serve a sparsely populated district, from which, by giving the people more conveniences, an increase of revenue may be derived, we ought not to adhere too closely to a hard-and-fast rule, and say that because the revenue is a few pounds less than the amount fixed, the service cannot be given, and the people must wait until they can absolutely prove that a line would pay. However, we are willing to postpone this subdivision.

The CHAIRMAN.—Last year, in order to prevent any complications from arising, the practice was laid down that in such a case the subdivision would be taken as not having been moved.

Proposed vote agreed to, with the exception of items 1 and 7 of subdivision 1, and item 3 of subdivision 2, postponed; and subdivision 5 not moved.

Progress reported.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I rise to make an appeal to the Prime Minister to adjourn now, and not to proceed with the second reading of the Representation Bill. The reason why I ask for an adjournment is because that measure deals with a very important question.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is why I wish to have the Bill launched.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Because of its importance, I think that its second reading ought not to be moved until next week. Saturday is always a bad day to get the report of a speech in the press, and there will be no Hansard report of the Minister's speech available for a week.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I thought of that, and I intend to ask the chief of the Hansard staff to arrange for honorable members to be supplied with proof slips on Monday or Tuesday. The second reading of the Bill is to be moved to-day simply to save time, because some honorable members wish to discuss its provisions next week.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think it will save time. I believe it would save time if the second reading of the Bill were moved when honorable members were present, and had an opportunity to elicit all the facts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Proof slips will be available for honorable members.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think that the adoption of this course will lengthen, and not shorten, the debate.

REPRESENTATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

This is one of those machinery Bills which rise superior to party considerations. It is introduced to complete the machinery of the Constitution relating to representation, by making provision for a definite decision as regards the periods at which the determination of the number of members for each State shall be fixed. Last session this quesaccidentally came up for consideration before a Select Committee of this House sat on electoral representation, and consisted of Mr. Batchelor, Mr. [unclear], Mr. Fowler, Mr. Groom, Mr. Sir William Lyne, Mr. Mauger, Mr. [unclear], Mr. McDonald, Mr. McLean, Mr. [unclear], Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Storrer, [unclear] Brown. I propose to quote only a paragraph from the report—

"Returns of the population of the Commonwealth, upon which the determination of the number of members of the House of Representatives was made, have been questioned. Your Committee recommend that in future it should be certain that a uniform system for the determination of the population be adopted by all the States. In the absence of a definite rule under section 24 of the Constitution, your Committee are of opinion that it should, at an early date, take into consideration the question of fixing periods for the determination of the number of representatives in the several States.

In your report, in which they were unanimously recognised that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction with the existing condition of affairs, and therefore it was desirable that the question should, at the earliest opportunity, be brought under consideration the advisability of introducing some clear and definite rules, superior to any party considerations, might arise, the very important question of the representation of the people might be dealt with. I think all members will agree with me when I say that the question of the representation of the States is of the greatest possible importance. It is important to the States at any time be concerned, because it may mean a subtraction from, or an addition to, the number of their representatives. It is important to the House, because it may involve the removal of a representative from one geographical area to another. It is most necessary, therefore, that we should lay down, on clear, definite, and non-party lines, the principles which should underlie the regulation and determination of the number of representatives of each State. I ask honorable members to consider three propositions. The first is—What are the provisions of the Constitution dealing with the subject? The second is—What are the defects arising from the existing conditions? And the third is—What remedies do we propose for those defects? Those are the points with which I propose to deal. In the first place, the law is to be found in section 24 of the Constitution, which reads as follows:—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the Commonwealth, and the number of such members shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators.

"The number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people, and shall, until the Parliament otherwise provides, be determined whenever necessary, in the following manner:—

1. A quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators.

2. The number of members to be chosen in each State shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the State, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota; and if on such division there is a remainder greater than one-half of the quota, one more member shall be chosen in the State.

The fundamental principle underlying that section is that the number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the existing number of the people. The number of the people in the various States is to be regarded as the determining factor. When we come to deal with a measure of this sort, that must be recognised as a principle from which we cannot deviate. No matter what legislation we introduce, we must regard that as one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution; and it will be seen, when the clauses of this Bill are studied, that due regard has been given to it.

Mr. CROUCH.—How frequently is that principle to be applied?

Mr. GROOM.—I will explain that at a later stage. The section of the Constitution is vague and unsatisfactory. I will indicate what I consider to be the defects of the existing state of affairs. The section provides that—"The number of members chosen in the several States shall be . . . determined whenever necessary.

That is the language of the Constitution—"whenever necessary." We cannot gather from the wording of the section any underlying principle to guide the House as to what is and what is not to be regarded as being "necessary." There is nothing in the section to suggest any specific time, or any specific set of circumstances, or any specific set of facts. That point is left vague, undefined, and uncertain. It is unsatisfactory for this reason—that if we take the section in the strict sense, "whenever necessary" may be taken to mean "whenever, by returns which have been sent in either quarterly or annually, it appears that the allocation of representation is out of proportion to the population." It may mean, if construed very strictly, that the matter is to be determined every year, or perhaps every half-year. Taken in its strictest sense, it would seem to indicate—or, at least, this could be argued—that, whenever it is shown to be necessary, in the very beginning of the year, or in the middle of the year, or at the end of the year, Parliament should pass such a law as would alter the electorates of the States; that, as circumstances fluctuate from time to time, there should be a redistribution of seats, and the whole existing proportions of representation altered. I contend that that would be a highly unsatisfactory thing to continue. The next point is this: The section says that—

The number of members chosen . . . shall, until the Parliament otherwise provides, be determined whenever necessary in the following manner.

A further difficulty has arisen around those words as to who is to determine. Is it the Executive of the day, or Parliament itself? The view which I do strongly urge—although I hope to lay down a course of procedure which will not render it necessary to argue the point—is that it is Parliament that has this supreme right, that it was intended that Parliament should be the judge, and determine the matter when necessary. It was never intended, in my view, to leave it to the Executive of the day, of its own motion, to declare when it should and when it should not be regarded as necessary. In Quick and Garrahan, page 454, the learned authors seem to hold a similar opinion. They say—

Parliamentary authority, however, would appear to be required for two purposes:—(1) to provide for the preparation of the latest statistics, and to identify those statistics by law; and (2) to declare when reapportionment is "necessary." As the statistics are at the root of the representative system, it is important that they should be clearly recognised and identified by Act of Parliament; and even when that has been done, it will be most undesirable that the Executive should be left to decide for itself whether reapportionments were necessary.

In those words the authors lay it down that it is for Parliament to decide the status of the statistics, and to define that by act of law; and consequently it is for Parliament to declare when a reapportionment of members is necessary.

Mr. Groom.

Mr. CROUCH.—Has not the Executive already declared by proclamation in the Gazette?

Mr. GROOM.—The Executive has by an Executive act declared certain statistics to be the latest statistics of the Commonwealth; but my contention is that we should lay down in this Bill definite and settled principles, which will put upon a clear, sound, and legal footing the representation of the States, so that the process of distribution may proceed without question and without cavil. The matter is of such vital importance, striking, as it does, at the very foundation of the representative system, that it should be put upon a clear, sound, and definite basis, so as to be beyond all dispute.

Mr. McDONALD.—The same consideration applies to compiling the electoral rolls.

Mr. GROOM.—I quite agree that that also should be on a sound basis. The existing condition is highly unsatisfactory, because it is uncertain when a redistribution should take place. It leaves Parliament in a very unsettled state, because it does not know how long the particular unit which constitutes an electorate is to continue. It is highly unsatisfactory to the Executive of the day, because, whatever party may be in power, it is subject to the charge of gerrymandering. The suggestion is made either that this party is doing something with the intention of depriving a certain State of its representation, or that another party is doing something which will have the effect of adding a member to another State. The method is unsatisfactory to the House, because honorable members are constantly confronted with the fact that it may be necessary, from the statistics furnished, to have a redistribution. And yet agitations may be started and the Executive asked to postpone the doing of what should be done as a matter of right to some individual States. As I pointed out, this method is highly unsatisfactory to the Executive who happen to be intrusted at the particular period with the charge of public affairs. A recognition of those facts should lead us to take definite action, in order to put the whole business on a sound and stable footing. I hope honorable members will accept my statement that I do not, in any way, desire to introduce any party element into the debate, but rather to deal with the subject purely from the view of general principles; so that.

on what is a most important subject, we may calmly deliberate free from the colour of our particular party opinions or actions. What is the remedy proposed in order to deal with this state of affairs? Naturally the suggestion is that that which is uncertain shall be made certain; that that which is undefined shall be made clear and defined; that a matter which leads to friction and to Inter-State jealousies and disturbances, shall be placed in an atmosphere where friction and jealousy cannot arise; and that we shall lay down clear, definite, and decided rules by which the representation of the States may be determined. With those objects in view this measure is submitted to the House. In order that honorable members may see that we are not altogether departing from the beaten path of precedent, I may refer them to the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 2, clause 3, in which it is laid down that—

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

Mr. CROUCH.—In the Bill the period is made every five years.

Mr. GROOM.—Yes.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is a departure from the procedure of all civilized nations

Mr. GROOM. — I shall explain that point presently. The principle, under the United States Constitution, is to have a decennial enumeration, and to act on that enumeration.

Mr. HARPER.—Would not a decennial enumeration do here?

Mr. GROOM.—If the honorable member will permit me, I shall deal with that point when explaining the clauses of the Bill. In Canada, under section 37 of the British North American Act 1867, the provision is—

The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of 181 members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick.

The provision goes on—

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four Provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

This is subject to certain rules, which I need not read. In Canada the practice appears to be that at some time after a census has been taken in accordance with the principle of the Constitution, a Redistribution Bill shall be passed by the House itself; and so recently as 1903 such a Bill was passed. In New Zealand the electorates are divided by the Commissioners on the principle of having an enumeration, and, after that, a redistribution. In that Colony an enumeration is made as often as there is a census taken, and, I understand, this is done on a quinquennial basis, so that every five years there may be a redistribution. Such are the different methods in which this problem has been solved in other political communities which correspond to our own. In the original draft of the Commonwealth Constitution Bill, made for the Convention of 1891, it was provided—

A fresh apportionment of representatives to the States shall be made after each census of the people of the Commonwealth, which shall be taken at intervals not longer than ten years. But a fresh apportionment shall not take effect until the then next general election.

The Convention, for some reason of its own, saw fit to reject that provision, and the matter was dealt with in the vague and uncertain terms which appear in the existing Constitution. The Bill now before honorable members sets out the method by which it is proposed to put the representation of the States upon a clearer and better footing. The underlying principle is that it shall be necessary to ascertain the number of the people in each State at certain defined periods which are fixed, that is, not every ten years, but every five years.

Mr. HARPER.—Are we going to have a five years' census?

Mr. GROOM.—I shall explain that point. The idea is that we shall not at the present time have a quinquennial census, but if a quinquennial census is made, then the proportions for representation will be determined by the census at each period of five years. If, however, there be a decennial census, then every day on which the census is taken shall be held to be an enumeration day, and the result of that enumeration, taken under the census, shall be the basis of the determining the proportion of representation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Would that not entail a redistribution before a general election, if Parliament ran out full period?

Mr. GROOM.—The Bill provides that if Parliament be sitting, and a census be taken during its currency, then at the next succeeding general election effect shall be given to the census, if it be possible and practicable to carry out a redistribution in the meantime. One set of enumeration days are the census days, and in the intervening periods it is proposed that there shall be a determination of the population on the principles which are laid down in the schedule to the Bill itself. Clause 4 provides that on an enumeration day which is not a census day, the enumeration shall be in accordance with the schedule, and the schedule lays down certain rules which are to be observed. In the first place a starting point is made from the last census returns. Say, for instance, that a census is taken in the year 1911, and an enumeration has to be made in 1916; in that case regard is paid to the census taken in the year 1911. In the meantime, of course, there may be increases or decreases of population, and those increases or decreases are to be added to the census returns after having been determined by the following methods set out in the schedule:—In the first place the returns of the births and deaths are to be considered, and in the second place the arrivals and departures both by sea and land are to be taken into account. Then, in order to provide for inaccuracies, certain percentages are allowed for unrecorded arrivals and departures by land and sea. Those percentages have been worked out by the statisticians of the various States, and are for the time being embodied in this Bill. That, shortly, is the principle on which it is proposed to determine these matters.

Mr. CROUCH.—Is all this machinery necessary simply because it is proposed to have an enumeration every five years instead of accepting the figures of the decennial census?

Mr. GROOM.—Schedule B, to which I have referred, is necessary because there is not a census every five years, and we must in a measure of this kind lay down some definite rules of universal application.

Mr. FISHER.—And the more exact they are the better it will be.

Mr. GROOM.—They are laid down here exactly, and if it is found necessary at any time to modify these principles, provision is made that the alterations made shall be set out in regulations which must be submitted to Parliament, so that Parliament shall know what is being done.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What is the rule to be followed in regard to increases or decreases which are approximations, and cannot be stated exactly?

Mr. GROOM.—As regards unrecorded passages by sea, certain rules with respect to them are provided for. I refer honorable members to the report of the Statistician's Conference, which was held in Melbourne in 1903. They worked out a certain number of percentages based absolutely on census returns and records of departures by land and by sea, and these have been adopted.

Mr. KENNEDY.—When a census has been taken in the past, the result has been to prove such estimates to be incorrect.

Mr. GROOM.—When estimates have been made in the past there has not, until lately, been uniformity in the method adopted throughout the different States. The rules laid down in the schedule to this Bill have been agreed to by the statisticians of the States as embodying the principles which should guide them in estimating population during periods intervening between one census and another.

Mr. HARPER.—Is there any other country in which a five years' enumeration has been adopted?

Mr. GROOM.—In New Zealand a five years' period is adopted for electoral purposes.

Mr. McDONALD.—We adopted a five years' period in Queensland for many years.

Mr. GROOM.—Yes, in Queensland there was for a considerable time a quinquennial census.

Mr. HARPER.—Were they for electoral purposes?

Mr. McDONALD.—No; in order to ascertain the increase of population.

Mr. GROOM.—The reason for fixing a five years' period is that it is recognised that in a country like Australia a State may at any time receive a large increase of population from various causes.

Mr. CROUCH.—That applies even more forcibly to Canada.

Mr. GROOM.—Exactly. But, so far as Australia is concerned, the idea underlying the adoption of the five years' period in this Bill is to keep Parliament in touch with the masses of the people.

Mr. HARPER.—But it does not matter where a man is in Australia, if he has a vote.

Mr. GROOM.—It may be a very important matter to a particular State. The desire is, without having too frequent alterations in the representation, to recognise at the same time that in a Commonwealth like Australia there are likely to be fluctuations of the population. There may be an increase in one centre, and a decrease in another, and it is desirable to harmonize our representation with the movements of population which may from time to time take place. Suppose five of the States were to remain stationary in the matter of population, and another to increase its population very largely. Suppose, for instance, a State like Queensland were to increase its population suddenly by 1,000,000 persons, that would throw the existing basis of representation entirely out of joint. We are proposing to adopt a period which will enable us to make adjustments in the event of changes in population, but which, at the same time, will not require a too frequent distribution of the electorates. We try to recognise the democratic principle of keeping the House in touch with the people, while at the same time we preserve that stability in the representation of the various States which is necessary to prevent frequent local disturbance and disturbance in Parliament itself.

Mr. HARPER.—The Parliament will be equally in touch with the people wherever they are registered.

Mr. GROOM.—That might or might not be so. A representative coming from a northern State might take very different views from those held by one coming from a southern State. There are certain States' influences which we must recognise as developing and moulding a man's ideas. The principle of this measure is of course to exclude all questions of party, and questions likely to cause Inter-State friction, and to lay down absolutely just principles on which these matters shall be determined. I think it will be exceedingly gratifying to the House if we can succeed in doing so. It will certainly be a relief to the Executive of the day, and to honorable members as well. I propose to explain briefly the provisions of the Bill. Clause 2 provides that for the purpose of determining the number of representatives an ascertainment shall be made of the population of the Commonwealth. The inquiry is to be made by the Commonwealth Electoral Officer. He is to base his calculation upon returns supplied to him either by the Commonwealth Statistician, or by the States Statisticians in the event of there being no Commonwealth Statistician. The States Statisticians are required by a subsequent clause to base their returns on a clearly defined and uniform basis.

Mr. CROUCH.—Is it proposed that the first enumeration shall be taken on the basis of the 1901 census or upon a new census?

Mr. GROOM.—If the honorable and learned member will allow me, I will put it in this way: The fixed enumeration day is the census day. An enumeration day will be appointed, immediately after the passing of this Bill, in order to bring it into operation.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The first will be on the 1901 census?

Mr. GROOM.—It will be on the 1901 census plus the returns supplied by the statisticians upon the uniform principles laid down in this Bill. There will afterwards be a census day, and on the expiration of the fifth year after each census day there will be an enumeration on the principles laid down in this schedule.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is it implied by clause 2 that the first enumeration shall really be a census?

Mr. GROOM.—No, it is not intended that the first shall be a census.

Mr. CROUCH.—Only an estimate.

Mr. GROOM.—The census will not fall due until March, 1911, when the next decennial census will take place. The intention of the clause is that after the passing of this Bill the Commonwealth Electoral Officer shall appoint an enumeration day, in order that it may be determined what are the proper proportions for the representation of the various States in this House. After that the next enumeration day will be a census day, and so the enumeration and census days will alternate, unless in the meantime Parliament makes provision for a quinquennial census. I do not think that the Parliament is likely to do that, because of the cost, the last census having cost the States £117,000 for collection and compilation alone.

Mr. CROUCH.—Then why cannot we wait until 1911 before taking the first enumeration?

Mr. GROOM.—It is necessary to provide for certain defined periods of enumeration. The Constitution says "when-ever necessary," and it is alleged to be shown to be necessary now by the returns made. I am looking at this matter from an absolutely impartial point of view, my desire being to do absolute justice as between the States.

Mr. PAGE.—Does the Bill improve the situation at all? Will the Minister be able to get more information when it is passed than he can get now?

Mr. GROOM.—It improves the situation by affording an opportunity to obtain information supplied according to principles approved by Parliament. After the numbers have been ascertained, the Chief Electoral Officer is to issue a certificate containing the results of his inquiry, and if it appears that any State should have an additional member, or should lose a member, a redistribution of seats will be ordered in that State. Clause 10 provides that if an alteration should take place in the number of the representatives of any State during the continuance of a Parliament, it shall not affect the existing House, but shall apply only at the next elections. If the Bill is passed, the Commonwealth Electoral Officer will be asked to fix an enumeration day. He will ascertain from the statisticians of the States the information required, and if it appears that the representation of any State should be altered, a redistribution of seats will be ordered, on the basis of the necessary alteration. Of course, we know that the electoral quotas are now so out of joint that a redistribution will be necessary, and it will be carried into effect so as to operate at the next general election.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Is it possible that this may affect the redistribution that has already been laid before Parliament?

Mr. GROOM.—It is possible that it may. The intention is to put matters on a legal basis, and to let Parliament lay down rules to determine when it is necessary to have a redistribution.

Mr. FISHER.—To take matters out of the hands of the Executive.

Mr. GROOM.—Yes.

Mr. PAGE.—Is not that the whole point of the Bill?

Mr. GROOM.—The object of the Bill is to put everything on a definite and sound legal basis, by laying down certain principles to be followed in future.

Mr. TUDOR.—If Parliament decides that the numbers for any State shall be those of the last distribution, is that distribution to be accepted?

Mr. GROOM.—Parliament will lay down rules and ask the Electoral Officer to carry them into effect. It is not that we distrust each other, and would not be fair and just, but that we wish our motives to be beyond suspicion, and it is therefore better that these things should be dealt with according to fixed principles, the justice of which can be appreciated by the public at large. I hope that the Bill will be passed into law, because I think that it will be a valuable addition to the constitutional machinery of the Commonwealth. It will be necessary to make a slight verbal amendment in clause 3, paragraph b, in order to make it more explicit. The Government submit the measure in a non-party spirit, and I hope to see it dealt with in that spirit.

Debate (on motion by Mr. JOHNSON) adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

COMMONWEALTH PRINTING: ORDER OF BUSINESS: HIGH COURT: REPRESENTATION BILL: NON-DELIVERY OF POST-CARDS.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I should like some information as to the reason why the printing of postage stamps, postal notes, money orders, and similar papers is to be taken from the Brisbane Government Printing Office. The State of Queensland has gone to a lot of expense to obtain a printing plant second to none in the Commonwealth, and I do not understand the reason of the change. Postage stamps, money orders, and postal notes being the equivalent of money, should, of course, be in the hands of the Treasurer. No Department should be able to issue its own paper money.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The stamps are practically receipts for money.

Mr. PAGE.—£1 worth of postage stamps are as valuable as a sovereign, and the Treasurer should be the only man to control their issue.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I hope that we shall have an opportunity to discuss that question on Tuesday next.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—On several occasions honorable members have urged the desirableness of the Prime Minister, when moving the adjournment of the House, indicating the business which he proposes to take at the next sitting, and I suggest that the Prime Minister should adopt that practice, as it would be of great assistance to honorable members.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I notice that some letters are missing from the correspondence, of which copies have been laid upon the table of the House, between the present Attorney-General and the ex-Attorney-Generals and the Justices of the High Court. I understand that the order of the House was that the whole of the correspondence should be published, and I am assured that one letter is missing. There is a reference in the correspondence to a letter of the 8th May, which seems to be a very important communication, but it has not been included in the papers laid upon the table. I understand, also, that a confidential letter was written by the right honorable member for East Sydney, when he was leading the late Government, but I scarcely expected that would be published. Further, during a recent debate reference was made to a letter which had been sent by the Prime Minister to the ex-Prime Minister.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not remember any such letter.

Mr. CROUCH.—A conversation which took place between the Prime Minister and the right honorable member for East Sydney seemed to indicate that some such communication had passed between them. If there are any missing letters, we should be supplied with copies of them. In regard to the Representation Bill, various opinions have been expressed by the present Prime Minister, the ex-Attorney-General, and the present Attorney-General which would be of much assistance to honorable members if they were available during the discussion of that measure. There are some indications that a combination may be formed between honorable members on the Government and Opposition benches against honorable members sitting in the Ministerial corner, and in view of that possibility I think we should be supplied with the fullest information.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I desire to direct the attention of the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Postmaster-General, to the fact that several complaints have been made in different quarters with regard to the non-delivery of post-cards. The practice of sending and collecting post-cards has developed to a very large extent of late, and cases have come under my notice in which post-cards have not been delivered. In one instance, six post-cards were posted at the Melbourne General Post Office, and only three were delivered. On another occasion, eight post-cards were posted at a suburban post-office, and two were undelivered. I notice also a letter published in this morning's Argus, which cites a case similar to those I have mentioned.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I shall direct the attention of the Postmaster-General to the regrettable occurrences mentioned by the honorable member for Lang. In reply to the honorable member for Corio, there will be no objection to furnish copies of whatever letters are referred to in the document mentioned by him, excepting, of course, the confidential letter written by the ex-Prime Minister. The honorable and learned member is mistaken in assuming that any correspondence has passed between myself and the ex-Prime Minister on the subject of the dispute between the late Attorney-General and the High Court Judges. If the honorable and learned member refers to Hansard he will see that I stated that I had sent a warning to the ex-Prime Minister, conveyed viva voce, to the effect that on the High Court question I held decided views, and, if necessary, would take decided action. With regard to the order of business, it is proposed to proceed on Tuesday with the Appropriation (New Works and Buildings) Bill, which we hope to dispose of in time to forward it to the Senate on Wednesday. When the measure has been passed by another Chamber, we shall have obtained authority for all the expenditure on public works contemplated for the current year. Following on the disposal of that measure, it is intended to resume the debate on the Representation Bill, the Census Bill, and, if time permits, the Commerce Bill.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 12 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

Mr. DEAKIN laid upon the table the following papers:—

Report of the Pacific Cable Conference.

Report of the Governor of South Australia, in respect to the Northern Territory.

Correspondence with the Premiers of the States regarding Immigration.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—The Brisbane Daily Mail, of the 25th August, reports me as having said in this Chamber, on the previous day:—

Other amounts were lent to New South Wales, and some banks' total receipts were £21,978. . . . The note tax in the different States brought in £18,434.

That report is absolutely incorrect. What I did say was something quite different from the statements attributed to me; but instead of a correction of this report, further false and untrue statements were published in the same newspaper last Tuesday. I feel that it is only fair to my constituents to make this correction, especially as the editor of the newspaper was an unsuccessful candidate at the first Federal election for the seat which I now occupy.

BRITISH NEW GUINEA.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if it is intended that Mr. Atlee Hunt shall report on the various matters which he has taken into consideration during his visit to New Guinea? If so, will the report be available to honorable members?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Mr. Hunt is preparing a report, and there will be no objection to making available to honorable members so much of it as may relate to business before Parliament.

LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. TUDOR asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether the letter carriers of other capital cities in the Commonwealth are compelled to do their work from the General Post Office similarly to those employed at the General Post Office, Melbourne?

2. What is the total cost to date of centralizing the suburban letter carriers at the General Post Office, Melbourne?

3. What was the cost for the last twelve months?

4. Has any actual saving been effected by this scheme?

5. If so, how much has been saved by this centralization?

6. Who originated this scheme?

7. When this scheme was introduced, was it not intended to amalgamate suburban offices, and thereby decrease the staffs of postmasters, &c.?

8. To what extent has this been done?

9. Is it intended to expend a further sum on the Melbourne General Post Office which would not be necessary if this centralization had not taken place?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. As a rule they do their work from the General Post Office, but there are exceptions in the case of distant suburbs, and the delivery is made in those instances from the local post office. These exceptions are in connexion with the Sydney, Brisbane, and Perth offices.

2. £13,259.

3. £2,058.

4. Yes.

5. £15,524.

6. Mr. Springhall, Superintendent Mail Branch, Melbourne.

7. No.

8. See No. 7.

9. No. The increased accommodation in the General Post Office is required to provide additional room for the mail work on the ground floor.

DEFALCATIONS: POST AND TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

Mr. R. EDWARDS (for Mr. JOHNSON) asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Referring to questions 3 and 4, asked by Mr. Johnson on 17th August last, and replies thereto, reported in Hansard No. 6, page 1105, will he state—

1. What is the total number of defalcations by officers of the Department in New South Wales?

2. What is the total sum of such defalcations?

3. What is the total amount paid to the Department by the financial institutions interested in reimbursements on account of such defalcations?

4. Have such financial institutions been called upon to meet their full liabilities in respect of such defalcations? If not, why not?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — The following information has been furnished by the Deputy Postmaster-General, Sydney:—

1. Seventy-five (from 1st January, 1887, to 31st December, 1904).

2. £9,792 os. 10d.

3. £4,299 15s.

4. The full amount of deficiency has always been recovered up to the amount guaranteed. Records prior to 1887 are not available.

NEW SOUTH WALES EXHIBITION.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Whether he has had his attention directed to a cablegram in the press stating that the New South Wales Exhibition in Guildhall, London, was a pronounced success, and that the London press urges that a United Commonwealth Exhibition should be held in 1906?

2. Whether the Government will consider the advisability of holding a Commonwealth Exhibition in London next year?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follows:—

1. Yes.
2. Whether carried out next year or later, the project is one that deserves consideration.

LETTER SORTERS: MINIMUM SALARY.

Mr. WEBSTER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it the intention of the Postmaster-General to concede the minimum salary to the sorters in New South Wales?

2. Is he aware that certain officers received a £14 increase, alleged to be added to bring them up to the minimum; will he state why these men were not given the £6 yearly increment until they reached the minimum?

3. Can he state why the men, who are receiving less than the minimum (£138) are to receive the £6 annual increment until they reach the minimum?

4. Is it the intention of the Commissioner to promote the assistant sorters in New South Wales General Post Office to the position of sorters?

5. Is he aware that the Department induced these assistant sorters to accept their present position? Will the Minister state why they are refused the position of sorters?

6. If the Commissioner cannot raise these assistant sorters to the position of sorters, will he give them back their old positions at the salaries they would have been receiving to-day, viz., £120 and £126 respectively?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The following replies have been furnished by the Public Service Commissioner:—

1. Not immediately—see reply to question 3.
2. Yes; five despatching officers received an increase of £14 on classification, to bring them to the minimum of the position, but in doing so they were not promoted over others with satisfactory qualifications for the position.
3. Because, if immediately advanced, they would be promoted over a large number of letter carriers, who are in receipt of higher salaries, and have longer service. These sorters, under State practice, had little prospect of advancement beyond £120. Under the classification they are in a much better position, and will proceed automatically to £150, with prospects of further advancement.
4. There are no assistant sorters, but it is assumed the cases referred to are those of certain of the junior class employed as "stampers." These officers will receive promotion in their order of seniority.

5. The Minister is not aware—see reply to question 4.

6. This cannot be done. The officers referred to must be subject to the system of promotion provided for the service.

CHIEF CLERK OF STORES, SYDNEY.

Mr. WEBSTER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

With reference to questions 5 and 6, asked by Mr. Webster on the 4th August last, relating to alleged representations by Departmental officers to the State Public Service Board of New South Wales, respecting the promotion of Mr. W. H. Golding, will he communicate with this Board and endeavour to furnish replies to those questions?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The following information has been furnished by the Public Service Commissioner:—

It is not considered desirable to communicate with the State Public Service Board on a matter which can have no bearing upon the present position of Mr. Golding as Clerk in Charge of Stores.

Mr. WEBSTER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

With reference to question 7, asked by Mr. Webster on the 4th August last, relating to the appointment of the Chief Clerk of Stores, Sydney, will he give particulars of the services of Messrs. W. H. Golding and P. S. Eldershaw, and the grounds on which it is held that Mr. Golding ranks senior to Mr. Eldershaw?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The following information has been furnished by the Public Service Commissioner:—

Mr. Golding has twenty-seven years' service; Mr. Eldershaw thirty-four years' service, but as postal inspector the former held the superior position. The appointment was made on the ground of efficiency.

SUPPLY.

ADDITIONS, NEW WORKS, AND BUILDINGS.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 8th September, vide page 2076):

Division 4 (Telegraphs and Telephones), £169,150.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I think that the time has arrived for us to consider whether it is desirable to duplicate the conveniences afforded to residents of the larger centres of population, while most necessary facilities in the way of telegraphic, telephonic, and mail communication are being denied to residents in the remoter country districts.

Mr. WILKS.—Surely the honorable member does not wish to raise the cry of “town versus country” in connexion with this question?

Mr. MAHON.—No; I have no such desire. I strongly advocate bringing everything up-to-date, but at the same time I believe the Australian cities have been well looked after and are fully able to care for themselves. I do not blame the present Government for the condition of affairs upon which I am now commenting, but they should consider whether the more remote portions of Australia are to remain absolutely starved in the matter of postal and telegraphic facilities. I represent one of the largest and most sparsely-settled districts in Australia, and I find that, owing to the policy adopted by the Department for years past, it is impossible to obtain any new service within my electorate unless the authorities can feel assured that it will pay from the outset. The Postmaster-General indicated last week that he intended to depart from the hard and fast lines previously laid down in that respect, but I fear that his good intentions are not sufficiently virile to enable him to break through the practice which has been followed so long. We have heard a great deal about the excellence of the condenser system, and the numerous facilities which have been provided as the result of its adoption in some portions of the eastern States. I do not wish to say one word in disparagement of that innovation, but honorable members must not lose sight of the fact that it provides merely for the duplication of existing facilities—that the condenser system of telephoning has been installed only in places which previously enjoyed telegraphic communication. The introduction of the system has undoubtedly resulted in great improvement. Its effect may be likened to that which follows the construction of a railway between places which were previously served by mail coaches. But it should not be assumed that any benefit has been conferred on those outlying settlements which are most in need of facilities for communication. Speaking of the case of Western Australia, with which I am most familiar, I would point out that prior to Federation, the moment that a mining field was discovered a telegraphic surveyor was sent out to cut a track in readiness for the construction of a telegraph line; whilst postal facilities were provided forthwith as a matter of course. The State Government did not stop to consider whether the telegraph line would pay or whether the revenue derived from the mail service would balance the expenditure by the end of the year.

Mr. WATSON.—That was during the boom, when the Government had plenty of loan money to spend.

Mr. MAHON.—There was no boom in 1897, when many of the new mining fields were opened up, and many of the works to which I am referring were carried out. The State Government recognised that postal and telegraph facilities were essential to the development of the country, and they immediately supplied them. Under the Federal administration, however, the residents of these remote districts are unable to secure the conveniences with which they were previously so readily supplied. This is not calculated to impress them with the advantages of Federation, or to make this Parliament popular. I would mention the case of Black Range, a new township which lies midway between Lawlers on the east, and Mount Magnet on the west, 100 miles from either place. The settlement has a population of more than 500 adults. I was through that country in 1900, when not a soul was to be seen, but during the last two years a settlement has been formed, and several mines are now being successfully worked. I have repeatedly applied for a telegraph line to Black Range, but I have always been met with the objection that it would not pay. I would ask honorable members to consider the position of persons in this outlying district who are in need of medical attendance as the result of illness or accident. A distance of 100 miles requires to be traversed in order to procure medical or surgical assistance, so that at least three days must elapse before a doctor can reach a man who has sustained a fracture of the arm or of the leg. In fairness to these people, who, after all, are not the least worthy class of settlers in this country, I think that this Parliament ought to lay down some new rule by which assistance shall be granted to them, by way of subsidy, in procuring these facilities. Let me cite still another case. I refer to a place called Buxville, containing a population of nearly 300, and two banks, and distant only eighteen miles from a telegraph line. So far, I have been unable to get telephone communication ed to that town. In this connection I may further point to Parker's and Mount Jackson, each having a station of 200, and each being situated eighty miles from Southern Cross. If a passenger or a resident meets with an accident there, two or three days must elapse before a medical man can reach him. I assure the Committee that at the present time the public are instituting a campaign—and a very unfavorable one—against the management of the Postal Department under the State and its management under the Commonwealth. Last night I heard the representatives from other States discuss in a very unfriendly way a proposal to spend upon new works and services in Western Australia a larger proportion of Commonwealth revenue than that which its population seems to entitle it.

CONROY.—It stands to reason that money must be spent in those districts as yet, are undeveloped.

MAHON. — That is exactly my opinion. I think that more allowance ought to be made for expenditure in a new territory than some honorable members appear inclined to make. A country in course of settlement should naturally appeal to the honorable members for larger allowances than those required in the case of an older and more settled colony. Still I do not feel inclined to meet the criticism indulged in, since this expenditure has been placed upon a per capita basis. I feel that, from the point of view of the representatives of other States, it is a good deal to be said against extending the money of the people of Queensland or Tasmania upon new works and services in Western Australia, especially in view of the bookkeeping provision of the Constitution, under which the earnings of the post-offices are enjoyed by the people of Western Australia alone.

WATSON.—The method now being adopted is a one-sided evasion of the bookkeeping system.

MAHON.—Although I believe that the late Treasurer has simply given effect to the provisions of the Constitution by charging the expenditure upon new works and buildings upon a per capita basis—

WATSON.—That expenditure was debited against the respective States in which it was incurred for three years and no commissions were made.

MAHON.—That is so. The Treasurer has discovered that a very large sum would require to be debited to Western Australia during the present year if that arrangement were carried out, and as the result of inquiry, he was legally advised that, in order to give effect to the provisions of the Constitution, he must debit the cost of these new works and buildings upon a per capita basis. Some time ago, as one way out of the difficulty, I suggested to the Government of Western Australia that it should take the place of the private individuals chiefly concerned by offering to guarantee to make up to the Commonwealth Government any deficiency in the cost of carrying out these services. I suggested to the then Premier of Western Australia that where so much was lost upon a mail service or upon the extension of telegraphs, the Government of that State should take the place of a municipal council, and guarantee the Federal authorities that they would make good any deficiency. At first he seemed disposed to favour that idea, but upon looking into the matter he appeared to think that it would complicate the position of Western Australia when the Commonwealth Parliament was called upon to pay the value of the transferred properties. Upon that account he ultimately declined to give the necessary guarantee. I confess that I am quite unable to see how Western Australia could be embarrassed by the adoption of my suggestion.

Mr. CONROY.—Upon the face of it, the honorable member's suggestion appears to be a sound one.

Mr. MAHON.—I have not been able to discover the grounds for the objection which the late Premier of Western Australia entertained to my suggestion. In proof of my statement as to public feeling in the western State regarding the refusal of postal facilities, I desire to quote from a letter which I have received from a gentleman who represents a remote portion of that State—I refer to the far north-west coast—in the Western Australian Parliament. He has authorized me to make this complaint public, and I have no hesitation in doing so. My informant is Mr. Isdell, the representative of the Pilbarra district. He says:—

We have a new tin-field about 60 or 70 miles west from Port Hedland, and as it is principally lode tin, and a large number of leases have been applied for, there is every prospect of its being permanent. A great deal of money has been and is being invested there. The present population is about 250, and is rapidly increasing. There is no mail communication of any sort, the nearest post-office being Port Hedland, 70 miles away. Nearly two months ago an offer to run a fortnightly mail for a subsidy of £2 per week was made to the Deputy Postmaster-General at Perth.

That officer, it appears, has no power to accept a tender of that sort if the amount exceeds £20 per annum. The result was that the matter was referred to Melbourne and nothing further has been heard of it. Mr. Isdell thus concludes his letter:—

Every one in Western Australia complains of Federation, and nothing would have pleased us better than if all the West Australian Senators and Representatives had handed in their resignations when the Survey Bill was rejected. It would have brought the other States to their senses quickly. The loss of control of postal matters over here has been a curse to Western Australia.

Under these circumstances I ask what course can we adopt to secure better postal and telegraphic facilities for these remote places? So long as these works are charged per head of the population I feel that there is a good deal to be said from the stand-point of the other States against any extraordinary increase of expenditure in Western Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—Until the States debts are taken over.

Mr. MAHON.—As long as the book-keeping section is in force. I agree with the view expressed by the late Treasurer in delivering his last Budget statement, that that provision should remain in operation for at least ten years, so far as Western Australia is concerned. That being so, honorable members will recognise the reasonableness of the proposition I have to make, namely, that an arrangement should be entered into with the State Government by which the Commonwealth would be at liberty to deduct from their excess revenue the cost of new works and buildings in Western Australia. That, I think, is a fair proposal. I observe that in the Budget-papers the excess of Customs and Excise revenue which is returned to the States after one-fourth has been deducted by the Commonwealth is described as surplus revenue. That is far from an exact description; and, in making this proposition, I am speaking of the surplus denominated as the balance due to the State over and above the three-fourths of Customs and Excise revenue which the Constitution requires to be returned to the State. I find that by the end of the next financial year we shall have returned to Western Australia, in round figures, £900,000 over and above the three-fourths required by the Constitution to be returned.

Would it not have been better, instead of giving that immense sum to the State politicians to play with, to have kept our own services up to date by means of payments out of these moneys? This excess sum has been expended by the State in the construction, among other things, of non-paying railway lines. I have no desire to say anything against the construction of those lines, for I trust that they will soon pay their way; but as the result of the system we have been adopting, the Government of Western Australia have been enabled not only to construct railways to agricultural districts, which are on the non-paying list, but to erect Government batteries for the reduction of auriferous ores—at a cost of from £5,000 to £7,000—sometimes in districts where there is neither a post-office nor a telegraph station. Is it not reasonable in these circumstances that the people should arrive at the conclusion that the State Government is doing immensely better than the Federation? And yet the fact remains that the State is enabled to carry out these works largely by means of money which the Commonwealth need not return to it unless it pleases. A good deal is, therefore, to be said in support of the objection of the other States to the debiting of new works and buildings on a per capita basis. I have the authority of the late Treasurer for the statement that there is nothing to prevent the Federal Government from agreeing with the several States that provision shall be made for these works out of the balance due to them, or, in other words, that they shall be treated as pre-Federation expenditure. That is the system which I should prefer. The right honorable member for Balaclava informs me that as Treasurer of the Commonwealth he adopted it in other cases, with the consent of the Government of the States concerned; and, that being so, there is no reason why we should not follow it in the case of Western Australia. With the introduction of such a system the representatives of other States would not be so ready as they are at present to keenly scrutinize expenditure proposed to be incurred upon new works and buildings in the western State. I do not think that I need detain the Committee much longer; but I would again impress upon the Government the necessity to give immediate attention to this question. Federation is undoubtedly becoming extremely unpopular amongst the best classes of our citizens—the settlers and pioneers of the back country—and this unpopularity, so far as Western Australia is concerned, is due solely to the failure of the Commonwealth to supply residents of sparsely populated districts with mail and telegraphic services. The people are not unmindful of the reduction in telegraphic rates and other minor advantages which have flowed from Federation, but the absence of mail and telegraphic services touches them at the sorest spot. It is a matter that comes home to every man, woman, and child living in these isolated districts, and the want of reasonable facilities in this direction is naturally felt very severely by them. While proposing to furnish the cities with up-to-date appliances in the matter of telephone services and other conveniences, the Government should seriously consider the position of those who dwell in the remote parts of Australia, and should ascertain whether or not some arrangement can be made with the State Government whereby the Commonwealth will be able to improve their situation. It is not for me to propound a scheme, but the question is becoming one of such importance in the Western State that the time has arrived when it is advisable for the Commonwealth Government to review the policy with which we started—that all new services should pay their way. That is a justifiable condition to impose in respect of new services for cities and thickly-populated districts; but is it reasonable to expect new telegraph lines or mail services to sparsely-populated parts of the Commonwealth to earn sufficient to pay interest on the expenditure upon them? These works should be regarded as tending to develop the country, to promote settlement in the interior, and to make large and prosperous cities like Sydney and Melbourne possible. The time has arrived when the Government must reconsider the question of the terms upon which new services to outlying districts shall be granted. I am sure that the Postmaster-General and his colleagues, as well as the late Postmaster-General—who is acquainted with the rural life of Australia—desire to do everything they can to promote settlement. The question to-day is a live one. Every one agrees that we need to attract immigrants to Australia, and if we really desire people to settle in the interior, it is only reasonable that we should give them the facilities that are necessary to anything approaching a rational life. Mail services and telegraph or telephone lines are helpful to this end, and should be granted wherever possible. I personally am a great believer in the telephone system, as an aid to settlement. I am confident that if we could, by some means or other, connect every farmer's house in Australia with the telephone system, we should, in that way, give a great incentive to settlement, because it is the isolation and monotony of country life that drives people into the cities, and depopulates the rural districts. In view of all these facts, I appeal to the Government, with all the earnestness that I can command, to review the policy to which they and their predecessors have been committed, and to give the question of the extension of facilities to country districts the fullest and fairest consideration.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—I should like to impress upon the Postmaster-General the necessity of departing from the present system of dealing with applications for postal and telegraphic services for sparsely-populated districts. If a thinly-populated district applies for a telephone or postal service, it is called upon first of all to furnish the Department with a guarantee that the service will pay. And if after a report is made, it is thought that the revenue would not pay the interest on the expenditure, the application will not be granted unless the residents will guarantee any deficiency in the working of the line. This system is wrong, and does not encourage men to go into outlying districts and settle there. In new districts farmers have quite enough to do to clear their land and pay their way, without being called upon to guarantee the working of telephone lines, and also find sites for post-offices. In some districts the residents have not only guaranteed the Department against loss, but have also erected the lines, and when an application is received from another district the Department points to what has been done by the residents in other districts, and asks the applicants to imitate their example. That is not fair or right, and it is no wonder that, while such a course is followed, Federation is not so popular as it should be. Owing to the manner in which the Department has been administered, one hears persons say: "The postal service was a long way better when it was under the control of the State." It should be better under the administration of the Commonwealth. This year the Commonwealth will return to the States £400,000 more than it need return. It is only right for the Postmaster-General to make use of a portion of this sum in granting telegraphic and telephonic facilities to country residents. The honorable member for Coolgardie mentioned the necessity for providing means for communicating with doctors in urgent cases. It is absolutely necessary, I think, that these facilities should be granted, if only for use in such circumstances. At the present time an official office will be provided with an outside lamp, while an unofficial office has to be approached in the dark. I do not see why this distinction should be drawn when light could be provided at such a small cost. Although these are little matters in themselves, still they tend to make the service unpopular. I trust that lighting arrangements will be provided for all offices. I cannot appreciate the policy of subsidizing steam-ships to carry our mails to other parts of the world, while ordinary assistance is refused to settlers in the back-blocks. We talk here day after day about how we intend to populate the country. If we wish to promote immigration, we ought to provide the necessary conveniences so that to residents in country districts life may be worth living. In New South Wales, although it is pretty well populated, there are large tracts which are only just being opened out. Take the settlers in the great Don Dorrigio country, about which we hear so much. They have sent petition after petition to the Post and Telegraph Department, but to each request a deaf ear has been turned. In these districts, postal and telegraphic conveniences are just as necessary as are good roads, so that the residents may be able to know what is going on in the world, instead of continuing to live like a number of savages. I trust that in the future the Postmaster-General will favorably consider any request for the extension of telephonic or telegraphic conveniences to sparsely-populated districts, and will not ask the applicants to guarantee the working of the lines.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—While it is a very proper thing to consider in the most liberal spirit possible the extension of postal, telegraphic and telephonic facilities in country districts, still it is not wise, I think, to lose sight of the fact that the Post and Telegraph Department pretends to be a commercial institution. We say that in the public interests it is essential for the Commonwealth to have a monopoly of telephonic and telegraphic communication, and postal work generally. While I believe in extending facilities to the little aggregations of people in country districts wherever it is possible, and would even strain a point where the revenue from a proposed line was not likely to meet the expenditure, still the fact that we are not able to grant all the facilities which may be desired by country people is no reason why we should refuse to institute between large centres new developments in means of communication which would be likely to pay. Surely it must be apparent to everyone that if we instituted paying means of communication between large centres like Sydney and Melbourne, the revenue would help us to grant to country districts facilities which, under present circumstances, we are not able to provide. It seems to me that the honorable member for Coolgardie has taken up a rather peculiar attitude. This year, the Department expects to receive a revenue of £247,000 in Western Australia. The ordinary expenditure for the State is £282,000, and, in addition to that sum, new works and buildings to the value of £60,000 are proposed, bringing the total expenditure up to £342,000. In other words, on the postal and telegraphic services in that State there will be a loss of £95,000 odd this year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It strikes me that Western Australia is doing very well.

Mr. WATSON.—It strikes me that Western Australia is doing very handsomely indeed, when the Commonwealth proposes to spend in that State a large proportion of the money which is to be contributed by the residents of other States, particularly on account of new works and buildings.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the people of Western Australia will pay for works in other directions.

Mr. WATSON.—For the provision of new works and buildings in Western Australia, £60,000 is to be contributed, largely on a per capita basis, by the people of other States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We assist to pay for other Federal works.

Mr. WATSON.—It was quite a fortunate thing for Western Australia when the iniquitous system of doing away with the bookkeeping method in regard to new works and buildings was instituted last year ate Treasurer. Perhaps it is only remark that when last year I drew to the manner in which the change operate against the States which had the precaution to make some provision for the past for works and buildings, is hardly an honorable member who raise his voice in support of my

JOHN FORREST.—The people of Australia will have to pay after-

WATSON.—I admit that as soon as transferred Departments have to be made, or arrangements have been made, the interest on the estimated value, justice will right itself, but several years elapse before definite action can be taken, and, during the interval, certain States will reap an advantage at the cost of others. I noticed that the other day the Premier of New South Wales pronounced against this system having been introduced. But it is a curious thing that he waited twelve months or more to go by before making his protest. It would have been much more effective had he made it at the time of the innovation.

JOHN FORREST.—New South Wales will come off very badly.

WATSON.—But she does. She is paying a large amount for works in Western Australia.

JOHN FORREST.—This year she is paying £5,000 to the bad.

WATSON.—Is that all? New South Wales could do very well with that. Although a year or two ago we went to boast of being able to assist the less fortunate States, we are to-day in such a position that £20,000 or £25,000 is of great importance to us. Though it is true that it was inevitable that the bookkeeping system should be abandoned so far as it concerns new works and buildings, I am not at all satisfied for the two or three years during which the bookkeeping system was adhered to, in respect to that class of expenditure, the slightest protest was made by any of the States. They all recognised that, from the constitutional position, it might be as perfectly equitable that until the fixed properties were paid for, each State should be debited with the expenditure within its own borders. I cannot understand how it was that the late Treasurer made no alteration. There was no demand

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The law compelled him to do it.

Mr. WATSON.—It is useless to say that, because if the argument were sound the law should have compelled him to do it two or three years previously.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The difficulty was accentuated in regard to new works, and the system could not continue.

Mr. WATSON.—I am doubtful whether the law did necessitate a change.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is "other" expenditure, not expenditure on transferred services.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a question upon which legal gentlemen are not able to agree.

Mr. McCAY.—Have lawyers differed in their advice with regard to the allocation of "other" expenditure?

Mr. WATSON.—The argument is that we are compelled to put outlay upon new works and buildings on a per capita basis, because it is expenditure on works apart from those in existence when the departments were transferred; and I say that if that argument were sound, we should have to debit on a per capita basis all additional expenditure in connexion with the departments, no matter under what heading it might be.

Mr. McCAY.—Is there an authoritative opinion to that effect?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not know what the honorable and learned member would regard as authoritative.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member led us to infer that legal opinions had been obtained on both sides.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes.

Mr. McCAY.—Has a legal opinion been given to the Commonwealth?

Mr. WATSON.—I cannot say that, but I have heard of opinions from some legal gentlemen. As to whether they have been given to the Treasurer I do not know. But I repeat that no requests were made by any of the States, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that there should be a change. On the contrary, some have protested against it being made. However, the point to which I particularly wished to draw attention was that the honorable member for Coolgardie objected to extra facilities being given to the people of Sydney and Melbourne, whilst the expenditure in Western Australia was cut down.

Mr. MAHON.—The same is the case with Queensland and South Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—In each of those States there is a considerable loss on the working of the Post and Telegraph Department. I say again that when we give to Western Australia extra facilities, costing £95,000 more than the receipts, we are doing a very fair thing by that State—a very fair thing indeed. We are actually spending in that State on postal work and facilities £95,000 more than we are likely to receive.

Mr. MAHON.—Where does that appear?

Mr. WATSON.—In the Estimates for the year. There is another point which the honorable member might consider. This new expenditure for communication between two principal cities of the Commonwealth concerns States in which a large profit is made on the working of the post-office. In New South Wales this year it is estimated that after allowing for all works and buildings expenditure there will be a profit of £73,000. I admit that that does not allow for interest on capital previously expended, but I have not taken that into account in any of these calculations. In Victoria there will be a profit of £40,000. Yet the honorable member objects to an expenditure which it is stated by the officers of the Department will show a further profit.

Mr. MAHON.—Where is that statement as to the profit made?

Mr. WATSON.—It is made by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MAHON.—According to the Estimates there is a loss of only £6,000 on the working of the Department in Western Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—If the honorable member looks up the Estimates he will find that the estimated revenue is £247,000, and the estimated expenditure is £282,000, in addition to which there is an expenditure of £60,000 on new works, buildings, and additions.

Mr. MAHON.—That is not a loss.

Mr. WATSON.—It is all expenditure; it is so much in excess of what we are receiving.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable member ought to add, to get at the true position, the Customs and Defence expenditure in the various States.

Mr. WATSON.—Not at all; I am speaking simply of the postal revenue. If we are justified in retaining the post-office and telegraphs as a Government monopoly, we ought to extend all modern facilities in connexion with them to the people of the chief cities. If we are not prepared to do that, we ought to hand over the post-office and telegraphs to private enterprise. Does any one mean to tell me that in two cities like Melbourne and Sydney, each with a population of over half-a-million, any private company which had the management of this Department, would, for such a length of time, have allowed them to remain without telephonic communication? Yet honorable members argue that we should refuse to give those facilities which a private company would long ago have afforded.

Mr. MAHON.—I do not say that.

Mr. WATSON.—That is the effect of the argument—that because we are not able to do all we should like to do for the outlying districts, we should refuse to extend to the large cities facilities for which they themselves will pay.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable member wants to starve the country districts.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member knows that I do not wish to do anything of the kind. All I say is that we should not refuse to give facilities to the people of the big cities, who are prepared to pay for them at a rate which will give a profit—that we should not refuse those facilities simply because we are not able to provide all the conveniences we should like to provide in the back country.

Mr. MAHON.—Who has estimated the alleged profit?

Mr. WATSON.—The officers of the Department, I understand.

Mr. FRAZER.—Has a guarantee to be given?

Mr. WATSON.—Where the departmental officers estimate that there will be a profit, a line is always provided without a guarantee.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — The honorable member knows that guarantees have been reduced considerably.

Mr. WATSON.—I am glad to say that I know that to be a fact. Before the honorable member for Coolgardie entered the Chamber, I said that I had every sympathy with the extension of postal facilities in the country districts; and the late Postmaster-General, the honorable member for Macquarie, deserves some credit, together with other Postmasters-General before him, for their efforts in that direction. But so long as we make the Post Office a Government monopoly, we should be prepared to conduct it on ordinary business lines; and when our experts say that a telephone line will pay, and pay handsomely, we do an injustice to merchants and others if that line is not constructed.

Mr. PAGE.—Why not give the same facilities in the case of country lines?

Mr. WATSON.—That is already done. There is no difficulty about the construction of any country line which, in the opinion of the departmental officers, will return a profit.

Mr. PAGE.—If that principle had been applied in the past in Queensland, none of the backblocks would have had these facilities.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not say that in every case we should refuse to construct a line that will not pay. All I am saying now is that we are not justified in refusing to construct a line which it is demonstrated will pay. We cannot approve of all non-paying lines if we are to make the Department a success; but as one who desires to see the Post Office continued as a Government institution, I hope the day will never come when the Department will refuse to grant facilities that would be granted by a private company. No one can doubt that a private company would, a considerable time ago, have connected the two populous cities of Melbourne and Sydney by means of a telephone line.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY (Darwin).—The telephone system of Melbourne is absolutely disgraceful. It is the system that Noah employed when reporting the flood.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member will be able to deal with that matter on the next item.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Unless the Government can give me some guarantee that Tasmania is to be provided with a few conveniences which are required in the Postal Department, I shall oppose the expenditure of this money in New South Wales. The honorable member for Coolgardie had a lot to say about the smallness of the expenditure in Western Australia, but I find that for that State the sum of £73,718 is put down, as against £11,196 for Tasmania, though the population of the two States is equal, or nearly equal. I do not say that the honorable member for Coolgardie desires that Western Australia should leave the Union, but that honorable member has received suggestions from members of Parliament in that State that it should secede unless all the facilities they require are provided. Jeff Davis, and the other leaders of the Southern States, determined to retire from the American Union, but after four years of struggle, they were whipped back again, and it may yet be necessary for the Commonwealth to whip States into the Australian Federation. I should insist on the Commonwealth retaining the whole of the revenue to which it is entitled, and expending it in the different States for the benefit of the people of those States. The Commonwealth Government is becoming unpopular mainly because of the provincialism of the various officers who have control of the Commonwealth business in the States. Take, for example, the Deputy Postmasters-General. If, in the State of Tasmania, I desire anything done for the benefit of the people of the backblocks, the Deputy Postmaster-General there opposes the suggestion, however important or necessary it may be. As an illustration, I may say that some time ago I urged that the post-office at Ulverstone should be opened for a quarter of an hour each evening after the arrival of the mail train, so that the letters might be distributed to citizens who were waiting for them. That proposal was opposed by the Deputy Postmaster-General of Tasmania, and months and months elapsed before the late Postmaster-General, the honorable member for Macquarie, gave a trial to the system I had suggested. But what happened? The order was that the post-office should be opened for a quarter of an hour each evening after the arrival of the train, and the order was carried out, but the quarter of an hour was utilized in sorting the mails, and no letters were delivered. I made another appeal to the Postmaster-General, and a peremptory order was sent to Ulverstone that the post-office must be kept open for a quarter of an hour for the delivery of letters to the people. The Deputy Postmaster-General again reported against this convenience. Only lately he sent in another report to the effect that the people did not require it, although a great many of them had petitioned me to try to get the post-office opened for them. The late Postmaster-General insisted that the post-office should be opened, as I suggested, and it is now kept open as a permanent arrangement. One might as well try to get up Niagara Falls in a hickory nutshell as try to get one of these deputy postmasters-general to do anything. This is what makes the Commonwealth Government unpopular in the different States. People will say—"Before Federation we could go to a member of the State Parliament, and he would get these things done for us." We never shall have anything done in this country until some of these high officials are sent to Japan or to Timbuctoo. I suggest to the Postmaster-General that we have now an opportunity to experiment with wireless telegraphy. It is no longer a matter of experiment in the United States. We all know that King Island has no connexion with the mainland of Tasmania or with Victoria, and there are between 700 and 800 people living there. They have mail communication now only once a week. I brought this case before the House long ago, and endeavoured to persuade one of the Commonwealth Governments to induce one of the steam-ship companies to allow a steamer to call there regularly, in order to give the people decent postal facilities, but I was not successful. I now ask the Postmaster-General whether he could not usefully experiment with wireless telegraphy between Burnie and King Island. If the experiment results in failure we need spend no more money on it, but if it is proved to be a success, the system might be used all over the Commonwealth, and it would obviate the necessity of erecting telegraph wires. The matter is worthy of consideration by this House and by the Government. I also suggest that the Commonwealth Government should not hand back to the States any portion of the one-fourth of the revenue to which the Commonwealth is entitled. They should utilize it for the benefit of people in outlying portions of the Commonwealth, in giving them reasonable means of communication with the various important cities. I believe in the establishment of telephonic communication between Melbourne and Sydney. I believe that we should have a system in this country which is now recognised as up-to-date in America. The reason why the majority of people object to Socialism and socialistic government is because we do not make our head officials work. They are lethargic to a degree which suggests the application of a galvanic battery.

Mr. KELLY.—Yet the honorable member supports Socialism.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The system is all right, but the officials do not do the work required of them. What we want in this country is change, and I am beginning to believe that permanency in the Civil Service heads is not a good thing. They have a much better service in America than we have in Australia, although the head public servants there know that they must go out every four years.

Mr. McCAY.—The great bulk of them are now under a Civil Service Act.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Those below a certain grade are. I think it would be well if we could retire a number of the top officials in this country. We might give them pensions and send them round the world, and let their juniors in the service have promotion. We should then have some progress in our Public Service. Everything in the service now is bound up in red tape, and if you wish to get anything done in any of the Departments you may become blue or green mouldy before you obtain what you want. I hope the Postmaster-General will consider my suggestions favorably. I am satisfied that we should have telephonic communication between Melbourne and Sydney. We should have an up-to-date system; but we have here a telephone system which was the system in vogue in America when I left that country sixteen or seventeen years ago. A man rings the bell until he is tired, and then in disgust he decides to visit the man he has tried to ring up.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—If the Commonwealth Government had an unlimited amount of money to spend, I do not suppose there would be any opposition by representatives of other States to the proposal to provide telephonic communication between Melbourne and Sydney. There is an aspect of the question other than that dwelt upon by the honorable member for Bland. It should not be forgotten that the people whose money will be spent in providing this communication between the two most important cities of the Commonwealth are also the owners of the Commonwealth estate. To say that private enterprise would have provided this communication is not to prove that the Commonwealth will be justified in providing it whilst so many other parts of our great estate are so inadequately served in the matter of modern means of communication. It may be urged that this telephone system, if established, would pay working expenses, and even a profit, but there is an indirect profit which should be taken into consideration in providing means of communication with rural districts and the back country parts of the Commonwealth. We hear many professions of the desire which honorable members have that there should be less concentration of our people in cities and more extensive settlement in our country districts. Whilst we make these professions we seem to be willing all the while to pamper those who are concentrated in cities, to the detriment of those who are living in the back-blocks. I cannot complain very much of the way in which my demands for conveniences in my district have been met by the Post and Telegraph Department, but it is a comparatively settled district, and I have some sympathy with those who have gone out to do the pioneering work of settlement in districts where the amenities of social life and the conveniences of civilization are very few. If we have £25,000 or £30,000 to spend in this Department, before we think of spending it in adding to the conveniences which, if not quite up to date, are very nearly so, of the people living in great cities, we should try to provide some conveniences in places that have none at present. That is the view I take, and I should have been better pleased if in these Estimates it had been proposed to spend some money in giving telephonic and telegraphic facilities in districts of the Commonwealth which are only just being opened up to settlement.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—This proposal will make money. It is claimed that this communication will prove profitable.

Mr. WILKINSON.—I would point out to the Treasurer that the Commonwealth benefits by the settlement of people on the land, even though the receipts of the Department from telephone rents and three-pence-in-the-slot telephones may not always cover the cost of providing these services. If the giving of increased telephonic communication leads to greater settlement on the land, our Customs revenue and the land revenue of the States will both increase, while the whole community will benefit in a hundred and one ways. Therefore we should not take into consideration only the payments in hard cash received for services of this kind; the indirect benefits which result must also be remembered. I shall not vote against this proposed extension, but I would rather have seen the money it is proposed to expend to connect the two largest centres of population used to extend the telephone system in rural districts.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—The proposition of the honorable member for Moreton, reduced to its simplest terms, resolves itself into this—that the closely-settled portions of the Commonwealth are not to advance until the sparsely-settled portions have reached the same standard of development.

Mr. WILKINSON.—No; I merely desire that fair play shall be given to all.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member objects to the erection of a telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney while there are outlying portions of the Commonwealth which are without rapid means of communication.

Mr. PAGE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON.—The people in the outlying districts will have to contribute to the cost of this work.

Mr. McCAY. — The people of Melbourne and Sydney contribute a larger proportion of the cost of all public works than do the people residing in sparsely-settled districts. I venture to think that if the proper method of developing communication is adopted, the most populous centres, where profits are most likely to be obtained from these services, should always be a little ahead of, and set the pace for, outlying districts.

Mr. PAGE.—That is all that we want.

Mr. McCAY.—I understand that it is the opinion of officials in the Postmaster-General's Department that a telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne would return a profit of something like 10 per cent.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—After making every allowance, including the estimated loss in receipts from telegrams, it is thought that the proposed line would return a profit of 5 per cent. net from the start.

Mr. McCAY. — That would provide money for the extension of the telephone system in other directions. If State enterprise is to be justified, it must provide facilities of communication where profit is to be earned quite as much as where profit is not to be earned. The proposed telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney will not benefit my constituents, but its erection is, on the figures submitted, a justifiable enterprise. It is one which a private company would certainly undertake, and a State should at least give the facilities which a private company would give to the public. The usual complaint is that the State undertakes too much; but in this instance it is urged that it should do less than a private company would do. If we are not to have long-distance telephones in Australia, the proposed telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney should not be erected, and if we are to have such telephone lines the two largest cities of the Commonwealth are obviously the natural termini of the first of them.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—In addressing myself to items 1 and 7 of subdivision 1, I would remind the honorable member for Bland that the people of the other States were fully aware, prior to Federation, that the postal revenue of Queensland did not cover her postal expenditure, because of the large area over which her population is scattered. I, for instance, represent a constituency about as big as New South Wales, but should the pioneers who have gone out there to extend the bounds of civilization be penalized by being refused means of communication? The large centres of population in the eastern coastal districts have every facility in the way of postal, telegraphic, and telephonic services for rapid communication; but it is very difficult to obtain anything in this way for country districts. Ever since I have been a member of Parliament I have advocated the extension of the telegraph into a certain district, but, although successive Postmasters-General have promised to see if something cannot be done, and although the request has been reduced from a request for a telegraph to a request for a telephone, nothing has been done. What is wanted is telephonic communication between a place on the borders of Cooper's Creek, between Stonehenge and Jundah, and the nearest telegraph office, some forty miles away. I do not say that the line would pay handsomely from the start, but the township which it would serve is on one of the main stock routes of Queensland, and settlement in the neighbourhood is increasing. The residents of the district were quite willing to pay some extra charge if required, but the authorities asked them to enter into a guarantee to pay the interest upon an expenditure of £10,000. They must have known that such a suggestion was preposterous, because there are only about twenty residents, none of whom know how long they will remain there. It would have been much more to the advantage of the people of Queensland if that State had stood out of the Federation, because all the facilities which are now denied to the outlying districts would unquestionably have been granted by the State Government. The honorable and learned member for Corinella says that the proposed telephone between Melbourne and Sydney should be provided, if it will return revenue sufficient to pay interest on the outlay. I quite agree with him, but I think that if such a work as that contemplated prove profitable, the proceeds should be devoted to the provision of telegraphic and telephonic facilities for residents in the remoter settlements. The honorable member for Macquarie, when he was Postmaster-General, promised honorable members that if they left matters in his hands he would be able to meet all their requirements. Upon that understanding, I consented to the Estimates being passed, but I am in the same position to-day that I occupied twelve months ago. I have, therefore, made up my mind that I shall not allow these Estimates to pass unless some guarantee is given that the question of providing telegraph and telephone facilities to the outlying districts will receive consideration. The honorable member for Darwin suggested that wireless telegraphy might be utilized as a means of communication with outlying places, and I would suggest that an experiment with that system might be tried with advantage over the forty miles of rolling downs which separate the two places to which I have referred. The Government apparently have made up their minds to do nothing for the outside districts. They are content to devote their energies to improving the conveniences provided for the people living in the large centres of population, such as Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Townsville, and Fremantle. The money which has been spent in Fremantle alone would have been sufficient to provide for telegraph services to the whole of the outlying districts. The time has arrived for representatives of the country electorates to band themselves together, in order to secure fair treatment. Whenever the interests of the big capitals are affected, the representatives of all the States join forces, and I think that the representatives of the country districts should adopt a similar course. I shall not be content until I am assured that Western Queensland will get a square deal, and, in order to test the feeling of the Committee, I move—

That the item "New South Wales—Construction and Extension of Telegraph Lines, Instruments and Material, £12,000," be reduced by £1.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—Honorable members who are opposing the proposed vote for the construction of a trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne are mistaken in supposing that it has anything whatever to do with the question of the extension of telegraph and telephone services in the country districts. I quite agree with the honorable members who urge that wherever possible telegraph and telephone facilities should be granted to residents in the country, but I do not see that the item now under discussion in any way affects that question. I think it is desirable that we should avail ourselves of the very latest improvements in the means of communication. Honorable members have not failed to secure the construction of telegraph and telephone lines in country districts, because of the improvements which have been made in the metropolitan services. It should be our object to infuse a little life into the Post and Telegraph Department, and to induce our officers to seek new business instead of shirking their work. If we succeed in doing this we shall soon secure all the extensions we require. Although the condenser system has been in operation in other parts of the world for many years, our electrical engineers for a long time steadily declined to avail themselves of it, and now that a step has been taken in the right direction we should encourage them in every way we possibly can. Our officers should keep themselves thoroughly in touch with what is going on elsewhere, and should confer upon us the benefit of the experience gained in the great centres of scientific activity. We are not called upon to experiment for ourselves. We shall do very well if we keep pace with the rest of the world. Long distance telephones have proved successful elsewhere, and I thoroughly approve of the proposal to establish a telephone system between Melbourne and Sydney. We do not need to be assured by the Departmental officers that the line will pay, because common sense suggests that a large amount of business which cannot be very well conducted by means of the telegraph line will be transacted through the telephone. It is not proposed to benefit merely Sydney and Melbourne, but I understand the intention is to extend telephone services from the main trunk line as far as possible to all the towns that can be connected through the principal intermediate stations. If the proposed new line were to be regarded merely as a feeder to the telephone system, it would pay exceedingly well, and therefore I shall give the work my heartiest support. Should this experiment prove successful, telephone connexion between Brisbane and Adelaide will doubtless follow. I contend that it would be wise to erect main telephone lines through the various country districts, and to extend branches from them in almost every direction to complete the system. In short, it would be an advantage if every farmer's house in Australia enjoyed telephonic facilities. It stands to reason that the more revenue we derive from this source, the more money we shall be in a position to expend. Upon some of the long-distance lines connected with Sydney, the subscriber's voice can be heard much more clearly than it can upon other circuits, when he is, perhaps, engaged in speaking to somebody who resides in the next street. In the past we have been too prone to neglect the interests of those who are located in remote districts. The extension of the condenser system has proved a blessing to many people in sparsely populated areas. By means of that system, the ex-Postmaster-General, during his term of office, connected the towns of Cobar and Nymagee, which are sixty-five miles apart, so that it is now possible for mining managers in those places to communicate with each other promptly.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That work did not cost more than about £20.

Mr. SPENCE.—I expect the present Postmaster-General, who has progressive ideas, to go one better than his predecessor, by connecting Cobar with Sydney, from which it is distant some 453 miles. Branch services could then be extended from the main trunk line, and thus the whole of Australia could be connected. I believe that there is a big future for our telephone system, and that its use will not necessarily conflict with that of the telegraph. But even if it entirely superseded the telegraph, I claim that we should employ the best means of communication obtainable.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that the ex-Postmaster-General is to be complimented upon having taken the initiative in installing the condenser telephone system, which has proved such a great success. During the short period that he remained in office, he connected numerous outlying places with the metropolis of Sydney at a very small cost. The revenue which is being derived from these lines is very great indeed. That the present Postmaster-General should have taken the matter up in earnest was only to be expected, seeing that he is such an enterprising man. I trust that he will continue to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor. I hope that he will extend the condenser system in the district which I represent, and which forms the very centre of the electorates in New South Wales. The extension of that system, however, will be impossible, if the amendment proposed be carried, because it will be tantamount to an instruction to the Postmaster-General that the amount of £12,000, which appears upon these Estimates must be materially reduced. The line between Sydney and Cobar, which the honorable member for Darling wishes to see constructed, would, I suppose, form part of the connexion which it is proposed to make between New South Wales and South Australia.

The CHAIRMAN.—I would point out to the honorable member that there is no money provided upon the Estimates for that purpose.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There is a proposed appropriation under "additions, new works, and buildings."

The CHAIRMAN.—That was for last year. I would point out that the amendment was submitted for the purpose of indicating to the Government that they should not proceed with the construction of the proposed telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is so. At the same time, it is impossible to connect Sydney with Melbourne, in the absence of the necessary appliances, and if the proposed vote be decreased by £1 it will constitute an intimation to the Postmaster-General that the expenditure is to be materially reduced. This is merely a technical way of intimating to the Minister that the Committee does not approve of the construction of the line. In the United States of America—the home of electricity—long-distance telephones have proved an immense success, and, judging by the experience of New South Wales, there is very little doubt that this line will pay. Australia is in this respect far behind many other countries that have thoroughly availed themselves of the march of electrical science. Even in Honolulu, nearly every house is connected with the telephone system, while in the outlying parts use is made of the telegraph wires by means of the condenser system. I hope that the Minister will stand by his guns, and oppose a reduction of the item.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—I wish to cast an intelligent vote on this question, and am, therefore, sorry that the Postmaster-General has not shown what income the Department expects to derive from this line.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have referred to it on two occasions.

Mr. STORRER.—The honorable gentleman said that it was estimated that it would yield 5 per cent. net on the capital outlay. In proposing this expenditure, amounting as it does to something like £42,000, the Minister should have explained at the outset what revenue the Department anticipated to derive from the line, and also the extent to which its construction would probably reduce the telegraphic revenue. Had that been done, we should have been able to give an intelligent vote. It must be admitted that this is a large expenditure, having regard to the means of communication that the people of Sydney and Melbourne already enjoy; but if it can be shown that the line will be a paying concern, I shall have no objection to the item. Ministers in charge of the Post and Telegraph Department are usually very careful in dealing with applications for postal and telegraphic services for outlying districts, although they are entitled to special consideration, and we should carefully consider the position of the smaller States before agreeing to this expenditure, unless it can be shown that the undertaking will be a profitable one.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—By leave of the Committee, I wish to withdraw my amendment, and to submit another.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I have listened with considerable interest to the debate on this matter, and must express my surprise that the question of town versus country should have been raised. Since the beginning of the present year something like 400 towns have either been connected with the telephone system, or their connexion with it has been approved.

Mr. PAGE.—Only by means of the condenser system.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We have endeavoured by means of the condenser system to give them a cheap and effective service.

Mr. MAHON.—But nothing has been done for those who are most in need of such a service.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Judging from the letters in the possession of the Postmaster-General, a great many residents of country districts appreciate what has been done for them even by means of the condenser system or other cheap telephone lines. Let me refer to a service recently granted in the electorate of Wide Bay. A proposal was made to construct a telephone line from Brisbane to Gympie, and it was originally estimated that the work would cost £4,800. The estimated revenue to be derived from the line did not warrant such an expenditure, and I therefore approved of an officer, familiar with the condenser system being sent to Brisbane to ascertain whether that system could not be adopted. The result was that the service was granted, by means of the condenser system, at a cost of a little over £100, and the honorable member for Wide Bay will admit that it is working satisfactorily. It would have been impossible to agree to the construction of a line costing £4,800.

Mr. FISHER.—I am always willing to take anything of the kind, and I admit that the service is very good.

Mr. PAGE.—Why did not the Department agree to connect Jundah and Stonehenge?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not know. I know that the present Postmaster-General is not losing sight of the condenser system as a cheap and ready means of serving sparsely-populated districts. As I have said, no less than 400 towns have either been connected with the telephone system, or their connexion with it has been approved during my term of office.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member deserves all credit for that.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I take no special credit for it. I simply did my duty in insisting on the condenser and other cheap telephonic systems, adopted in some other countries, and a few towns here, being extended to hundreds of country towns—about 400 since the first of the year. During the last session I promised honorable members that wherever possible I would extend telegraphic and telephonic facilities to country districts. I agree that we should give those residing in remote parts of the Commonwealth the benefit of any system that will tend to lessen their isolation, for we know the disadvantages under which they labour.

Mr. FISHER.—We had to give a guarantee before the Department would erect a trunk line; but no guarantee was asked in connexion with the service extended by means of the condenser system.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is so.

Mr. FISHER.—Then let us have lines by means of the condenser system.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Under the old system a guarantee of £300 a year was asked in respect of a line estimated to cost, say, £2,500, notwithstanding that the revenue derived from that line might amount to £260 per annum. Under the new system, however, the people concerned are simply asked to give a guarantee in respect of interest which the revenue would not be sufficient to meet. I hold that we have no right to call upon the persons concerned to guarantee the whole of the interest upon the expenditure incurred in erecting a telegraph or telephone line, without regard to the revenue which the Department will receive from it. During my term of office I not only varied the departmental practice in this respect; but by means of the condenser system and the use of trees or fences in place of telegraph poles, I did much to extend telegraphic and telephonic facilities to country residents. In these circumstances, I fail to see why the question of town versus country should be raised. Residents of rural districts will really be served by the construction of a trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne. I would remind honorable members of our experience in connexion with the construction of a telephone line from Sydney to Bathurst. No one would say that that line was erected solely for the convenience of those living at each end. As a matter of fact, a large number of country towns are connected by means of this through telephone, and have the advantage of speaking, not only with Sydney or Bathurst, but with all intermediate stations. And so with the trunk line from Sydney to Melbourne, the intermediate towns will benefit by its construction. Before approving of the inclusion of this item on the Estimates, I carefully discussed it with the accountant and the departmental electrician, and was thoroughly satisfied from the reports I received that it would be a good paying speculation.

Mr. THOMAS.—Why not connect Broken Hill and Adelaide?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall come to that matter presently. It was then suggested that we might erect a light wire between Sydney and Melbourne, but if that suggestion were adopted we could not make an extension in the future to Adelaide or Brisbane. It is now considered that the first cost will be the cheapest in the long run, and that it is desirable to erect a heavier wire between Sydney and Melbourne, so that in the future—and, I hope, at no distant date—an extension could be made to Adelaide, on the one hand, and to Brisbane on the other. If we had a line between Melbourne and Sydney, all the intermediate stations could be connected, and the subscribers could communicate with various centres.

Mr. PAGE.—Of what benefit would that be to people out on the Barcoo?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My honorable friend will not say, for one moment, that because country people happen to be connected by railway they should be denied telephonic facilities. Take large centres like Seymour, Wangaratta, Wodonga, Albury, and Goulburn. If this line between Melbourne and Sydney be constructed, the residents of those centres would be able to "cut in" and talk to various centres.

Mr. WILKINSON.—But they are already provided with a telegraphic service.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My honorable friend must admit that the telephone is an advance upon the telegraph. We have a right to grant the facilities which people prefer to have.

Mr. PAGE.—Let some of the out-back people have the out-of-date arrangement.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Let it not be thought for a moment that I am against the granting of such facilities to country residents.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member is arguing against it all the time.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; the records of the Department will testify to the contrary. I am quite prepared to take my physic like any one else, but when honorable members say that this proposal involves the question of Sydney and Melbourne, as against the country districts, I join issue with them, and say that the erection of the line would be a great convenience to the persons resident in intermediate centres.

Mr. PAGE.—Every one in the Committee agrees with the honorable member, but the people in the way-back places want facilities, too.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I quite agree with my honorable friend. Allowing for the loss on telegraph messages, this line is estimated to give a return of 5 per cent., otherwise the return is estimated to reach 10 per cent.

Mr. STORRER.—What would the working expenses be?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The working expenses could not amount to a large sum. A staff is maintained at Melbourne and Sydney, and at nearly all the intermediate places, like Wagga Wagga, and, therefore, it would not be necessary to employ many additional hands.

Mr. PAGE.—Would not the line have to be maintained?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Between Sydney and Melbourne, the same staff is employed to look after the telegraphic and telephonic services. The employment of one or two additional hands for this line would not entail a large expense. Under the condenser system, telegraph wires are used for telephonic purposes. If we had a metallic circuit between Sydney and Melbourne, on the same principle, and it were found necessary to increase the telegraphic facilities between the two points, the telephone wires could be used for telegraphic as well as telephonic purposes, at very little expense indeed.

Mr. PAGE.—Would it not introduce an element of confusion?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; because the telegraphic wires in many places are used simultaneously for telegraphic and telephonic purposes. There would be no possible risk in so using the special line between Sydney and Melbourne.

Mr. CAMERON.—Could not the present telegraph wires be used for telephonic purposes?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Only on a day when there was not much traffic. On a quiet Sunday I spoke from Sydney, on important business, to one of the officers of the Department at Melbourne, and the experiment was very satisfactory. The question of country extension is not involved in this proposal. I feel sure that the Committee will sanction any fair and legitimate expenditure for the purpose of giving telephonic communication to country towns.

Mr. FISHER.—What objection is there to carrying out this proposal on the guarantee principle?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What necessity is there to resort to that method when it can be seen from the returns that the line would pay?

Mr. CAMERON.—We cannot believe the returns.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — We have only to use our common sense to realize that a telephone line connecting Sydney and Melbourne, and serving all the large towns between those points, must be a paying speculation. I remember that when I was discussing the matter with the electrical engineer here, he said that he would not mind investing some money if it were a commercial undertaking.

Mr. FISHER.—We always hear that sort of remark when a thing is being mooted.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — I have not formed that opinion of our public officers. I believe that, as a rule, public officers are very keen critics, and try to advise a Minister in the right direction. They are paid to perform a public duty, and have a right to express an honest opinion.

Mr. PAGE.—They are frequently advocates of the policy of doing nothing.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — A Minister should encourage his officers to furnish him with a true and honest report, and if he disagrees with a recommendation he must take the responsibility of his action. I believe this expenditure is quite justifiable, because it would be reproductive, apart from the fact that the line would connect two large centres, and would enable the Government to connect Melbourne with Adelaide and Sydney with Brisbane, and possibly to connect many other centres, such as Gympie with Sydney, and even Melbourne.

Mr. PAGE.—Will the honorable member tell us why, when he was Postmaster-General, he did not consent to the construction of a telephone line between Broken Hill and Adelaide?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am afraid that the Chairman would rule me out of order if I were to discuss that question. I will leave the honorable member for Barrier to answer it. I trust that the Committee will consent to the proposal under consideration.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—I intend to support the amendment of the honorable member for Maranoa, believing that a guarantee should be obtained. I wish particularly to remind the Government that on Friday I gave notice of an amendment to test the principle whether post-offices should be constructed by means of a charge upon the State or on a per capita basis. I wish to know when I am to have my opportunity.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member can test the question when we are taking the Western Australian votes.

Mr. CAMERON.—That must be distinctly understood.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Certainly.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—On Friday I asked for the postponement of this item in order to have an opportunity to make inquiries and to read the official reports. I do not share the feelings of those who have expressed a fear that the construction of this work will interfere with the extension of telephonic communication in the country districts. As far as I can judge, it will be a profitable undertaking, and it also offers the possibility of the extension of telephones to intermediate stations. But I wish to direct the attention of the Postmaster-General to this point. He is aware that numerous applications are made to the Department for telephonic and telegraphic communication in the country districts. In the case of applications from some parts of my district that are pretty well settled, the people interested are not able to get any satisfaction from the Department. As far as I can learn, when such applications are made a report is furnished, showing that from the departmental point of view there is no justification for undertaking the work. In one or two cases the applicants have inquired what guarantee is required by the Department. These applications have not elicited a reply. That is not justice, and it is not business. Where people are prepared to put down the money the Department does not deal fairly with them in pigeon-holing their application. With regard to the work under discussion, while it may lead to a decrease of telegraphic business, I do not look upon that as material, because the telephone caters for a class of business that is not generally done by telegraph. But what I fear will happen is this: When a profit is shown on the trunk line a demand will be made for the reduction of the rate, and the Postmaster-General will be too plastic in the hands of the applicants. In the estimate furnished to us no account is taken of the wearing out of the poles, and of the cost of repairing or reconstructing the line at some future date. Nor are such facts considered when applications are made to reduce the rate.

Mr. WILKINSON.—We are told that the profits are to go towards the extension of country lines.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There is no hope under our system of administration of making a profit. Has a profit ever been made out of our railways or our Post Office?

Mr. McCAY.—There may be a profit on a section.

Mr. KENNEDY.—As soon as there is a profit on a section, there is a clamour for the reduction of the rate.

Mr. McCAY.—When the rates are uniform that cannot happen.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I fear that, by the reduction of the rate, a profit will be prevented, with the result that the loss so occasioned will be used as an argument against the extension of the telephone system to remote districts. The estimate in this case is 6s. for three minutes' conversation. As soon as it can be shown that there is a profit, after paying interest and maintenance on the line, there will be a demand to reduce the rate to 4s. The fact that the reduction of the rate has caused a loss will be lost sight of when applications are made to connect remote places with intermediate stations on the trunk line. I am perfectly satisfied, however, after the inquiries I have made, that there is ample justification for this expenditure, and that, so far from hampering the extension of telephone facilities to intermediate stations, it will increase the possibility of such connexions being made.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The view that I take of this proposal is that, as many of the principal cities of the world are connected by telephone—as there are telephone lines between Paris and Berlin, and Chicago and New York, for instance—it is high time that Melbourne and Sydney were connected in the same way. But the point about which I particularly wish to speak is this: Compliments have been paid to the present Postmaster-General and the ex-Postmaster-General on the use of the condenser system, which has enabled telephones to be extended to remote districts at a cheap rate. The old system was prohibitive, but the condenser system has reduced the cost considerably. That is complimentary to the ex-Postmaster-General, because he seized upon the idea, and it is a further compliment to the present Postmaster-General, who has seen the wisdom, from a business stand-point, of continuing the system.

Mr. FISHER.—The system was initiated in Tasmania.

Mr. WILKS.—The departmental officers have been complimented to-day; but it must not be forgotten that while, for many years, this system has been known and utilized in the old world, the taxpayers of Australia in the pre-Federal days, and also in Federal days, have been deprived of its advantages, through the negligence, to say the very least, of those officers who have thus caused large sums of money to be ruthlessly expended in the construction of telephones under the old system. I should like to hear either the ex-Postmaster-General or the present Postmaster-General explain this apparent neglect or want of knowledge on the part of departmental officers.

Mr. FISHER.—The system was applied in Tasmania years ago.

Mr. WILKS.—But it was not applied on the mainland.

Mr. THOMAS.—The departmental officers on the mainland said that the system was impossible, while it was actually in operation in Tasmania.

Mr. WILKS. — This is no personal matter with me, because, so far as I can remember at the present moment, I am not acquainted with any of the officers concerned; but, in my opinion, this is the time to ventilate what is really a serious charge.

Mr. FISHER.—Remit the question to a committee, and ascertain whether the condenser system is effective.

Mr. WILKS.—Such occurrences tend to make one look most carefully into the statements of departmental officers. If the neglect be proved, or admitted, the officers should receive a severe "jacketing," if no further punishment, from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. THOMAS (Barrier).—I rise to support the proposal to erect the trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney, and to express the hope that the amendment will not be accepted. As the representative of a country district, I am opposed to guarantees being asked for in such districts; because, in my opinion, the Postmaster-General, or the Department, should decide whether a telephone line should or should not be provided.

The CHAIRMAN.—That matter may be dealt with on another item.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I am sorry that the question town versus country has been introduced into this discussion. If I remember rightly, I was one of the first, if not the first, last Friday, to ask for additional information on this proposal before I, as a metropolitan representative, would be prepared to vote. The Postmaster-General has assured us that according to the departmental officers this proposed trunk line will pay, but honorable members representing country districts say that the officers are wrong in their estimate—that they have probably exaggerated the amount of revenue which will be obtained. Many honorable members, however, have from time to time said that the departmental officers have under-estimated the amount of revenue which would be obtained from proposed country telephone lines, and have used that as an argument why no guarantee should be exacted. I know that if an ordinary citizen in Melbourne or suburbs desires to have his place of business connected with the telephone system, and there is no line running past his premises, he is compelled to pay two years' rental in advance. It appears to me that the Department is only applying the principle which has been advocated by honorable members. I believe that the reports of the officers are correct, and I trust that honorable members will agree to the item.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I resent the remarks of the honorable member for Yarra. The honorable member ought to quote the remarks which he says I made, because I feel sure that I never made them. "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander"; and if small communities and private individuals are called upon for guarantees, the same rule should hold good in the case of large communities. In an out-back electorate, if telegraph or telephone facilities are desired, the municipal council, the shire council, or the divisional board is called upon, not to give a written guarantee, but to put down actual cash. If regulations are made, they ought to be applied impartially to large communities and to small and scattered communities. The honorable member for Macquarie, when he became Postmaster-General, promised to do anything and everything for the people in the country, and I, like the fool I am, took him at his word. We have been told the same tale year in and year out by successive Ministries; and yet the ex-Postmaster-General has the effrontery to now say, "I have done more for the country than any other Postmaster-General." I admit that the ex-Postmaster-General has done much in connexion with telephone communication by means of telegraph lines; and if the condenser system is so effective, why not try it on the proposed line, and save £30,000 or £40,000?

Mr. TUDOR.—The line is too long.

Mr. PAGE.—Then let there be short circuits. If the condenser system is good enough between Gympie and Brisbane, it ought to be good enough between Melbourne and Albury.

Mr. TUDOR.—We cannot reduce the distance.

Mr. PAGE.—Anything can be done in these days, and my suggestion could be carried out by means of stations with stronger batteries. If it is such a good system as the late Postmaster-General has claimed, let it be applied to this line. I have no opposition to the line merely because it is between Sydney and Melbourne, but I think this proposal should be treated in the same way as are others of the same kind. I would ask every representative of a country district to demand that the same conditions should be carried out in connexion with this line as would be insisted on if they applied for a line in their own electorates.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I think that the late Postmaster-General did good work in extending the condenser system. There were officers in the Department who had undertaken work of this kind to enable telephonic facilities to be given, especially in Tasmania, at less expense than they could otherwise have been provided for. That the honorable member for Macquarie, while officially connected with the Post and Telegraph Department, extended that system is to the honorable gentleman's credit. I hope that it will be further extended. No doubt all officials are, to a certain extent, conservative, and every expert naturally desires that the service inaugurated by him shall be the best in the world. But conditions in Australia are quite different from those existing in older countries where there are large centres of population at short distances apart. We have here a sparsely populated country, and our people have greater need of telephonic and telegraphic facilities than those in older and more thickly populated countries. We must economize, and must endeavour to give the fullest facilities we can with the money at our command. For that reason, I think that the condenser system should be availed of to the fullest possible extent. At the same time, I do not contend that it is practicable to apply this system to telephonic communication between Sydney and Melbourne.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member for Macquarie says it is.

Mr. THOMAS.—Who is to pay for it?

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member for Barrier seems exceedingly anxious to have this communication provided, whether it pays or does not.

Mr. THOMAS.—I am going by the report which says that it will pay.

Mr. FISHER.—There is a great deal to be said for the contention of the honorable member for Maranoa, that there should be only one system throughout the Commonwealth in these matters. I know that when I ask for telephonic communication, the Minister peremptorily demands a guarantee.

Mr. THOMAS.—I am against that.

Mr. FISHER.—That may be so, but the honorable member does not happen to be Postmaster-General. If he were, and then said that he was against guarantees, the position would be altered.

Mr. THOMAS.—It is for this House to decide whether guarantees shall be demanded or not.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member must be aware that it is the Minister who decides where a guarantee shall be demanded, and there is no appeal from him.

Mr. THOMAS.—If this House were to say there should be no guarantee demanded, does the honorable member mean to say that the Minister would ask for one?

Mr. FISHER.—The Minister would then be in a position to say: "We have no money to build this line."

Mr. THOMAS.—That is another question.

Mr. FISHER.—It comes to practically the same thing.

Mr. TUDOR.—That would put country districts in a still worse position.

Mr. FISHER.—Do not honorable members see that the effect would be the same? We have heard very little of any agitation in Melbourne or in Sydney for this telephonic communication. Who are the persons who have deputationized the Government on the matter? Who are the people who have appealed to Parliament by petition or otherwise for this convenience for Sydney and Melbourne? We have heard nothing of them. There can be no doubt that those who have had the administration of the government of the Commonwealth have had the interest of these great cities at heart. We have had evidence of that in more than one contract and in more than one proposal which has come before this Parliament. I am entirely in favour of telephonic communication wherever it can be shown to be advisable; but I think that the evidence submitted in support of this proposal is insufficient to warrant its being carried out without a guarantee. The two great cities of Melbourne and Sydney should not find it difficult to comply with conditions which are imposed on very much smaller centres of population, where one would expect that the people would be less able to show that telephonic communication would be likely to prove profitable.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—I rise to support the proposal of the Postmaster-General for the establishment of telephonic communication between Sydney and Melbourne. So far as a guarantee is concerned, I think I am correct in saying that even in country districts, where it is thought that a telephone will pay, it has been provided without a guarantee.

Mr. PAGE.—That is not my experience.

Mr. FULLER.—I am giving my own experience. Shortly after the establishment of Federation I made an application for telegraphic communication between Wollongong, the great coal centre of the Illawarra district, and the metropolis of Sydney. The officers engaged to report on the line estimated that it would cost £3,100, and I was asked by the then Postmaster-General, Senator Drake, to put down a cash guarantee of £750. The trouble in providing a guarantee of that sort is to say who is to put his hand into his pocket to find the money. What is every one's business is no one's business.

Mr. THOMAS.—Can the honorable and learned member for Illawarra deal with guarantees now? You, Mr. Chairman, ruled me out of order when I did so.

The CHAIRMAN.—I understand that the honorable and learned member for Illawarra merely wishes to say that, instead of insisting on a guarantee, the Department, in the case to which he alludes, ultimately instituted a telephone on the condenser system. Any discussion as to the advisability of requiring a guarantee for the proposed trunk line between Sydney and Melbourne would be out of order on this item, as anticipating the discussion on item No. 7.

Mr. FULLER.—I am merely answering the honorable member for Maranoa, and trying to show that in some instances telephone lines have been erected in country districts without a guarantee being required. In the case to which I am referring the colliery proprietors of the district were prepared to put down £250 of the £720 asked for, but it was impossible to get the balance. When the honorable member for Denison became Postmaster-General I submitted the matter to him, and he, after consultation with his officers, reduced the guarantee to £425. It was impossible, however, to raise that amount; but subsequently, when the honorable member for Macquarie became Postmaster-General, and I again submitted the matter, he was able to authorize the granting of communication by means of the condenser system, at a cost of £65, instead of the £3,100 which was the amount of the original estimate for erecting a separate wire. The present arrangement is so good that, in speaking the other day from Sydney to the Mayor of Wollongong, at a distance of fifty-three miles, I found that I could hear and be heard as easily as when speaking through my own telephone at Neutral Bay to another subscriber on the central exchange. I know of other similar instances in my own constituency, and in those of other honorable members, in which the late Postmaster-General did all that he could, when a proper case was made out, to increase telephonic communication in country districts.

Mr. FISHER.—In my constituency a line on the condenser system, 100 miles in length, answers very well indeed.

Mr. FULLER.—The present Postmaster-General is extending the telephone connexion from Wollongong to Kiama, another twenty-five miles, with a view to a further extension to Jervis Bay, if the Kiama connexion be a success. As honorable members know, telephonic communication between Jervis Bay and Sydney would be of great service for defence purposes. In connexion with the erection of a telephone between the silver mines at Burragorang and Sydney, trees were in many cases used instead of poles to carry the wire. In years gone by, as has been pointed out by other honorable members, the departmental officers always tried to carry out public works in the best style possible, so that they might be pointed to with admiration; but the last Postmaster-General got away from the old system, and deserves great credit for the economy which has thus been effected. The present Postmaster-General, who also represents a country constituency, and understands the wants of the pioneers and producers of the interior, will, I feel sure, carry on the good work of his predecessor. The proposed telephone between Sydney and Melbourne must be looked upon purely as a business concern. The only question to be asked concerning it is, Would the line pay? If the Postmaster-General has satisfied himself on that head, I feel sure that we ought to support the proposal, and every honorable member who has gone into the matter must be of the opinion that the line would pay.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—I wish to inform the Committee that the most complete investigation of this proposal shows that, after allowing for possible loss of telegraphic receipts, amounting to, say, £1,900 a year—

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The amount is an unknown quantity.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Yes, and it must be remembered that the telephone picks up business which is not done by the telegraph, as a rule. After making that allowance, we expect to obtain a net profit of over 5 per cent. from this work, which makes it a good business arrangement. With regard to the demand that a guarantee should be asked for, I would like to know from whom a guarantee could be required?

The CHAIRMAN.—That question can be discussed only under item No. 7.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—As honorable members may think that too much reliance is being placed upon the departmental estimate, I would point out that, after the telephone line from Geelong to Melbourne was opened in 1899, it returned only £129 2s. per annum, but the revenue has gone on increasing, until, in 1904, it amounted to £1,661 11s. 2d. The Ballarat to Melbourne line was opened in 1899, and in five years its revenue grew from £811 17s. 3d. to £1,821 9s. 3d. The Bendigo to Melbourne line was opened in 1900, and its revenue has grown from £505 11s. per annum to £1,259 10s. 2d. last year. Those figures are convincing evidence of the fact that as soon as the public realizes the convenience of these telephones their use increases by leaps and bounds.

Mr. MAHON.—Has not the expenditure upon these lines increased in the same ratio as the receipts?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—How could it do so? The honorable member appeared to maintain that if the proposal to connect Sydney and Melbourne by telephone were agreed to, the vote for country telephones would be starved, but that is not so. If the honorable member will look at last year's Estimates, he will see that in every State last year we had plenty of money in hand, and, as a matter of fact, the general complaint in this Chamber was that it was not being expended.

Mr. THOMAS.—I asked for a small telephone line, and I did not get it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am assured by the officers of my Department that there is plenty of money for carrying on these services.

Mr. PAGE.—I shall be round at the Minister's office to-morrow.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If honorable members can suggest extensions which are likely to pay as well as the line between Sydney and Melbourne will pay, I think there will be no difficulty about getting them carried out. Reference was made by the honorable member for Coolgardie to a telephone line to Black Range. The erection of that line has been estimated to cost £4,920, while the revenue would be only £168, leaving a shortage of £577.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the estimate of cost is terribly high.

Mr. MAHON.—Yes, for the erection of 100 miles of wire. I received a lower estimate than that. The Postmaster-General's figures relate to a telegraph line, whereas a telephone line would be sufficient.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I can only give the Committee the figures which are supplied to me. The Treasurer says that the estimate is too high. Since I became Minister I have had to refuse one or two requests which I pressed upon the Department when a private member. An application was made by honorable members from Western Australia for a telephone service at Fitzroy River, which would have involved an expenditure running into thousands of pounds, whereas the revenue would probably not have amounted to even hundreds of pounds. There is no money available for the construction of such lines. A guarantee could not be given in the case of the proposed trunk line between Sydney and Melbourne, because the Department took up the work of its own accord. It was thought that a good chance was presented to make money, seeing that additional means of communication were required between two great cities. The officers, after making the most careful inquiries, came to the conclusion that the line would pay, and that revenue would be derived that would probably enable the Department to spend money in providing telegraph and telephone services for other places. Some question has been raised with regard to the expenditure per capita upon new works in the different States, and I should like to point out that neither New South Wales nor Victoria will be starved from that stand-point. I find that of the amounts provided for new telephone and telegraph works, New South Wales will get £7,233; Victoria, £16,807; Queensland, £8,314; and Tasmania, £3,119, under the per capita proportion. South Australia is allotted £2,842, and Western Australia will get £32,631 above the per capita proportion. I have no objection to that, because I think that if these works are necessary, they should be constructed. As was remarked by the honorable member for Coolgardie, in a State like Western Australia, where new mining centres are springing up, new lines must be constructed and new buildings erected. I think that if the law of averages is allowed to operate, there need not be very much difficulty in connexion with the per capita distribution of expenditure. Honorable members referred to a number of other matters, particularly to the guarantees required in connexion with the construction of country telephone wires. I should like to say that the Department have to pursue a cautious policy in regard to the extension of telephone services, because, if we did not look carefully into the proposals, we should very soon land ourselves in a financial muddle. When honorable members speak of what was done in Western Australia a few years ago, they appear to forget that the State Government then had large loan funds at its disposal, whereas we have to construct all works out of revenue. If the Post and Telegraph Department is to be run on commercial principles—I admit that the question whether it should be so administered is open to debate—it will be difficult to carry out works that offer no prospect of becoming remunerative. As I explained last week, our policy is not to adhere to any hard-and-fast rule with respect to guarantees, if it can be shown that there is some reasonable prospect of the proposed line becoming a paying concern. If we find that we are likely to incur a small loss on lines which it is highly desirable to construct, whilst we can assure ourselves of a profit in connexion with others, such as the proposed trunk line between Melbourne and Sydney, we can strike an average, and make the profitable line recoup us for the losses which we incur upon such services as have been referred to by the honorable member for Maranoa.

Mr. MAHON.—Will the Minister say whether he would be prepared to approach the Western Australian Government and ask them to allow these works to be constructed out of surplus revenue and charged as expenditure incurred prior to Federation?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — That course has been advocated; but I think that if we approached any State Government and asked it to consent to our withholding from it any larger sum than we now retain it would not receive the request favorably. The Government must take into consideration the finances of the States in order to avoid seriously embarrassing the States Treasurers.

Mr. MAHON.—But it is optional with the Commonwealth Government to appropriate the surplus revenue.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Perhaps so; but we must be careful to move slowly in a matter of that kind, lest we embarrass the States. If honorable members will turn to last year's Estimates they will see that there is no necessity to adopt the course suggested, because in many cases not more than 40 per cent. of the money voted was expended. All that the Department desire is to look at these matters from a reasonable commercial stand-point. If they do not consider that a line is likely to pay from the outset they ask for a guarantee from those interested. The amount of the guarantee was considerably reduced by my immediate predecessor, and also, I believe, by the honorable member for Coolgardie, and there is every desire to carry out these works as far as possible.

Mr. THOMAS.—If the works are constructed they will find work for the people.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am in favour of finding work for the people; but I desire that it shall be profitable work. With regard to the suggestion of the honorable member for Darwin that the wireless telegraphic system should be resorted to in order to establish communication with King Island, I can only say that we are very carefully considering the question of making use of that system, and that there is no reason why we should not make an experiment in the direction the honorable member suggests if we can do so at reasonable cost. We shall, however, have to select our localities with a view to economy. I was sorry to hear the honorable member for Moira say that a number of applications sent in by him had been pigeonholed, and that he could get no reply to an offer by some residents in his district to give a guarantee in connexion with the construction of a telephone line. I can assure the honorable member that if he will supply me with particulars of the case to which he refers a reply shall be sent. Wherever there is any prospect of a line proving payable we are prepared to accept a guarantee from those interested in it. In some cases, however, we cannot accept a guarantee. For instance, if we were asked to construct a telephone line, and the officers reported that it was never likely to pay, we could not accept a guarantee. We cannot obtain indefinite guarantees, and we do not think that we are justified in incurring liabilities which are likely to prove a burden to the community generally. I need hardly say that the other matters to which honorable members have referred will receive my careful attention. With regard to the contention that telephonic communication between Melbourne and Sydney should be established on the condenser system, I would point out that the officers report that that would not be practicable because the distance is too great.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I have no desire to prevent the construction of any telephone line which is likely to prove remunerative. At the same time, it seems very unfair that the expenditure upon these works should be charged upon a per capita basis, seeing that the respective States in which they are erected alone benefit by the revenue derived from them. In passing, I may mention that in Queensland the condenser system was in vogue prior to Federation. The Engineer of Telegraphs, Mr. Hesketh, I believe, had developed that system very considerably there. I know that persons who were called upon to use the telephone some six or ten miles out of Brisbane often experienced a good deal of trouble as the result of the operation of the condenser system, which has now been extended to the other States. Whilst that system is better than nothing, it is far from being perfect. I am sure that if we can obtain a perfect service, without resort to the condenser system, we shall be glad to use it. In the meantime communication by means of the latter system is better than no means of communication at all.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—After the touching appeal by the Postmaster-General to honorable members in the corner, I am very glad to support him in opposition to their demands. The main trouble this afternoon seems to be connected not so much with the question raised by the honorable member for Maranoa as with that which was mentioned by the honorable member for Coolgardie. I refer to the proposed telegraph line to Black Range. For a time it seemed as though we should experience considerable difficulty in solving the problem presented to us. The Postmaster-General, however, with his usual readiness, discovered an original way of overcoming the trouble. He suggested to the Treasurer that his well known love for Western Australia might enable him to devise some means of surmounting the difficulty created by the departmental insistence upon the 10 per cent. deposit. I understand that the cost of the line in question would be about £5,000, so that a deposit of 10 per cent. would represent only a very small contribution on the part of the State to which the right honorable gentleman owes so much. Honorable members in the corner, who object to the payment of the sum of £4,000—

Mr. PAGE.—To which "corner" does the honorable member refer? There are no members of the Labour Party in the "corner." We are all in the open.

Mr. KELLY.—I am referring to those honorable members who have addressed themselves to this question. But honorable members there are not always in the open. The original complaint against allocating various sums to lines such as that upon which it is proposed to expend £4,000 came from members of the Labour Party, who desire—before these lines are built—the development of their own districts by telephonic communication. I wish to point out that the Treasury is not a milch cow. It cannot undertake to provide money for lines which are not likely to prove remunerative. It has been shown that this line will return 10 per cent. upon its capital cost from the outset, or 5 per cent. after allowing for the decreased revenue which will be derived from the telegraphic lines with which it will compete.

Mr. FISHER.—Some of us have heard that statement before.

Mr. KELLY.—The assertion has been made by responsible Ministers. Do honorable members in the corner mean to tell me that the present Postmaster-General is not responsible? Surely those who advocate Socialism so strenuously should welcome an investment by the State which will yield so good a return as 5 per cent. I wish to appeal to the patriotic spirit of those honorable members who have raised all the fuss this afternoon. Let them consider for a moment what would happen to any democracy in which the desire of every representative in Parliament was to obtain from the Treasury as large an expenditure as he could upon the district which elected him. If such a state of things became common in any democracy, every honorable member would be elected solely on account of what he could secure from the Treasury. Similarly, every Ministry would be chosen on account of what it could give to honorable members. As a result, within a very short period, we should experience that national bankruptcy which has always been associated with the views of my friends in the corner. Having made these few conciliatory remarks, I do not propose to say anything further in regard to the proposed line between Melbourne and Sydney.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—In listening to the little lecture which has just been delivered by the honorable member for Wentworth, as to what honorable members desire on behalf of their own constituents, I was very much amused. There is no doubt that he is a true representative of Sydney.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The honorable member himself is not a bad representative of Queensland.

Mr. PAGE.—If I do not voice the opinions of my own constituents, I am certain that the honorable member for Wentworth will not do so. I do not object to the proposed expenditure upon this line, but I contend that it should be placed upon the same plane as other lines throughout the Commonwealth. I therefore move—

That the item, "New South Wales, portion of trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne, £19,000," be amended by inserting after the word "Sydney" the words "to be built on the guarantee principle."

Question—That the words "to be built on the guarantee principle" proposed to be inserted in item 7, subdivision 1, be so inserted—put. The Committee divided.

(Question so resolved in the negative.

Motion negatived.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I presume that honorable members, when they voted to secure the application of the guarantee principle in this case, were simply entering a protest against the action of the Department in requiring a guarantee from the applicants for telephone lines in country districts. If so, I thoroughly appreciate the reason which influenced their votes. I feel that if a line should be constructed, the Department ought not always to ask for a guarantee from the applicants. But if we intend to construct all these lines out of revenue, we shall have to wait a very long time indeed before many necessary works can be constructed. It is not quite fair to debit the whole cost of a line against one year's revenue, when possibly it would pay for itself in the course of eight or ten years. I think it is the duty of the Ministry of the day to see what amount they could properly expend in this direction each year. Are we to wait until the revenue is sufficient to enable us to construct all the lines which are needed, or are we to deal with certain lines, and borrow the necessary money for their construction? In this particular case, we are asked to appropriate the sum of £19,000 out of this year's revenue, and we have the assurance that the line will pay for itself in about ten years. I am told that, after allowing for the interest on the outlay and the cost of working expenses, the return will be about 10 per cent. If that estimate is at all reliable, it does seem ridiculous that the whole cost of the line should be charged against the revenue for this year, because in so far as we pursue that policy, so much the less money shall we have to spare for granting telephonic communication elsewhere.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Does the honorable member suggest that a loan should be raised for this purpose?

Mr. CONROY.—Certainly. If there be a number of works which, if constructed, would yield a return of 10 per cent., it is certainly very foolish on the part of the Commonwealth to delay the raising of a loan, because otherwise we might have to wait a very long time indeed for such works to be constructed.

Mr. BAMFORD.—This year the Commonwealth will return a surplus of £400,000 to the States.

Mr. CONROY.—It is high time for the Parliament to reconsider its determination on this point. We all know that it is highly unpopular at the present time to talk about borrowing money, but the real objection is not to the raising of a loan, but to the application of the money. If in past times States Parliaments have applied loan money badly, that is a very good ground indeed for condemning their action; but it is not a good ground for objecting to all future loan proposals. We are rapidly approaching a time when we will have to consider whether we ought not to raise a loan to carry out works necessary to the development of the Commonwealth. During the last three or four years, the construction of many necessary works has been delayed, simply because we have declined to consider any proposition in this direction. Judging from the present feeling of honorable members, there does not appear to be much prospect of a Loan Bill being passed by this Parliament. It seems to me, however, that such a measure will be necessary, and that there could be no objection to it if we made provision for a reasonable sinking fund. If we are going to defer the carrying out of many urgent works until the necessary funds can be provided out of revenue, very great delay must occur. The position is, that whilst we are refraining from borrowing, the States Governments are not exercising that great care of their finances that many would desire, and that we cannot prevent them from floating whatever loans they please. They may go on squandering the whole of the real assets of Australia, and yet the Commonwealth is not to raise a loan in order to carry out many services urgently required in connexion with the Postal and Telegraph Department. Why should we delay to construct works that are estimated to yield a good return? The officers of the Post and Telegraph Department assure us that there are many proposed works that would earn up to 7 per cent., and even 10 per cent., on the capital expenditure, and yet, owing to lack of funds, we cannot carry them out.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Estimates are often wrong.

Mr. CONROY.—That must always be so, but, in the majority of cases with which we are called upon to deal, we can make sure that, so far as human judgment can go, the Estimates with which we are supplied are reasonably correct. I, therefore, think it is necessary for us to reconsider the whole position, and I hope that before next year's Estimates are submitted, the Ministry may see their way to determine whether our capacity to carry out much-needed works should be limited, as at present.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We did not expend all that was voted last year.

Mr. CONROY.—In many cases, the apparent savings on votes for telephone lines represent the difference between the cost of copper wire and that of installing the service by means of the condenser system. The right honorable gentleman, as a private member, must be aware of the great difficulty we have experienced in securing either telegraphic or telephonic extensions. Lest it might be inferred that I am recommending the adoption of a loan policy by the Commonwealth Parliament, I think it desirable to explain that, in my opinion, borrowing should not be resorted to unless shown to be absolutely necessary. In view of the ample returns that some of the proposed works would give, we have to consider whether we shall not have to fall back, to a certain extent, upon a loan policy, on the lines I have indicated. I hope to see such an extension of the telephone system that it will be installed wherever there is a telegraph line. In my own electorate, for example, there are three or four large centres of population doing business for the most part with Goulburn, which might have telephonic communication with that city by means of the condenser system. In the same way, telephonic communication might be established between some of the smaller towns and Yass, Young, Cootamundra, and other places. The cost would not be great, for it would be necessary to use copper wire only in the erection of a few trunk lines. I thoroughly agree with the remarks made by the honorable member for Coolgardie, as to the degree to which settlement might be encouraged by means of the extension of our telephone system, and I hold that it should be our endeavour to connect all country districts in this way. I hope that the Postmaster-General will not hesitate to ask the Committee to pass whatever votes are necessary to give us a full development of the telephone service. During the last three or four years it has been almost impossible to secure any extension of it. In support of this contention, I could cite at least half-a-dozen cases, in addition to those mentioned by the honorable member for Coolgardie, that have occurred in my own electorate, and I dare say that other honorable members could also bring forward instances in which much needed extensions of the system have been refused. I trust that in these circumstances the Postmaster-General will do all that he can in this direction to enlarge the sphere of usefulness of his Department.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I do not know what weight the Treasurer attaches to the suggestion made by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, that we should carry out new works by means of loan moneys; but I desire to say that I am emphatically opposed to such a policy, and trust that the Government will hesitate a long time before agreeing to its initiation. The honorable and learned member's statement that, whilst the Commonwealth was refraining from raising loans to carry out these works, the States were able to borrow, and could squander loan moneys as they pleased, is really an argument in favour of a non-borrowing policy on the part of the Union. Had we not adopted that policy from the very establishment of Federation, the financial condition of the States would have been very much worse than it is.

Mr. CONROY.—Is not the honorable member confusing "borrowing" with "squandering"?

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable and learned member's political experience is confined to this Parliament; but I have been a member of a State Parliament which was not averse to the raising of loans for public works, and can say unhesitatingly that I have never heard of a proposition, no matter how outrageous, to spend money that was not said by its supporters to be in respect of an absolutely reproductive work. Those seeking expenditure of loan money are always ready to assert that the work to which it is to be devoted is sure to be reproductive, but as soon as the vote has been agreed to a different attitude is assumed. The honorable and learned member has said very truly that a non-borrowing policy has restricted our operations, but I am sure that the late Postmaster-General will agree with me that the works which we have constructed out of revenue have been done, perhaps, 40 per cent. cheaper than would have been the case had they been constructed out of loan money. The condenser system about which so much has been said this afternoon, was introduced really because of lack of funds to erect trunk lines. There is a very old saying that Parliamentary gods very seldom know what revenue there is in economy, and I would remind the honorable and learned member for Werriwa that the system of paying for works out of revenue means economy in administration. Furthermore, I venture to say that the attitude of the Federal Parliament has had a salutary influence on the States Parliaments. I know that the Parliament of Queensland has refrained from borrowing largely on account of that influence. Undoubtedly for some years past the people of my State have had to suffer, and are still suffering, from the non-expenditure of loan money. But within a very few years their position will be infinitely better. They are actually paying their way out of revenue now. I trust that the Government will not inaugurate a loan policy for the Commonwealth, but will proceed cautiously and quietly. I venture to say that to enter upon a borrowing policy would be to reverse the pledges that many of us have given to our constituents. If there is one thing as to which I have claimed that credit can be given to this Parliament it is that it laid down a non-borrowing policy in its initiation. I trust that that policy will be continued for some years to come. I admit that it is impossible to say just now what the Federal Parliament will do in the distant future. It is impossible to say that money will not be borrowed.

Mr. KELLY.—How would the honorable member propose to pay for nationalizing all the means of production, distribution, and exchange?

Mr. FISHER. — I would deal with every case as it arises. I have heard leading financiers on the Opposition side of the House say that there is no difficulty about transferring property from one to another. It is a mere matter of transferring credit. Indeed, I think I have heard the honorable and learned member for Werriwa say that it did not matter who gets the money, so long as it is kept in the country.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I am delighted indeed to hear from the deputy leader of the Labour Party that it is possible for a Government to waste money. It is now admitted that, no matter what Government is in power, it is capable of extravagant expenditure.

Mr. MAHON.—The Age recently said that taxation was necessary in order to increase wealth.

Mr. CONROY.—I should say that no one outside Yarra Bend would express such an opinion. The honorable member for Wide Bay is mistaken if he thinks that I should advocate borrowing money simply for the purpose of borrowing. I wish to make it clear that I am no advocate of borrowing money when it is not urgently required. But at the same time I think that the principle of refusing to borrow money, under any circumstances, because of the fear of its being squandered, can be carried too far. At the present time there appears to be no necessity for a loan. But if we are to undertake more works, some of them of an expensive character, we shall be unable to construct them out of revenue, and borrowing will be necessary. However, that contingency is not likely to arise until, at any rate, another election has taken place.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I hope that the Government will not take serious notice of the statement of the honorable and learned member for Werriwa. From what I can judge, he wishes to wreck the Government; because I can tell them this—that on the very day when they bring forward a loan proposal I walk straight across to the Opposition side of the Chamber. If the Government want to get wrecked, let them propose to borrow, and there can be no possible doubt as to what will happen.

Mr. CAMERON.—What about the Western Australian railway?

Mr. PAGE.—Well, I do not believe in the construction of that railway, and never have believed in it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Queensland lived on loans for some years, and did very well.

Mr. PAGE.—I do not know that she did very well.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — How could her railways have been built without loans?

Mr. PAGE.—Railways are not Queensland. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa knows very well that the Treasurer is in favour of loans, and that is why he has made this bid to the right honorable gentleman, to induce him to believe that he will have the support of some of the members of the Opposition. But, as a matter of fact, if any loan proposal were brought forward, the honorable and learned member for Werriwa would take the Treasurer to his bosom and sting him.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—Honorable member after honorable member from the Labour corner has been addressing the Committee on the question of the necessity for economy in the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth. I earnestly hope that they are sincere in the views which they have expressed; because I must say that in the State from which I have the honour to come the policy of the Labour Party has not led us to believe in their economical aspirations. I am especially glad to hear that the Labour Party is steadfastly opposed to loans, because I understand that one of its main planks is the transfer from private ownership to the State of all the means of production, distribution, and exchange. How is it proposed to pay for those properties?

Mr. BAMFORD.—I rise to order. Is the honorable member in order in discussing the policy of the Labour Party?

The CHAIRMAN. — This discussion would have been more in place on the Budget; but the honorable and learned member for Werriwa introduced the subject, and of course it is competent for an honorable member to suggest that expenditure should be provided for by loan. But a general discussion on the wisdom of a loan policy is not in order.

Mr. KELLY.—I was about to conclude, when I was interrupted. I can understand that the honorable member for Herbert is anxious to prevent a discussion of the policy of his party on this subject. I hope that the Labour Party will always be as economical as it now professes to be, and will therefore refrain from the Socialistic exploits which its members profess to have in view.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy). — The statement that the Labour Party have always advocated public borrowing is made through gross ignorance, or is a deliberate misrepresentation.

Mr. KELLY.—I say that, as to the State from which I come, the statement is absolutely correct.

Mr. WATSON.—It is not correct.

Mr. KELLY.—It is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In New South Wales the Labour Party was responsible for the spending of £17,000,000 of borrowed money in four years.

Mr. KELLY.—That is absolutely true.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I have just heard the honorable member for Bland say that something which I have said is a lie.

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask honorable members to assist me in keeping order, and not to degrade the proceedings of this Committee by hurling interjections across the Chamber. At the time the honorable and learned member for Wannon drew my attention to the fact that something offensive had been said to him, I was about to appeal to him, in the name of his constituency, not to break one of the rules of debate. I did not hear the remark to which attention has been called, but I understand that the honorable and learned member for Wannon complains that something he said has been characterized as a lie.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member for Bland says that something I said is a lie; and that, I think, is unparliamentary language.

The CHAIRMAN.—If that be so, I ask the honorable member for Bland to withdraw the expression.

Mr. WATSON.—I said that the remark of the honorable and learned member for Wannon, that the Labour Party of New South Wales had spent £17,000,000 of loan money, is one of the usual Conservative lies; and I do not withdraw that statement.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member for Bland said that something I said is a lie.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order!

Mr. ROBINSON.—I never said that the Labour Party of New South Wales had spent £17,000,000. What I did say was that that Labour Party had kept in power a Government who spent £17,000,000 of loan money at a time when it could have been ousted by the Labour Party at a day's notice, because the Labour Party were in a majority.

The CHAIRMAN.—As I have already told honorable members, I did not hear what occurred. It seems to me there is a conflict of opinion between two honorable members as to what really was said, and that conflict is a commentary on the difficulty in which honorable members place the Chairman by not observing the ordinary rules of debate. I feel sure that if the honorable member for Bland did make that allegation against the honorable and learned member for Wannon, he would be the first to withdraw it. However, I have the assurance of the honorable member for Bland that he did not make the statement, and I accept that assurance.

Mr. McDONALD.—I am sorry to have raised this hornet's nest, though I cannot feel that I am in any way responsible. I should have not have made the remark I did had it not been for the fact that the honorable member for Wentworth, in one of his attempted funniosities, alleged that the Labour Party are responsible for the extravagant expenditure of large sums of loan money. The inference to be drawn from that remark is that the Labour Party are prepared to advocate loans at any time in order that there may be expenditure in the different States. As I said before, any statement to that effect is made through gross ignorance, or is deliberate misrepresentation. As a matter of fact, the Labour Party have always opposed loan expenditure; and on every occasion I shall resent such statements as have been made by the honorable member for Wentworth.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon). — I cordially support the position taken up by the deputy-leader of the Labour Party, the honorable member for Wide Bay. I hope that the Commonwealth will not indulge in borrowing; and I indorse the statement of the honorable member for Wentworth as to the borrowing policy supported, or connived at, by a section of the party called the Labour Party in New South Wales. I say without fear of successful contradiction, that, while the Lyne-See Government were in power, and Mr. O'Sullivan was Minister for Works, more public money was squandered in the most shocking and shameful way than ever before or since in Australian history.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! Will the honorable and learned member take his seat? I point out that the honorable and learned member is not now discussing the item under consideration; and, if he will pardon me, I would also say that he is pursuing a line of argument which is not calculated to cause the proceedings in the Committee to be as orderly as they ought to be.

Mr. ROBINSON. — I make these remarks by way of personal explanation, because my accuracy has been challenged. I shall not detain honorable members more than two minutes. I say that that particular Government in New South Wales lived by the grace of the Labour Party, and could not have existed without their support; and, therefore, that the Labour Party was responsible for the expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member is not now in order.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is the end of my personal explanation.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—My desire is to move in regard to the Victorian portion of the trunk line, a similar amendment to that which has already been submitted to the Committee on another item, namely, that the words "under the guarantee system" be inserted. I shall not occupy time in discussing the matter; but I point out that this is the only chance I shall have for the next twelve months of expressing my disapproval of the treatment of the country electorates by the Government.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — Why not do that when considering the Estimates-in-Chief?

Mr. PAGE.—In my opinion this is the proper time to do so. I say emphatically that something should be done towards keeping the promises which have been made to us by Governments year after year.

Mr. WILKS.—There is a general election coming!

Mr. PAGE.—A general election is immaterial to me. I do not know how it is with the honorable member for Dalley. I have asked each successive Government questions in regard to this matter, and have always received the promise that it would be looked into; and the Government are still looking into the matter. As it seems, however, to be the wish of the Committee that these items shall be passed, I shall not submit the amendment I indicated.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—Then I think that I ought to undertake the task of submitting the amendment. I take it that honorable members are practically agreed that there ought to be no guarantee system. In Queensland, owing to the extensive area, it is very difficult in places to obtain telegraphic and telephonic facilities; although, as the Postmaster-General ought to be reminded, if telephonic communication were extended in certain districts it would remove a degree of inconvenience which is hardly appreciated by those who live in closely-settled centres. If this work is to be carried out without a guarantee, the same principle should be extended to every portion of the Commonwealth. If this principle is not to be extended to every other portion of the Commonwealth, there is no reason why it should be applied to telephonic communication between Sydney and Melbourne. These two big cities draw their very existence from the country districts of New South Wales and Victoria, and while we deny telephonic and telegraphic communication between country centres, unless the people interested are prepared to provide the guarantee required of them, it is proposed to provide telephonic communication between Sydney and Melbourne without any guarantee. These two wealthy cities should certainly be able to provide a guarantee. A case came under my notice of an application for telephonic communication between two important mining centres, each having a large population. The applicants were told that the Department must have a guarantee, and when they said they were prepared to give a guarantee they were told that it was a cash guarantee that was required. They had to plank down the money to cover any loss that might arise from the working of the line for three years. After the guarantee required, in this instance, had been given, it was from eight to ten months before the line was constructed. It would appear that the Government now propose a departure from the principle previously laid down, and before this item goes through I desire to know whether the principle followed in the past is to be definitely abandoned, and whether, in future, applications for telephonic communication in country districts will be granted without a guarantee? If I do not get a promise to that effect I shall divide the Committee on this vote, as I did on the previous vote for the same purpose.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—I point out that the Government could not adopt the plan the honorable member for Kennedy asks them to adopt, and if they were to do so, the effect would be to debar many country places from securing telephonic communication. Without a guarantee it would be impossible to provide telephonic communication in many country places. We are quite prepared to help where it is shown that there is a reasonable chance that a telephone line will pay. We could not ask for a guarantee in this instance, because no one has specially asked for this line. It is a proposal put forward by the Department. The officers of the Department, looking into the figures, have come to the conclusion that this would prove a remunerative work, and the Department therefore, wishes to carry it out. To ask a guarantee in support of the estimates of the officers of the Department, would be absurd. They are satisfied that this line will pay, and, in that case, why should we ask for a guarantee? If we were to say that in future we shall do away with all guarantees, the effect would be to deprive many centres of the advantage of telephonic communication. We do not insist on guarantee in the case of country districts, where it can be shown that a telephone line will pay. A guarantee is asked for where it is shown that the request is made for a telephone line which cannot be expected to pay. Under the guarantee system, we now permit people to assist by doing a certain portion of the work required to be done, as, for instance, by the putting up or supply of telegraph poles. The system is worked in such a way as to give every facility which can be given. We are now altering the regulations to meet the people of country districts as far as possible. If honorable members will look at the Estimates for last year, they will find that the sum provided for this purpose was not expended. There need be no fear that the Department will not have plenty of money to enable it to comply with all reasonable requests of this kind during this year. The responsible officers in each of the States have provided on these Estimates for every reasonable request for telephonic communication. I can promise the honorable member for Kennedy that the Government will carry out the evident wish of the Committee, and will deal very liberally with the people in sparsely-settled districts.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—I voted against this proposal in the last division; but, seeing that the great majority of the members of the Committee are in favour of it, I shall vote on the other side if a division is called for on this item. I do not believe in preventing the business of the Committee being carried on when a large majority of honorable members have made up their mind that this is a work which ought to be carried out.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—That is a most extraordinary position for an honorable member to take up. A thing is right or it is wrong. If the honorable member thought this proposal wrong, and consequently voted against it, and if he now proposes to vote for it, and against his own conviction, that is his business and not mine.

Mr. STORRER.—I shall not ask the honorable member how I shall vote.

Mr. McDONALD.—I did not ask the honorable member to do so, and it will be time enough to make an interjection of that kind when I do. It is a matter of no moment to me how the honorable member votes. The Postmaster-General has told the Committee that no one has asked for this proposal, and that it has emanated entirely from the Department. Seeing that there is already a splendid telegraphic service between these two great cities, I appeal to honorable members to say whether it would not be much better to spend this £30,000 in assisting in the development of the country districts of New South Wales and Victoria. The Minister's explanation has put the proposal in a very much worse light than that in which it appeared before, and I feel justified now in going further than I did on the last occasion, and in moving that the item be omitted.

The CHAIRMAN.—I cannot take such a motion, as it is equivalent to a direct negative of the question submitted to the Committee, which is "That the item be agreed to."

Mr. McDONALD.—I shall achieve my object by dividing the Committee, and voting against the item.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—When I say that no one has asked for this work, what I mean is that there is a general public demand for it, but that there is no one to whom we could especially apply for a guarantee.

Mr. FRAZER.—How does the Minister know that there is a general public demand for it?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Surely the honorable member knows what a general public demand means? I point out that the passing of this vote will not in any way interfere with the construction of lines in the country districts. I have already explained that there is plenty of money provided to give effect to all reasonable requests of this kind likely to be made from country districts in all the States.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I have listened to the explanation of the Postmaster-General as to the reasons for erecting a trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney, but I should like to know how he can support his contention that the work can be paid for out of revenue without decreasing the amount available for the extension of telephone communication in the country districts. I see no immediate necessity for the erection of this trunk line, and I shall not support the proposal if, as I anticipate, its cost will jeopardize the interests of country districts. I find that only £12,000 is proposed to be spent by the Department in the construction of telephone lines in New South Wales, and yet we are asked to spend £34,000 on a trunk line between Sydney and Melbourne, New South Wales contributing £19,000 towards the cost. Neither can I understand how the Postmaster-General can maintain that the public demands the carrying out of this work. I know that at the time the New South Wales Government decided to convert the metropolitan steam tramways into electric tramways, there was no public agitation for that conversion; but public necessity and convenience demanded that the Government should adopt an up-to-date mode of traction. Probably the Postmaster-General takes the view that the position in regard to this proposed work is the same; that, owing to the need of providing up-to-date means of communication between the two principal cities of the Commonwealth, the Government are compelled to carry out what would be a serviceable, and, at the same time, profitable undertaking. But if £34,000 is to be spent out of revenue on the erection of this trunk line, how will the necessary and growing requirements of country districts, in the way of telephone communication, be met? I could understand the Minister's contention that the interests of country districts will not be jeopardized if he had given an indication of his determination to introduce some reform in the administration of the Telephone Department which would effect savings which would do something towards meeting the cost. For instance, if he were going to introduce a toll or call system, such as all authorities are agreed would increase the revenue and impose a fair charge on metropolitan subscribers, I could understand the argument that the expenditure of revenue on the proposed trunk line would not cause a smaller amount than usual to be available for country telephone extensions. Until the Department has adopted the call or toll system which is in vogue in other countries, we shall be catering too much for subscribers in the big cities of Australia, to the injury of the residents in country districts, if we agree to the proposed work. City subscribers at the present time obtain from the Telephone Department a service out of all proportion to the amount which any other method of communication would cost them.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The telephone charges in Australia are not lower than the charges in other countries.

Mr. WEBSTER.—They are lower in proportion to population. The telephone service costs the great business houses of Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, and Adelaide a very small amount in comparison with the service which they obtain, or with the cost of communication prior to the introduction of telephones. But it has become recognised throughout civilized countries that the telephone system can be worked equitably only by adopting the call or toll method of charging. Until city subscribers are asked to pay in proportion to the service they get, as compared with the service given to country subscribers—because whereas business houses in the city use their telephones almost continuously throughout business hours, shopkeepers in the country use theirs less than a dozen times a day—we should not seek to extend the advantages and conveniences which they at present enjoy. I am not prepared to vote for the item, first, because I feel that city subscribers at present are given more consideration than country subscribers; secondly, because I do not regard the work as necessary; and thirdly, because I do not think that the undertaking can be paid for out of revenue without reducing the amount available for the extension of telephone lines to remote country districts. Moreover, I do not think that we should confer further benefits upon residents in the large centres of population, who are already deriving undue advantage from the use of the telephone system as compared with other subscribers, because they are not called upon to pay in proportion to the use made of the telephone. In the interests of the country districts, which I consider will be injuriously affected by the expenditure of a large sum of money on the proposed trunk line, I enter my protest against the work being undertaken. I should be glad to hear a declaration from the Postmaster-General that it is intended to adopt a more equitable system of charging for the use of telephones. If that assurance were given, I might be inclined to alter my view with regard to the proposed work, but otherwise I shall oppose it.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—The only question that we have to consider is whether the proposed work will pay. I presume that careful estimates have been made, and that the officials of the Department have satisfied themselves on that point. I could hardly imagine that a telephone line between two cities containing about 1,000,000 inhabitants would not pay. Twenty years ago I knew of a telephone system connecting cities not nearly so large as Sydney or Melbourne, which returned a good profit on the outlay. We need only look to the experience in regard to our railways. The suburban railways of Melbourne have always paid, whereas the country lines have in many cases involved loss, and we have had the same experience with our telephones. I wish to see the system extended throughout the country districts as far as possible, and if I thought that the construction of the proposed trunk line would interfere with the provision of reasonable facilities to residents in the country I should not view it with favour. The Department are doing as much as they possibly can, and that is saying a good deal, to extend the telephone facilities in the country districts, and the Postmaster-

General has assured us that there will be sufficient money in reserve to enable him to deal liberally with the residents in out-lying localities. So far as my own district is concerned, every facility that I could expect has been granted. We have to remember that the telephone system is a comparatively new one, which we are only beginning to build up, and in connexion with which it is often difficult to arrive at reliable estimates of cost. Some twelve or eighteen months ago an estimate was given for the construction of a trunk line thirty or forty miles long in the electorate which I represent. The cost was set down at about £900. At a later stage another estimate was furnished, the amount being £600, and eventually the estimate was reduced to £270. I presume that these reduced estimates were arrived at as the result of experience, and possibly owing to the fact that the Department were able to obtain material at a cheaper rate. It was found necessary to abandon the condenser system in that particular case, because it would not work well over the long distance.

Mr. MAHON.—The condenser system ought to work thoroughly well over a distance of thirty or forty miles.

Mr. SKENE.—That was not the experience in the case referred to, because it was found to be impossible to send a message over the line, even after trying for an hour.

Mr. MAHON.—I know a case in which the condenser system is being operated quite satisfactorily over a distance of 150 miles.

Mr. SKENE.—I am told that difficulty is also experienced in working the condenser system over a long distance in the Hamilton district. Of course, very much depends upon the connexions on the line. If a clear line can be obtained, messages can be sent by telephone.

Mr. MAHON.—There are several connexions on the line to which I refer.

Mr. SKENE.—The residents who are interested in the proposed line offered to enter into a guarantee, but this was not accepted, and further inquiries are being made. I believe in the guarantee system, because both Ministers and members would be placed in a very difficult position if no regard were paid to the prospect of the proposed lines yielding revenue. Wherever doubt exists, however, I think that a liberal view should be taken by the Department.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We give the residents the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. SKENE.—So long as that is done, we shall not have much cause to complain. I think, however, that the work of constructing lines which have been approved of might, in some instances, be greatly facilitated. In one case, eight or nine months elapsed after the work had been approved and the guarantee given, before the line was constructed. On inquiring at the Department as to the cause of the delay, I was told that the wire supply had run out. That appeared to me to be a very poor excuse. I do not think that the Minister has heard of this case: A gold rush took place in one part of my electorate, and it was desired that connexion by telephone should be established with the nearest town, eight or nine miles away. Accompanied by a gentleman who has been a representative of the district in the State Parliament, I waited on the Secretary to the Postmaster-General, and represented to him that the residents were willing to enter into the necessary guarantee. This Mr. Scott expressed his willingness to accept. I said to Mr. Scott, "You now have an opportunity to show how spry you can be." What was the result? Two or three months afterwards, I was told that nothing had been done in the matter. I immediately visited the Department, with the idea of reviving it, but at the end of another three months nothing had been done. There must be a screw loose somewhere when seven or nine months are allowed to elapse, after a work has been sanctioned by the Department, before it can be completed. These are matters which require looking into. I think we are going to have an excellent telephone system established in the country districts. Each succeeding Postmaster-General has been helping the matter forward a little, and I am quite sure that the present occupant of that office will prove as energetic as was any of his predecessors. I am satisfied that when we approach him upon any subject in regard to which a doubt exists, he will give us the benefit of that doubt.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I trust that the opposition to this vote will be withdrawn, in view of the previous decision of the Committee. There are one or two matters which I should like to explain, in reply to the remarks of the honorable member for Bland and others, concerning my objection to this trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne. I did not, as the honorable member supposed, claim that the construction of that line would deprive country districts of any essential reform or facility. I merely desired the policy of duplicating services where people enjoyed every convenience should be reviewed so that fuller justice should be done to country districts. I quite agree with the Postmaster-General that, as a commercial concern, it is the function of the Department to supply necessary facilities for the transaction of business to those who require them, and who are willing to pay for them. Consequently, the Department had a perfect right to look at this proposal in a purely business light, and if it thought, after receiving expert advice, that the line would pay interest on the cost of construction, together with working expenses, and still yield a profit, it was perfectly justified in seeking to get parliamentary approval of it. But the Postmaster-General has not submitted to us the evidence supplied by his experts as to the revenue-earning possibilities of the line.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Yes, I have.

Mr. CROUCH.—He said that it would return 10 per cent. on its capital cost.

Mr. MAHON.—I heard him say that it would return only 5 per cent. The Government ought to see that a great work of this character returns more than 5 per cent. on its capital cost. I quite agree that in view of the mail, telegraphic, and telephonic facilities which are enjoyed by Melbourne and Sydney it is only fair that we should scrutinize this proposal very carefully, and make absolutely sure that the revenue-earning possibilities of the projected line come up to the Minister's expectation. I do not for a moment pretend that its construction will deprive any portion of the country of facilities which it may require. At the same time, neither the Postmaster-General, nor any member of the Government, appears to have met the case which I have endeavoured to put before the Committee. I pointed out that this condenser system, no matter how excellent it may be, will confer no advantage whatever on those remote country centres of population which do not enjoy telegraphic communication—in short, that it is merely a duplication of existing facilities. It is an exemplification of the biblical saying "To him that hath much, much shall be given." But the centres to which I refer have no conveniences at all. Some of them do not even enjoy a mail service. The Government have not attempted to meet the case of 500 people who are located in the midst of a desert, who are 100 miles distant from any other township, and have no means of obtaining the services of a medical man in case of an accident or illness in less than three days. Nor have they met the position which I put to them earlier this afternoon, when I stated that if the cost of these works and buildings is to be charged on a per capita basis the protests of the representatives from the other States are entitled to respect. Seeing that those States are called upon to contribute to the outlay, they are perfectly justified in protesting against what they regard as undue expenditure. The Government have not attempted to meet my suggestion that they should endeavour to arrive at some arrangement with Western Australia in regard to these works. I have already said—and I repeat it—that since the establishment of the Federation that State has received from the Commonwealth Treasury something approaching £900,000 in excess of the three-fourths of the Customs and Excise revenue which the Constitution requires shall be returned to it. Instead of having refunded all that money to the State to enable it to erect mining batteries—which are, of course, very necessary—and to construct agricultural railways—which are equally necessary—I contend that we ought to have looked after the important services committed to our charge—the postal and telegraphic services. I can quite understand the attitude of the honorable member for Wilmot, who naturally feels that Tasmania should not be called upon to contribute towards the cost of these undertakings. I have suggested a means by which the whole difficulty can be overcome without any violation of the Constitution. I would again impress upon the Government the desirability of paying for these works out of the balance which is at present being returned to that State—a balance which this Parliament absolutely controls—instead of submitting them to the necessarily hostile criticism of honorable members. Before the Government refuse to meet the demands of population they ought to seriously consider my suggestion. I would remind the Committee of the position of an honorable member, representing, as I do, a remote portion of Western Australia, containing, perhaps, fifty or sixty small centres, which are urgently in need of mail, telegraphic, or telephonic facilities. The Government of that State establish mining batteries there, costing from £5,000 to £7,000 each, whereas I am unable to obtain an expenditure of £2,000 for the erection of a telephone line. That is the position in which the Federal representative is placed, and the people naturally institute comparisons between the efficiency of the State and the Commonwealth Parliaments. When the Post and Telegraph Department was controlled by the State, its surveyors and linemen followed close on the heels of the prospectors. A mining camp had scarcely been formed when the telegraph service was extended to it, and the requisite postal facilities were afforded. It is only natural that those who saw what was done by the State in pre-Federation days should be disgusted with the result of the transfer of this Department to the Commonwealth. I have put before the Committee the position of many of the mining centres in the great interior of Western Australia, which is represented by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie and myself. The State Government goes to almost unlimited expense in furnishing miners and prospectors with every facility to carry on their work, and yet I cannot induce the Government of the Commonwealth to assist them in any way.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Why should Western Australia have the exceptional treatment which the honorable member has suggested?

Mr. MAHON.—It would not be exceptional treatment, for I understand that the right honorable member for Balaclava, when Treasurer, by arrangement with the State concerned, sanctioned the erection of works and buildings which were not paid for on a per capita basis, but were treated as expenditure incurred before Federation. If that way be open to us—and I believe it is—Western Australia can secure many necessary works without being subjected to the criticism of honorable members who naturally feel that the revenues of the States which they represent are being applied to the carrying out of undertakings in another part of the Commonwealth. All these works will have eventually to be paid for, and a proper balance struck. Meanwhile, as we do not know when the transferred properties are to be paid for, and much has to be done before that day arrives, the fairest arrangement that could be made would be one by which these works would be paid for out of the balance due to Western Australia over and above the three-fourths of the Customs and Excise revenue to which she is entitled under the Constitution.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That would be equivalent to the State constructing the works out of its own revenue.

Mr. MAHON.—Quite so. I attempted to solve this difficulty when I was in office. I then approached the Premier of Western Australia, and have done so since, with a view to induce the State to indemnify the Government of the Commonwealth against loss in providing these services. For some reason or other, however, the Premier of Western Australia was inclined to believe that difficulties would arise, and probably involve the State in some loss, when the transferred properties were being taken over.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—How could that possibly occur?

Mr. MAHON.—It was not apparent to me at the time, nor has it since been shown to my satisfaction that such a contingency would arise.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I voted, on a previous division, against the construction of the trunk telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney, and did not intend to speak to the question; but I am grateful to the honorable member for Kennedy for affording me an opportunity to ask the Committee to reverse the vote which it gave on that occasion. I do not take up the position that my constituency has not been fairly treated, nor am I opposing this proposal simply from the stand-point of town versus country interests. My opposition to it is based on the ground that, in view of the position of the finances of the States and the Commonwealth, it is work that we should not undertake unless there is a strong public demand for it. I have yet to hear that there has been a demand for the construction of the line.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Does not the honorable and learned member think that the Department should act on its own initiative?

Mr. CROUCH.—When I have urged the construction of a telephone line, and a guarantee against loss has been sought by the Department, I have applied to those making the demand for the service to give the necessary indemnity against loss. But that cannot be done in connexion with a work for which there is no public demand. As to the interjection made by the honorable member for Macquarie, I certainly think that the Department should take the initiative in regard to any work that is likely to pay, provided there are no other urgent demands upon the revenue of the Commonwealth or States. The revenue from the telegraph service will be considerably reduced by the building of this line.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The line will pay, and will not interfere with any other service.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am willing to accept the estimate of the departmental experts that it will pay 5 per cent. on the capital outlay. The honorable member for Gramscians has said that the position in regard to this service is very much like that of suburban railways, which, as a rule, make good some of the loss incurred on country lines. I would remind him, however, that when an application was made recently for the construction of a suburban railway line, the Victorian Minister of Railways took up the position—and in this he was supported by the Commissioners—that it was unwise to agree to build a railway simply because it would pay, inasmuch as the money so expended might be used to greater advantage in extending conveniences to the residents of other parts of the State that were less fortunately situated. He urged that that was the view to be taken, particularly at such a time of financial stress as now exists. Inasmuch as Melbourne and Sydney are well served by telegraph lines, and no demand for a telephone service has been made, I think it would be very foolish for us to enter upon this undertaking when there are more pressing demands upon us.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The people of Geelong asked for a telephone service, although they had telegraphic communication with Melbourne.

Mr. CROUCH.—When the people in the same way demand a telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne, there will be some justification for this proposal. The very existence of a public agitation for a certain work affords some guarantee of its success. I wish honorable members to understand that, by their vote on this item, they will not commit themselves to an expenditure of only £34,000, because we shall have almost immediately to provide telephone lines to Brisbane, Adelaide, Perth, and Hobart. It would be very ungracious on the part of those who represent New South Wales and Victoria to protest against the proposal, because if they did they would be met with the statement, "Telephonic communication has been established between Melbourne and Sydney, and why should not the capitals of other States be similarly treated"?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable and learned member is unwilling to make a start. That is all this is.

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not wish to make a start, because our spending power is limited. It would be extremely unwise at the present time to vote the money, when we cannot afford to undertake works which are necessary, and far more important than is this line. It was only the other night that the honorable and learned member for Corinella said that for the safety of the Commonwealth it was necessary to spend almost immediately £800,000 on defence works and equipment, but he would not take the responsibility of placing that sum on the Estimates this year.

Mr. McCAY.—I was going to bring the matter before the House in another way, and during the present session, if I had been afforded an opportunity.

Mr. CROUCH.—Bearing in mind that statement of the honorable and learned member, and believing that his claim on the Commonwealth is justified by the necessities of the position, I shall avail myself of every opportunity to effect a saving where, in my opinion, a work is not necessary, and there is no public demand for it. The money which could be saved in that way could be spent on defence works and equipment, which are absolutely necessary.

Mr. McCAY.—As soon as the vote for warlike stores is reached, I shall tell the Committee what I propose to do, and see if the present Government will take action.

Mr. CROUCH.—Perhaps the Government may do so, although apparently that is not their intention. By making economies in these Estimates, we shall only be responding to a proper call to insure the safety and preservation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Does not the honorable and learned member think that this line would be more useful than a few more brass buttons on a uniform?

Mr. CROUCH.—I would rather have telephone lines than a display in brass buttons, but we want men to defend even our telephone lines. We do not want an enemy in Sydney to be using this telephone while the honorable member is looking up Hansard to ascertain what nasty things he said a few years previously about men in brass buttons. For these reasons, I shall vote for the omission of the item.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—We have been told repeatedly that the erection of this telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney is justified because it will pay. But I wish to point out that whilst the outlay is to be charged per capita, apparently the profit is not to be distributed by the same method. In my opinion, if the States are to be called upon to bear the cost of erecting the line, then the profit from its working should be apportioned amongst them on the same principle.

Mr. CAMERON.—Yes; but it cannot be done.

Mr. WILKINSON.—That shows that it is an absolutely one-sided arrangement. I do not think that the statement that the line will earn a profit of 5 per cent. justifies its construction under existing circumstances. If we had plenty of money available to spend, there could not be the slightest objection to the Commonwealth undertaking any work which would be reproductive.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is not a profit of 5 per cent. good enough?

Mr. WILKINSON.—It is good enough if we have any amount of money to spend on works which are required. But, as was pointed out in the debate on the Budget, the Commonwealth has reached to within about £400,000 of its spending power.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—But we shall save an expenditure of £1,100,000 on the sugar bounty directly.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It shows a rather narrow spirit for an honorable member to taunt a Queenslander in that way when he rises to honestly express his opinions. The bounty is of no more concern to me than to the representatives of New South Wales, because the sugar-growers in that State as well as in Queensland participate in the benefits of it. I am not speaking against this item in a spirit of provincialism, or from a feeling of antagonism towards New South Wales or Victoria, but merely because I wish to see justice done to the other States. If we had an unlimited spending power, there would be every justification for the Commonwealth to construct this or any other line which would pay interest on the outlay and meet the working expenses. But when we have almost reached the limit of our spending power, there are other issues to be considered than the mere earning of 5 per cent. on this line.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Do not all the branches depend upon the trunk line?

Mr. WILKINSON.—Yes, if they are connected with the trunk line, but not otherwise. The branch lines will have no connexion with the line running from Melbourne to Sydney. This work is not nearly so pressing as is the provision of some means of communication for those persons who are required to do the hard graft of pioneering. Melbourne and Sydney enjoy a mail service by rail and boat, and telegraphic communication, but many settlers in outlying districts have merely a horse mail, and when they get a coach service they think they are almost in heaven. Such persons deserve a little more consideration than they get. If we have £30,000 odd to spend, it could be spent more profitably, and more in the interest of the whole community, by giving distant settlers that communication which they require and which would serve to make them more contented with their lot.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I am rather surprised at the views put forward by the honorable and learned member for Corio and the honorable member for Kennedy when opposing this item. I believe that every honorable member, whether he represents city or country, is in favour of giving facilities of communication to country residents. No proposal has been made by the Government to withdraw any facilities from the people in the country. They are anxious to extend them.

Mr. WILKINSON.—But we have not the money.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member knows that additional facilities have been given to country people in his own State. He need not fear that there will not be money available, if any additional sum is required. Quite a new idea has been put forward by the honorable and learned member for Corio. He says that the reason why this proposal, although it will pay, should not be carried out is that no request has been made for it. He admits that the Department thinks it necessary. We ought to encourage the departmental officers to make inquiry on their own initiative. We ought not to wait for outside persons to make demands, although when they are made they should be inquired into. The humblest officer in the Public Service should be encouraged to make suggestions which will be for the benefit not only of the Department but of the public. This will be a payable work. The Postmaster-General points out that there will be a return of 5 per cent. on the capital invested. The estimate made to me, when I authorized the work, was that there would be a return of 10 per cent. But a deduction has been made on account of the estimated loss from decrease of telegraphic business to the extent of 5 per cent. That loss, however, is largely imaginary.

Mr. WILKINSON.—With whose capital is the line to be built?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH. — With Commonwealth capital.

Mr. WILKINSON.—What is to be done with the profits?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Whatever profits are made will be for the benefit of all Australia.

Mr. CAMERON.—They will be for the benefit of the people of New South Wales and Victoria.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I understand that those who advocated Federation did so because it would be for the good of Australia. We are here to legislate in the interests of Australia; and a business proposal, which shows an estimated return of 5 per cent., even after deducting the supposed loss from decrease of telegrams sent, is one which no business man would hesitate to carry out. It is true that the work will be a great advantage to the people of Sydney and Melbourne, but it will also benefit the people of country towns, such as Seymour, Wangaratta, Wodonga, Albury, Wagga, and Goulburn. All those towns can be connected, and have the advantage of telephonic communication with Sydney, Melbourne, and intervening stations. I have a recollection of a proposal to extend telephonic communication in the interest of the electorate of the honorable member for Corio. The people of Geelong wanted to have direct communication with Ballarat, instead of having to pay on the distance from Geelong to Melbourne, and thence to Ballarat. By means of the condenser system, the Department were able to meet them. But on the principle laid down by the honorable and learned member, as no petition was lodged—although the Department, in the public interest, thought the work ought to be carried out—that should not have been done.

Mr. CROUCH.—There were several petitions and a deputation, and I wrote a large number of letters. If that is not a public demand I do not know what is.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member then wanted a direct wire between Geelong and Ballarat.

Mr. CROUCH.—No, I did not.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think so; but because the Department thought it desirable to carry out that reform, according to his reasoning, they were wrong in not waiting until there was a definite and clearly expressed public demand. In my opinion, such works ought to be carried out as soon as it is shown that they will be in the public interest.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—The honorable member for Moreton has put a pertinent question to the Postmaster-General. He has pointed out that while this, as a new work, will be paid for out of the Consolidated Revenue, the profits, if there are any, will go to New South Wales and Victoria. In other words, the smaller States will have to stand the racket of the loss if there be any; and if there are profits, the larger States will receive the benefit of them. Is that fair?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member need not fear that there will be a loss.

Mr. CAMERON.—That does not alter the position. In the first place, the Commonwealth Government is going to take money which, if it were not expended in this direction, would be divided amongst the States in proportion to population.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If there be a loss, the two States mentioned must bear it.

Mr. CAMERON.—That is not so, because any loss will be borne per capita by the other States. In other words, Victoria and New South Wales stand on "velvet." It is a case of "heads we win, tails you lose."

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is not so.

Mr. CAMERON.—It is absolutely so. If the line be constructed out of Commonwealth funds, to which all have contributed, any loss must fall on the whole of the States, whereas any profit will be divided between the two largest States in proportion to the amount of business which each brings to the line.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What about the £8,000 voted for Tasmania last week?

Mr. CAMERON.—Where Tasmania has received £8,000 or 8,000 shillings, New South Wales and Victoria have received £200,000 or £300,000.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member must admit that Tasmania has been treated very fairly.

Mr. CAMERON.—On the contrary, Tasmania, on every possible occasion, has been used as a camel to assist in carrying the burden, but no attempt has ever been made to return anything to that State, or to afford any justification for the wrong done to it, beyond the retort, "You have the ports of the Commonwealth open to you." Just as if Tasmania wanted the rubbish of Victoria or New South Wales!

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The New South Wales ports were open to Tasmania for years.

Mr. CAMERON.—They were thrown open in the interests of the people of New South Wales, who had no love for Tasmania, but only love for their own stomachs.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—New South Wales will bear one-third of the cost of the construction of this line.

Mr. CAMERON.—Is the honorable member making this speech, or am I? If the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria are so strongly desirous to have this line, and believe so firmly that it will not only pay, but pay handsomely, it seems to me that section 96 of the Constitution might very properly be put into operation with regard to the profits. That section is as follows:—

During a period of ten years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides, the Parliament may grant financial assistance to any State on such terms and conditions as the Parliament thinks fit.

If we agree to assist in constructing this line, the profits, which we are told will be so large, might be distributed on a per capita basis amongst the other States. That suggestion is, I think, a fair one.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—The honorable member for Wilmot has shown us the true complexion of the case. He has pointed out in forcible language that if there be a loss on this line, that loss must be borne by the whole of the States, but that any profits will be divided between Victoria and New South Wales, although the smaller States will have to pay their quota towards the cost of construction. New South Wales and Victoria are grumbling about trade leaving them; indeed, they are just like young kangaroos—the more they get the more they want. If any representatives of the smaller States vote for this item, they will simply consent to those States paying the cost of constructing new works in Victoria and New South Wales, without any prospect of sharing in the revenue benefits.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—The honorable member for Maranoa has emphasized the statements of the honorable member for Wilmot, but the latter gentleman did not put the case fairly. No doubt New South Wales and Victoria will benefit if there is a profit, but they must also bear any loss there may be. It must be remembered that New South Wales will contribute one-third of the cost of construction, and Victoria nearly one-third, the balance being borne by the other States; in other words, the two great States bear two-thirds of the cost of all works constructed in the other four States in the Union. If the honorable member for Wilmot had the interests of his State at heart, he would vote for this item without a word of complaint, because the small, compact State of Tasmania has more to gain from such a system than have the larger States. The honorable member for Wilmot very inaccurately stated the case, and I hope that his excitement will not influence other honorable members.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I protested when a similar vote for New South Wales was before us, being convinced that the cost of the construction of this line must be borne by the Commonwealth as a whole, while the revenue will go to the two larger States. I think it is improper, however, to talk of the profit to those two States, because there is really something more. The cost of construction, which is the real expense, is, as I say, borne by the whole of the Commonwealth.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—The honorable member for Robertson seems to think that because Victoria and New South Wales will have to pay two-thirds of the expenditure involved in this proposal, the other States need not complain if they are called upon to make up the balance. I have complained of this system all along. I care not which State gains by its application; it is a rotten system—the more it is looked into the more one becomes convinced of that—and it must lead to extravagance in every State. If this proposal is followed to its logical conclusion, pressure must be brought to bear on the Government to provide telephonic communication between the capitals of all the States. Why should Sydney and Melbourne be the only capitals provided with the convenience of telephonic, as well as telegraphic communication, at the expense of the Commonwealth? No one can argue that they are entitled to this consideration any more than are the capitals of the other States. The whole thing is on a wrong basis. It cannot be contended that it is fair that expenditure should be charged on a per capita basis until we have arrived at the time when revenue is also pooled. By way of pouring oil on the troubled waters, and overcoming the difficulty, I throw out a suggestion. If the Postmaster-General will promise the representatives of the other States that within a reasonable time similar propositions will be made for their advantage, this vote might be assented to. Why should not Tasmania have direct telephonic communication with Melbourne? Why should not Broken Hill be connected with Adelaide, and Adelaide with Melbourne, in the same way? We are indebted to the late Postmaster-General for having introduced the new system which has been the means of providing telephonic communication for various centres in South Australia at a reasonable cost. When I asked for telephonic communication with Petersburg, the honorable member for Macquarie will remember that the Department demanded a guarantee of £4,500. A guarantee was required also in the case of Moonta and other places. I represent one of the largest districts in the Commonwealth, and in it are many towns which have neither telegraphic nor telephonic communication. To my mind, it is extravagant to spend £34,000 on this connexion, when it is no exaggeration to say that there are hundreds of places in the Commonwealth which should have telephonic communication, and which, so far, have not even telegraphic communication.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member will admit that within the last few months a large number of places in his State were provided with telephonic communication.

Mr. POYNTON.—I have already said that we are indebted to the late Postmaster-General for many such connexions. Is it to be understood that where large works are involved, no guarantee is to be required?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If it can be shown that the line can be worked at a profit.

Mr. POYNTON.—How is that to be shown?

Mr. KELLY.—Cannot the honorable member trust the officers of a Government department?

Mr. POYNTON.—Has the honorable member for Wentworth not been sufficiently long in Parliament to know that Government officers frequently err in their estimates of probable expenditure? The revenue from this line will be pooled with the other revenue of the Department in the two States of Victoria and New South Wales, and we shall never have any means of knowing whether it is a paying concern or not. I again protest against the inauguration of this system until we are in a position to pool revenue as well as expenditure.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie).—I voted against the amendment submitted by the honorable member for Maranoa, and against the principle of requiring a guarantee for all these undertakings. I hold the view, which members of the Government have previously expressed themselves as being in favour of, that all reasonable facilities should be given and life made as easy as possible for the men who are doing pioneering work in remote districts of the Commonwealth. It is one of the functions of the Post and Telegraph Department to do all that it can to make the lives of those who live in the interior of the country as happy and as comfortable as possible. Holding these views, I have favoured considerable expenditure in providing telegraphic and telephonic communication between different centres in the various States, even though they may not always pay. I wish to emphasize the remarks of the honorable member for Coolgardie when dealing with the condenser system. Where it has been inaugurated there is proof positive of the previous existence of a telegraph line. The difficulty we have in various portions of the extensive State of Western Australia is in getting the original telegraphic communication. I believe that the Government are justified in incurring considerable expenditure in order to bring the people in the back districts into communication with those in the cities. Looking at the estimates of expenditure proposed for New South Wales, I may say that I favour the idea of the Commonwealth assuming control of the service in the different States.

and erecting the necessary works to carry out the system inaugurated by the late Treasurer. In the same year a greater expenditure may be necessary in one State than in another. But I believe that we shall gradually find a level in this matter, and we should be prepared to "stand in" so far as expenditure as well as revenue is concerned. The honorable member for Wilmot was astray in expressing the opinion that in the event of a loss arising under this proposal it will have to be borne pro rata by the people of the whole of the Commonwealth.

Mr. CAMERON.—The Department will have power to close the line at any moment.

Mr. FRAZER.—In the event of a profit being obtained from the working of the line, it will go to New South Wales and Victoria; while, if there is a loss, those two States will be responsible for it. Seeing that only £12,000 is set apart in these Estimates for the extension of telephones throughout New South Wales generally, and that, in the view of a great many of the representatives of the State, more money is required to improve the means of communication now possessed by country districts, I am opposed to this project, though I am not bitterly opposed to it. There is no crying necessity for carrying out the work, although we have the assurance of the Postmaster-General, supported by that of the late Postmaster-General, that there is a reasonable prospect of a profitable revenue being obtained, which considerably mitigates my first antagonism to the proposal. I think, however, that the expectation of the Postmaster-General and his responsible officers that the public will be willing to pay 6s. for every conversation of three minutes' duration is too sanguine.

Mr. McCAY.—It would be cheaper to pay that rate than to use the telegraph.

Mr. FRAZER. — That would depend upon the business to be done. It must be remembered that the use of the telephone will reduce the revenue from the telegraph.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Does the honorable member put that forward as a reason for not improving our facilities for communication?

Mr. FRAZER.—I think that we must consider whether this work is so urgent that it demands immediate consideration. The Postmaster-General told us first that there is a public demand for it, and afterwards that no individual request has been made for the construction of the line. The honorable member for Macquarie is so satisfied that a big profit will be obtained from the working of the line that he will not admit the possibility of loss.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I should not advocate the erection of the line if I were not.

Mr. FRAZER.—I, at any rate, am not so satisfied. Although honorable members have a great deal to say about assisting the producer, I think it is the producers of George-street and Flinders-street who chiefly will benefit by this work. However, if this is a reasonable business proposition, the only question we have to decide is whether the line should be erected now or at some future date, after telephones have been extended to districts which are more urgently in need of means of rapid communication.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—I cannot understand why there should be so much objection to this proposal, seeing that we have the assurance of the Postmaster-General that the work will pay from the start, and that it will serve not only Melbourne and Sydney, but all the intermediate towns. No guarantee is required if it is evident that the line will pay, and I am sure that if the representatives of other States can bring forward cases in which lines will pay from the start, the Postmaster-General will be glad to erect them without asking for a guarantee. I do not think that the honorable member for Wilmot could suggest an extension which would pay without the Postmaster-General consenting to make it at once.

Mr. CAMERON.—I can instance a case in which I offered a guarantee to the late Postmaster-General, and he would not give a post-office.

Mr. LEE. — The late Postmaster-General is here to answer for himself. Under the circumstances, it would be a waste of time to discuss this matter further. I do not think, however, that the Postmaster-General will get as much business if he makes the charge 6s. for every three minutes' conversation as he will get if he charges a lower rate.

Question—That item 3, subdivision 2, “Victorian portion of trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne, £11,000” be agreed to—put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—On Friday last I gave notice of my intention to move the reduction of the vote for Western Australia by £1, in order to raise the question whether the Government were right in debiting to the States, on a per capita basis, the expenditure on certain buildings in Fremantle. My view is that under the Constitution the State in which such works are constructed should bear the cost of them. If honorable members will look at section 89 of the Constitution—and that is the only provision that has any bearing on this point—they will see that it is therein provided that all buildings taken over by the Commonwealth shall be maintained at the cost of the various States by whom they are transferred to the Commonwealth. and that any new buildings that may be erected in connexion with the transferred services shall be paid for by the States on a per capita basis—that is, that the States shall contribute to such cost in proportion to their population. My contention is that the proposed new post-office at Fremantle is not a new work in any sense of the term, but is merely intended to replace one of the transferred properties. It is well known that there was a post-office at Fremantle at the time when the Departments were transferred to the Commonwealth, and that the building then in use for post and telegraphic purposes has been utilized up to the present time. Although the new building may not be erected on the site of the old structure, it is none the less intended to be substituted for it, and to answer the same purposes. When previously dealing with this subject, I expressed my appreciation of the soundness of the position taken up by the honorable member for Coolgardie, who seemed to me to strike the true keynote when he said that the discontent which prevails amongst representatives of the smaller States, as the result of the want of recognition on the part of the larger States of the great responsibility which rests upon us in regard to the finances of the States, would be, to some extent, allayed if the cost of new buildings were deducted from the revenue returnable to the various States. I do not know that I need take up very much time in discussing this matter. If honorable members will read the Constitution they will see that the proposed building at Fremantle cannot be regarded as a new work. It may be argued by the representatives of Western Australia that the business of the post-office at Fremantle has increased to such an extent that it is absolutely necessary to provide a larger building; but that does not affect the point I am raising. I move—

That subdivision 5, “Western Australia, £23,000,” be reduced by £1.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—May I ask the honorable member if he has considered what the real effect of his proposal would be—or, rather, how short a distance it would carry him? As the honorable member is aware, we have now nearly completed arrangements for the valuing, as a preliminary to the taking over from the States, of the whole of the transferred properties, and when such properties are taken over by the Commonwealth they will have to be paid for on a per capita basis. Therefore, if the honorable member had his way, and if the proposed building were constructed nominally at the expense of the State as soon as the transferred properties are paid for its cost will be charged per capita. So that if the honorable member succeeds in carrying his amendment, the expenditure for the moment will be charged to the State, but presently—as fast as the matter can be arranged—it will be charged per capita. Consequently no real gain will be effected.

MR. WATSON.—How long will it take to arrive at an agreement in regard to the price to be paid for the transferred properties?

MR. DEAKIN.—We have practically arrived at an agreement as to the basis of valuation with two or three of the principal States, and with them there only remains the question of calculating the amounts and arranging for their payment. After a great deal of delay the basis of the valuation has at length been satisfactorily arranged.

MR. WATSON.—I do not mind prophesying that it will be some time yet before the matter is finally dealt with.

MR. CAMERON.—Why not do what is legal in the interim?

MR. DEAKIN.—If the honorable member succeeds in carrying his proposal he will have gained nothing. On the legal question, without offering an individual opinion, I think he will see that a line has to be drawn somewhere when a State work is being replaced by another of a much larger and more expensive character. From the very inception of the Commonwealth, it was claimed by the States that in charging them with renewals which include a certain amount for improvements we were dealing with them rather harshly. They claim that no amount should be charged for improvements, but we have taken a reasonable latitude in that direction, and they have been satisfied by being reminded—as I have already reminded the honorable member—that when these works are taken over by the Commonwealth they will be paid for per capita, so that, after all, the arrangement is merely a temporary one, which will not injure them. The honorable member for Wilmot chose a post-office to illustrate his contention, and I desire to follow his example. Let us take the case of a small post-office on a new gold-field, which becomes a Kalgoorlie. When the State erected its building, it probably provided two or three rooms in which business could be comfortably carried on, at an expenditure of £400 or £500. But after the mines were discovered, people flocked there, and it became necessary to erect a larger building at a cost, perhaps, of £6,000 or £7,000.

MR. CAMERON.—Does not the State reap the benefit from the larger building?

MR. DEAKIN.—Certainly, it reaps the benefit of the revenue derived from it. Nevertheless that work has to be paid for per capita, and the special revenue benefit which the State enjoys is terminable at the close of the bookkeeping period. It is true that the State gets the benefit of the revenue which that post-office returns, but only during the bookkeeping period, which may be terminated within the next twelve months. Consequently the gain may be limited to twelve months. If the honorable member looks at the matter from either aspect he will see that the Commonwealth will have to pay for the building per capita soon, and that the State will soon lose the revenue which it derives from that source. His proposal, therefore, which is intended to benefit the State, would benefit it only temporarily. The practice of charging the expenditure on these works on a population basis has been established.

MR. CAMERON.—It was established only last year for the first time.

MR. DEAKIN.—With regard to post-offices, the practice has obtained ever since the establishment of the Federation. It is quite true that last year the Treasurer laid down a new principle; under which he charged the cost of a number of works which had been previously debited to the States on a per capita basis. Now that the bookkeeping period has nearly expired, is it not too late to reconsider the position which we accepted last year on the advice of the then Treasurer? We have accepted this new method of allocating expenditure. To reverse it now would only make confusion worse confounded. Under the circumstances, I submit that the gain anticipated is illusory, and that to alter the present practice would involve considerable inconvenience for an inconsiderable gain.

MR. GLYNN (Angas).—I think that a mistake was made last year in altering the system which previously obtained. For three or four years the Commonwealth had charged the States in which any works or buildings were constructed, with the outlay upon them. That principle was absolutely open to no objection, because—as the Prime Minister has mentioned—so soon as the transferred properties are paid for, those works, which were previously debited to each State, will be paid for as part of the transferred properties. They will technically be regarded as having been transferred, inasmuch as they will be works and buildings, which were constructed to keep up the establishment, as at the time of the inauguration of the Commonwealth. But last year the Treasurer threw out some doubts as to whether that was the better system, and with very great reluctance he adopted the method of charging the cost of these works on a population basis. After having found his confusion worse confounded by the constitutional opinions expressed by lawyers, he was exceedingly doubtful of the policy of apportioning the expenditure per capita. Apparently the present Treasurer entertains less doubt upon the matter, because the effect of carrying out the per capita principle will be to relieve the obligations of Western Australia to a considerable extent.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not prepare these Estimates. The Committee adopted the per capita method of charging this expenditure last year.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not know that it did. The Treasurer mooted the matter, but there was no decision of the Committee upon it.

Mr. WATSON.—I protested against it, but there was no decision on the part of the Committee.

Mr. McCAY.—The Treasurer intimated that he intended to adopt the per capita method.

Mr. GLYNN.—He expressed grave doubt as to the constitutionality of the course which he proposed to take.

Mr. McCAY.—He announced his intention to take a course of action which was not challenged.

Mr. GLYNN.—By referring to Hansard, of last year, page 5650, I find that the then Treasurer said—

The provision to which I have referred has puzzled me very greatly, and, although I have consulted the law advisers of the Crown in regard to it, I have not been much helped by their opinion.

Upon the next page, he says—

Whatever view I might entertain in regard to expenditure upon post-offices, telegraphs, and telephones, I can come to only one conclusion concerning defence expenditure, namely, that it ought to be charged against the whole of the Commonwealth upon a per capita basis.

It will thus be seen that he remained doubtful as to all other expenditure, except defence. To my mind, there is no distinction between the two, save that one is revenue-producing and the other is not.

Mr. GROOM.—If the honorable member will read what is reported a few lines lower, he will see that the late Treasurer laid down the course of action which he intended to pursue.

Mr. GLYNN.—What I stated at the beginning of my remarks is quite correct. The right honorable member for Balaclava indicated that it was with very great reluctance that he was about to change the system which had previously existed. In my judgment, it was a great mistake to alter the system which had been in force for four years.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Constitution contemplates that "other" expenditure shall be charged per capita.

Mr. GLYNN.—But the point is whether or not this is "other" expenditure. For four years we acted upon the assumption that it was not.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We may have acted wrongly. The position became untenable.

Mr. GLYNN.—When the properties come to be valued we shall have certain parts of them treated as transferred, while others will be regarded as not having been transferred. Probably the confusion of the valuers will be equal to that of the Treasurer when they have to settle on what basis they are to value these properties. It is for this reason that I say the mistake was in altering the system that had been followed for four years. The valuations may or may not be on a uniform basis, but in the long run it cannot make much difference, because the State under the old principle would have the amount refunded subsequently, assuming the valuation were a proper one. Although the honorable member for Wilmot is correct in his view that this is transferred expenditure, it would be almost a pity this year to make another alteration in the system.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not altogether agree with the honorable member's view of the Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN.—The right honorable gentleman does not consider that a slight extension in the scope of a Department makes the incidental expenditure thereby incurred "new expenditure."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that the cost of erecting a fort where there was none before could be considered as transferred expenditure.

Mr. GLYNN.—But would the right honorable gentleman consider the cost incurred in improving an existing fort was new expenditure?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The position in that case might be different. .

Mr. GLYNN.—Surely it could not be new expenditure. New expenditure must be that incurred in launching some new policy. We determined at the Convention that certain Departments should be transferred as going concerns, and surely the cost of slight renovations or repairs, or additions to transferred buildings, should not be considered as new expenditure. Such expenditure would be incurred in continuing the old Departments, and in keeping them up to the necessities of business. However, as I have said, lawyers differ on this point, and I regret that in the circumstances the Government did not adhere to their original system of dealing with these items as transferred expenditure. The honorable member for Wilmot is now attempting to get away from the system adopted for the first time last year.

Mr. CAMERON.—The alteration can easily be made.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt the honorable member's contention is right in principle, and I should like to hear from the Government before I say that I shall not support them.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—The honorable member for Wilmot has raised an important point, which was well considered when the late Treasurer submitted his Budget last year. At that time I went into it very carefully, and expressed myself as strongly of the view that the practice adopted by the late Treasurer for the first four years of the Federation was absolutely wrong. I said that he had been charging to the different States respectively the cost of works done within those States, whereas he ought to have charged it as "other expenditure" on a per capita basis. I think that a great deal of the confusion has arisen from importing into the Constitution words that it does not contain. There is no such expression as "new expenditure" in the Constitution, and we are not now dealing with the question of what is expedient. We are bound by the words in section 89, which primarily refer to the time before the imposition of uniform duties. Under the latter part of the section, of course, the period after the imposition of uniform duties is governed by the same conditions; but still primarily the idea is that for the time being we shall debit expenditure in these two ways. The words are simply that—

The Commonwealth shall debit to each State—

(a) The expenditure therein of the Commonwealth incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of transfer, of any Department transferred

All other expenditure is to be dealt with on a per capita basis. The only question now before us is whether the erection of a new building at Fremantle in substitution of an old building comes within paragraph a with regard to "maintenance or continuance as at the time of transfer." I understand that the words, "maintenance or continuance" were used with reference to the up-keep—both as regards repairs and staff—of the Departments as they stood at the time of transfer, and that the idea in using them was to secure that there should be debited to the State such expenditure as happened to be incurred on any post-office as it then stood.

Mr. WATSON.—Is every appointment to be treated as new expenditure?

Mr. HIGGINS.—If an increase were made in the staff, it would probably be "other expenditure."

Mr. DEAKIN.—And yet the State would get the extra revenue.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is true that all the revenues collected in the State are to go to that State. It is a question not of what ought to be done, but of what is the meaning of section 89? We cannot get away from that section, and it is useless for us to say that the provision is unreasonable. I am not discussing that phase of the question.

Mr. CAMERON.—If a new post-office be erected in Fremantle, it will be the property of the Commonwealth?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes.

Mr. CAMERON.—There is nothing in the Estimates to show that the new post-office is to be erected on the site of the present building. That being so, the Commonwealth will be compelled by the Constitution to take over the old post-office, although it will have this new building.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may be very extravagant, but the point we have to consider is whether the expenditure incurred in building a new post-office on a different site, as the honorable member suggests, will amount to the "maintenance or continuance" of the Department as at the time of the transfer. I think that the honorable member has, as a matter of business, hit upon what is a flaw in the section; but at the same time I feel that we are bound by that provision. I did my best last year to follow the late Treasurer's exposition of his doubts on the point, and I confess that I fail to know why he should have had any. Although the honorable member for Wilmot will be able to put his finger on several injustices which will arise from what is being done, I am obliged to vote against him, as I feel bound by the Constitution. I ask the honorable member to confine his attention to the question of what is expenditure incurred solely "for the maintenance or continuance as at the time of the transfer of the Department."

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I agree with the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne that if we are to interpret the words of section 89 of the Constitution Act in their ordinary literal meaning, we shall certainly be landed in the difficulties which he has indicated. I do not agree with him, however, that the canon of construction of a Statute such as this one is the literal or the primary apparent meaning of the words. There must be some regard paid in such a case, I think, to the general intention of the legislation. Before the right honorable member for Balaclava delivered his Budget speech last session, I felt that it was very difficult indeed to say where sole maintenance or continuance ended, and new expenditure began, that if you went beyond the offices, and one might say the officers which were in existence at the time of transfer—which seemed at first sight to be the intention of the section—it was very difficult to say exactly where the line should be drawn. But while my doubts were not resolved any more than were his by the opinion of a previous Attorney-General, expressed with the usual caution, I felt that, in the matter of these new works and buildings, as the Prime Minister has pointed out this evening, this was only a temporary arrangement, and that if they are charged to the States to-day they must be taken over and paid for by the Commonwealth on a per capita basis to-morrow. If it be a loan from one State to another for a few years, it will not be a loan of the amounts which appear on the Estimates, but only a loan of the difference between the amount advanced and the charge to the State on a per capita basis. It will not bear the ordinary aspect of a loan; it will not be a loan of what would otherwise be interest-bearing money, because it will be expended either by the Commonwealth or the State in the ordinary services of the year. It will simply be a loan from one's income as contrasted with a loan from one's capital. I venture to say that, except in the case of Western Australia, which is getting, of course, considerably more than her per capita share, the difference will be comparatively slight, and it will be found that Tasmania will not pay very much out of Western Australia's excess over her per capita share of the money which is being spent.

Mr. CAMERON.—Only an eighth of the vote.

Mr. McCAY.—Tasmania will not pay an eighth of anything. She will merely pay on the ratio of 180,000 to 4,000,000, roughly speaking. I object most strongly to the application of the principle that the expenditure in each State chargeable per capita shall be exactly proportionate to the per capita contribution of the State. Victoria is paying for everything so far as these charges are concerned.

Mr. WATSON.—Not for everything.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not say that Victoria is paying everything, but merely that she is paying for everything of this kind. There is no way in which she is making a profit.

Mr. CAMERON. — Victoria is getting a larger return than any other State.

Mr. HIGGINS. — There is the item of £10,000 for the Melbourne General Post Office.

Mr. McCAY.—If we take the proportion to which Victoria would be entitled on a per capita basis, I do not think there is any way in which she is getting a return equivalent to the amount she pays on a per capita basis, and she is making no complaint. So far as these payments are concerned, she recognises that it is inevitable that, in the settling of these matters, we cannot proportion everything absolutely to the old state of affairs. Otherwise there would be none of the giving while there would be all the taking of a Federation.

Mr. CAMERON.—Tasmania is contributing to the sugar bounty to the Colonial Sugar Refining Company.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not wish to be lured into a discussion of either the fiscal question or the sugar bounty. What pressed on my mind in coming to the conclusion with the late Treasurer that it was best to charge new works on a per capita basis was that it meant a comparatively small loan for only a year or two.

Mr. WATSON.—What was the reason for altering the previous practice?

Mr. McCAY.—The works partook more of a Federal than of a State nature, and whatever legal argument was to be drawn from section 89 of the Constitution it was against the previous practice. Take, for instance, a new work like the fort at Fremantle. I do not find anything in that section, even on a liberal construction, which justifies us in calling it transferred expenditure chargeable against Western Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—I think that it is just as much so as the appointment of an additional gunner in the artillery there.

Mr. McCAY.—That is another matter. It is an argument against the honorable member's view, not against mine.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think so.

Mr. McCAY.—It is an argument against charging as "transferred" expenditure many things which are now so charged, not an argument against charging as "other" expenditure things which are now so charged.

Mr. WATSON.—The whole position is unreasonable.

Mr. McCAY.—That is the fault of the Constitution.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think that any Court would take any such view.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that the Justices would probably give an elastic meaning to the words "maintenance" and "continuance," but I do not think they would go so far as to regard a new work which is a part of a general strategic defence of the Continent as a work for the maintenance or continuance of the Department as at the time of transfer. That argument applies, although not with the same force, to a new telegraph line or a new post-office. There is a convenient working line which may be drawn between current expenses and new works, even if it be not a strictly legal line. I think the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne will agree with me that a practical line can be drawn even if a legal one cannot.

Mr. HIGGINS.—What is the force of the word "solely"?

Mr. McCAY.—That is an unhappy word. The balance of argument and convenience is very strongly in favour of the course adopted by the last Government, and which the present Government propose to continue; and I would suggest to the honorable member for Wilmot that he gains a very small advantage at the expense of considerable inconvenience, if he were to press this amendment to a successful issue.

Motion negatived.

Proposed vote (items 1 and 7 of subdivision 1, item 3 of subdivision 2, and subdivision 5) agreed to.

TREASURY.

Division 5 (Government Printing Office), £1,500.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—There is an item in this division of £160 as a contribution towards the cost of sewerage the Government Printing Office. That building is one over which, so far as I know, we have no control. We have nothing to do with it except that we get our printing done there. We have certain machinery in it, but the building belongs to the Government of Victoria. I also direct attention to the fact that, although last year £1,500 was appropriated for machinery and plant, the actual expenditure was £2,593. The expenditure, therefore, exceeded the appropriation by a considerable sum. We have a right to complain, first, that the appropriation should have been exceeded; and next, that we should be called upon to contribute towards the sewerage of a building over which we have no control. I raised a similar question last year, and I hope that the Treasurer will look into it. We have no guarantee that the estimate will not be exceeded again. I trust that the Treasurer will exercise more control over the Printing Office than seems to have been the case in the past.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—This expenditure of £1,500 is for the purpose of obtaining linotype metal, and also for the purchase of a machine to repair the linotype machines.

Mr. TUDOR.—Why was the vote exceeded last year?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I cannot tell the honorable member off-hand. The whole of the expenditure is in connexion with our linotype machines, and the building in which our printing is carried on. I shall be glad to make inquiries and give the honorable member detailed information when the general Estimates are being considered.

Proposed vote agreed to.

DEFENCE DEPARTMENT.

Division 6 (Special defence material), £140,000.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—In respect to the consideration of these Estimates, the Committee has been very much assisted by the very clear and comprehensive statement made by the late Minister of Defence. In the course of that statement the honorable and learned member explained that the Estimates before the Committee were practically his, and not those of the present Government. We found them in the Treasury at the time of our taking office, and the period which has elapsed since then has been, of course, insufficient to allow my colleague, the Minister of Defence, to make an examination of the whole of the items involved from his own particular point of view, in order to submit them comprehensively to the Government. But, at the same time, enough advance has been made in the consideration of these Estimates for me to feel that it is but just to call the attention of the Committee to several items of expenditure which the Government do not propose to carry out as they are here set down.

Mr. McCAY.—I suppose that the honorable gentleman will move alterations.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not yet in a position to move the addition of items and the substitution of others, for reasons which I will presently explain. The late Minister of Defence, in the course of the speech to which I have alluded, pointed out that the position which he occupied was that of every previous Minister of Defence; that is to say, that he had far more obligations, if one might so term them, than he could possibly hope to cope with in one year. It became, therefore, not a question of doing what he desired, and neglecting what he did not desire to do; but his task was to consider the various proposals in the order of their urgency, and in the order of their comparative importance, and to pick out those which, in his opinion, most called for attention at the present moment. The honorable and learned member laid down the principle on which he had proceeded. It was desirable, he said, to complete part of the scheme before proceeding to other parts. In one portion of his speech, reported in Hansard, at page 1684, he set out the position very clearly. He pointed out that—

The votes proposed for the current year will, to a large extent, complete that scheme.

That means Major-General Hutton's scheme—

For instance, the vote for accoutrements will complete the accoutrements for the field force upon a war establishment; that for saddles will complete the equipment of the light-horse upon a peace establishment; the vote for the field artillery will bring us within twelve of our total number of guns, and will complete the equipment of sixty out of seventy-two guns. In the same way the vote for camp equipment will complete the equipment of the garrison force; and that for medical equipment will complete the equipment of the field force upon a peace establishment. Every one of these votes will practically complete some work which was already in progress.

That was the principle on which the honorable and learned member proceeded. I need not say that those statements are correct, and that the honorable member's proposals would complete to the extent which he mentioned those various purposes. But that may, perhaps, have been interpreted by the Committee in a larger sense than intended, except in regard to the very first item of £32,500 set down for accoutrements. There was £7,000 spent last year, with this additional sum for this year—and a very large sum it is—for providing the infantry, which now possesses accoutrements on the peace footing, with accoutrements necessary to a war establishment. The Australian Light Horse, which at present has no such accoutrements, will be equipped, not only on a peace footing, but on a war footing.

Mr. McCAY.—The men have accoutrements, but the horses have not.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly; but these items cover the special accoutrements, so far as is necessary to raise the Australian Light Horse to a war establishment.

Mr. McCAY.—The items cover the things which the men carry on their backs or around them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—And these things are summarized under the word "accoutrements," although it includes much more.

Mr. McCAY.—This applies to the mounted troops.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is to them I refer. As a matter of fact, the precise accoutrements which have to be carried by the horses have not yet been decided on.

Mr. McCAY.—I think they have practically been decided on.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In regard to this particular vote, it is true that the £32,500, if voted, will practically complete the equipment in what are termed the accoutrements. But with item 2, "Saddle-trees, stirrups, and bits, £10,250," and item 3, "Making saddles, £22,500," we find an addition to the sum on the Estimates of £32,750. We shall require next year, £32,800, which will make £66,550; or, if we add the garrisons which are not provided for under Sir Edward Hutton's scheme, we shall require £71,270 in order to finally complete the provision for saddletrees and the making of saddles for a war establishment. Omitting item 4, "Field Artillery—guns, harness, waggons, and ammunition, £58,882," in regard to which I have no alteration to suggest, we come to item 5, "Camp equipment, £8,000." I find here again that £8,062 was spent last year, and £10,238 will need to be voted next year, making £26,300 to place the equipment on a war footing. Item 6, "Miscellaneous—tools and other material," £1,840 was spent last year, whilst next year £3,160 will be required to complete the equipment. Item 7, "Medical equipment, £5,653," is in addition to the £5,808 voted last year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—£11,000 was voted last year, and £5,800 spent.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There will be £8,114 voted next year, or a total expenditure of £19,575, to completely equip the field force. Altogether, therefore, a very large sum, approaching £60,000, will be required to really complete the late Minister's items.

Mr. McCAY.—On a war footing.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am speaking always of a war footing, as I did in regard to the first item of accoutrements.

Mr. McCAY.—That is the first matter which must be completed—the accoutrements.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Now we come to items 8, 9, and 10, on which there is no difference of opinion between the ex-Minister of Defence and the Government, and as to these I have no suggestion to make, though I may have a statement to lay before honorable members. But as to item 11, which is £2,000 for mounting the Cerberus guns, the ex-Minister of Defence informed us that he had intended to remove it from the Estimates, where the present Government found it. The present Minister of Defence was not aware that his predecessor had intended to remove the item, which was left until it was too late to make any change. This item, I need not say, it is proposed to ignore altogether. I have referred to certain items, because, in respect to them, there is a differ-
